Just for the record, a check was made with the big ones of 1952, as published in VARIETY. There were two boxoffice nifties in that year—Par's "Greatest Show on Earth" with a distribution gross of $12,000,000 and M-G's "Quo Vadis" with $10,500,000. But perhaps of the most significance is the fact that all film companies in 1952 turned out a combined total of only 16 productions grossing $3,000,000 or over. More time is needed, obviously, before the 1958 roster of blockbusters can be compiled but already it's certain to dwarf the 1952 list.

This latter-day showing is a major factor behind new picture making and thinking. They're coming bigger and there are more of them.

Krim rams home the point that UA, which was a pretty doubtful enterprise six years ago, is ready to release 29 major features within the next year. These are "major" in terms of production scope, story values, cast and credits and he provides the definite lineup to prove his point.

Last year UA delivered, as the company had earlier promised, 17 pix in that "major" classification.

Universal currently is putting together some promising packages, Par is underscoring it's schedule of 20 top-money contenders ($30,000,000 in negative investment exclusive of the talent participations), and Columbia has completely revised its production blueprinting with the emphasis on tall filmmaking coin.

The same can be said more or less throughout the American industry. Many films of the lesser-budget variety have been successful over the past year—successful in that they showed a profit.

But the really meaningful profit comes with the blockbusters and the producers are making an earnest and expensive effort to wind up with same. It could all be "fabulous."

With One-Print-Per-Exchange 20th's 'Streetcar' Reissue Now Grossing $350,000 and Posing Challenge

'Bidding' As Is

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

New slant on the higher mathematics of feature biz is offered by Universal ad-pub chief David Lipton, commentating on astronomical salaries, percentages and participations in film today, plus competitions among distribs for product.

"The most important bidding in the industry now," he opines, "is not the bidding (by exhibs) after a picture is made, but the bidding before a picture is made!"

Experience 20th-Fox has had with "Streetcar Named Desire" has added to an already widespread conviction that the industry has missed the boat with its reissue policy. Unless it's written off as a fluke, "Streetcar" proves that, if selected intelligently, reissues can still earn tidy sums.

Current expectation at 20th is that the Vivien Leigh-Marlon Brando starrer will gross $350,000 in 360 dates, adding substantially to the company's final quarter take. Success is written down largely to Brando, who has become a big name, and to the handling of the film.

Rather than put out a large number of prints, 20th general sales manager Alex Harrison provided only one print for each exchange "to let them do the best they can with it." Putting the sales staff on its mettle in that fashion paid off.

20th, incidentally, is reissuing "Streetcar" through a recent deal with producer Charles K. Feldman. Warners originally released the film, but was required to return the picture to Feldman after seven years.

Industry's attitude towards reissues has always been mixed. There was a time, for instance, when a New York theatreman wanted to convert a house into an "Academy Award" theatre where only Oscar winners would play. He didn't get to first base with the distributors, who took the position that the new product should be pushed.

Right now, on "The Late Show" on CBS Television, an Oscar champion parade is advertised and

Metro to Distrib Spain's 'Venganza' Around the World

In what's described as the first deal of its kind involving a major United States company, Metro is set to distribute a Spanish production on a worldwide basis. Move is designed to stimulate Spanish film-making, stated Morton A. Spring, president of Loew's International, which is the M-G overseas organization.

Deal was entered with Cesareo Gonzalez of Cesareo Gonzalez-Suevia Films and calls for M-G's global release of "La Venganza" (Vengeance), which received the 1958 Cannes Festival prize of the International Federation of the Cinematographic Press.

Film, in color, was produced in Spain by Manuel J. Goyanes. Cast is headed by Raf Vallone, Carmen Sevilla and Jorge Mistral, whose names carry weight in the Spanish and Latin American markets.

'ANDERSONVILLE' OFFER MADE TO G. STEVENS

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Columbia is talking with producer-director George Stevens regarding his taking over its project "Andersonville," based on MacKinlay Kantor's best-seller. Dan Taradash has written the screenplay.

Studio plans a multi-million dollar production of the Civil War drama. Stevens is currently finishing work on "The Diary of Anne Frank," at 20th-Fox.

BRITISH PAIR SET DEAL

Sir Carol Reed and Greene Prep 'Havana' for Col

Columbia has wrapped up a deal with Sir Carol Reed and Grahame Greene for a picture based on the latter's novel, "Our Man in Havana," which Viking Press will publish in America. Greene is to do the script and Reed will produce and direct.

Reed and Greene were in New York over the past weekend and set the arrangement with Col.

Story concerns an English vacuum salesman in Havana who becomes an agent for the British Secret Service. It's a suspense melodrama.

Bob Perkins in Japan

Robert Perkins, son of Paramount distribution chief James Perkins, is in Japan at work on a telefilm series.

He and George Breakston are co-producing the series, which has a Far East background, in association with the Shaw Brothers of Singapore.

Par's 'Blob' No Slob; Science Fiction Itself: Cream From Peanuts

In a situation which reflects the extent of the twists and turns in film industry economics, in this instance on the upbeat, the Jack H. Harris production of "The Blob," science fiction entry, will gross about $1,500,000 for Paramount. The figure relates to distribution rental and means a profit for Par.

Harris made the picture strictly on his own at a cost of $150,000 (there was no distributor financing). Par bought "Blob" for $300,000, which means Harris came out with a neat profit before release.

Par followed through with an outlay of $300,000 for promotion which may be the significant point. For it means the bally in terms of expenditure amounts to twice the cost of negative investment.

Also significant is this: Harris, on his own, would be unlikely to allocate such an amount of promotion money for his picture. Par is in a position to do this and followed through on the reasoning that a sci-fi entry demands a special promotional push, particularly since there are no cast names to help the "sell."

Par and Harris both came out on top, as apparent, and this leaves the Monday-morning quarterbacks to wondering how things might have been if Harris, had he kept the picture rather than peddle it to Par.

As a result of this and numerous situations in the picture business the conviction is growing that the ad-pub work on numerous productions is almost as important, if not more so, than what had been regarded as the "sell" values of the production itself.

Leon Uris' novel of modern Israel, "Exodus" (Doubleday), which hit top-sales within 10 days of publication was picked from galleys by Otto Preminger four months ago.

Also-Ran for Sock Features Chi's Oriental Orients Toward Flesh Acts

Chicago, Oct. 14.

In another biz-building effort, the Oriental Theatre, 3,400-seat Chicago mainstemmer which has been up against an almost continuous boxoffice slough (for lack of sock product), is huddling with top-rated Windy City deejay Howard Miller on a possible stage presentation over the Christmas holiday. Miller would package and emcee the show, built around currently hot record names, and similar to shows he has produced for rival Balaban & Katz Chicago Theatre.

Oriental is going "legit" briefly to house the Mary Martin Columbia Concert unit Oct. 21-22, with likelihood it will dome some future longhair attractions brought in by Harry Zelzer's Allied Arts booking shop. Pictures, however, will continue as staple for the deluxer.

Any Excuse to Up B.O.

Minneapolis, Oct. 14.

Instead of the "regular" 90c after 5 p.m., it's $1.25 or $1.50 at loop theatres here much of the time now. Every "important" picture now commands advanced admissions, and there have been more than a couple dozen of them this year.

Latest is newest arrival "The Barbarian and the Geisha" and its tap is $1.25. Current with it are "The Big Country" and "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" (7th week), $1.50, and "Damn Yankees" and "The Defiant Ones," in their second and third weeks, respectively, $1.25.

Lone houses charging the "regular" prices are the Gopher with "The Goddess" and the RKO Pan with a twin bill of reissues.

There are, too, of course, the hard-ticket "Search for Paradise" and "South Pacific" in the midst of long runs and at $2.65 top.

American International's $15,000,000 Financing Of 30 1959 Features

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

To provide more solid production values and a wider market for its expanding program, American International Pictures has allocated a record $15,000,000 for 30 features during 1959.

Higher budgets, according to prexy James H. Nicholson and v.p. Samuel Z. Arkoff, are no indication that American is interested in crashing the "A" market, but are merely recognition that gimmick pix can no longer be filmed on short purses and be successful.

American, now starting its fifth year in distribution and fourth in production, by year's end will have made about 62 films, Nicholson says, adding that exhibs "can count on us for approximately 15% of the total U. S. product available."

Upcoming agenda calls for four co-productions in CinemaScope and color, to cost between $500,000 and $1,000,000. These include "Horrors of the Black Museum," which Herman Cohen launches Oct. 20 in England; "She," produced-directed by Roger Corman

Indirect-Only Loans Loom As Ozoner's Hope

Washington, Oct. 14.

Chances of opening cheap interest, longterm Government small business loans to drive-in theatres seem all but lost, with the final decision to be announced within a few weeks, a high federal official predicts.

However a possible source of loan capital funneling (1) out of the U. S. Small Business Administration and (2) through private lenders will soon be available for ozoners.

Industry Needs Green Thumb To Make Little Situations Flourish; Kirsch Raps Goldwyn & Justice

By JACK PITMAN

Chicago, Oct. 14.

It's doubtful the Allied States Assn. convention winding here tomorrow (Wed.) needed someone to give it a "fighting tone." Present downbeat biz of independent exhibs, was assurance enough of the meeting's tenor. All the same, confab keynoter Jack Kirsch, a former head of the group, gave what came close, at least, to a "Harry Truman Special." In his own "give-'em-hell" way, Kirsch:

(1) Challenged the big distributors' theory that fewer theatres will bring back prosperity by asserting that the industry "cannot survive half sick and half well";

(2) Blamed the Attorney-General in Washington for flabby enforcement of the consent decrees;

(3) Urged restoration of the indie theatres as the only way to save the industry.

Citing Sam Goldwyn as an apostle of the prune-the-rose-bush doctrine, Kirsch observed that second to the possible selloff of post-'48 features to tv, "the greatest menace to our business is the attitude . . . in high places that there should be fewer pictures shown in fewer theatres." This notion holds that the economics of picture-making and distribution nowadays are dictating such reorientation. Cinch result would be longer firstrun dates and more roadshowing—what Kirsch calls a "tightly restricted method of marketing pictures," and a plan that naturally appeals to the large theatre circuits.

Recalls '10 C's' Complaint

Keynoter illustrated by reprising the Allied-sparked rumpus over the marketing of Paramount's "Ten Commandments." The exhibitors' organization has been most vocal in claiming the larger circuit houses were favored on sub-runs of the pic. Though he didn't name Balaban & Katz (Chi area's largest chain) overtly, he noted that "10 C's" first outlying engagement here was limited to five of 50 eligible situations—and all five were B&K houses.

What of the charge that little indies have no beef in view of the seemingly paltry rentals they pay? A specious coverup, Kirsch indicated, because rentals "must be judged in the light of selling policies and practices which have a depressing effect on the (indie) theatres . . ." The point: low rentals are indivisible from stale product. Let the majors adhere to the letter and spirit of the Paramount decrees in the matter of

Allied Awaits Skouras

Chicago, Oct. 14.

Top attraction at Allied States Assn. Morrison Hotel convention is 20th-Fox prez Spyros Skouras, set to address the delegates tomorrow (Wed.) under the prosaic title, "How to Improve Our Business."

There was no hint of the talk's content, confab chairman and keynoter Jack Kirsch replying to queries that even he didn't know. Kirsch, however, labeled it "an important message," adding:

"He (Skouras) does not have a scatter-gun mind and we may be sure that he is planning to say something worth while. Possibly he will advocate some form of nation-wide business-building plan that will benefit all kinds of theatres . . ."

Sub-Teens Appeal In Continental's 8-Feature Cycle

The fist children's film series, called "Adventure," has been packaged by Continental Distributing and will be offered to U.S. theatres after the first of the year.

Series, aimed at the sub-teens (ages 8-12), will consist of eight full-length features, each accompanied by a serial and U.S.-made shorts. Pictures come from abroad, primarily from the Children's Film Foundation in Britain which has a full library of children's films. Walter Reade Jr., prez of Continental, has taken an option on all of these pictures.

Oscar Morgan, formerly shorts subject and newsreel sales chief for Paramount, will be in charge of selling the series, which has been put together with the active cooperation of Mrs. Marjorie M. Dawson, formerly community relations director for the Motion Picture Assn. of America, and lately an official State Dept. observer at the Children's Film Festival in Brussels.

The films in the "Adventure" series have been tested to make certain peaks of action and offer

Dallas, Oct. 14,

Rialto, on theatre row, reopened Friday (10) under new operation — a partnership of Bill Martin, Luther York and Charley Wolf. Daily triple-feature policy will include a western, a mystery or science-fiction film and a dramatic feature, but all will be repeats.

Filmer was a Trans-Texas Theatre house until Robert Hartgrove, owner of Twin Hi-Ways Drive-In here, took over operation last spring. He closed the house Sunday (5). Hartgrove also recently closed his film distribution outlet, Exhibitor Pictures, on film row.

Hoare: Lion Will N.Y.-Rep Others; Bromhead In U.S.

New U. S. office of British Lion-International eventually will seek to represent British producers other than those producing for and releasing through British Lion, Victor Hoare, managing director of Lion-International, revealed in N.Y. last week. Hoare is in the States to introduce Michael Bromhead, L-I's new U. S. rep, to the trade.

"We'll certainly be open for that sort of representation, but not before we make sure that we can do a good job for ourselves," Hoare said. In the past, he had covered the States by making several trips a year to N. Y. to sell the new releases. "We now realize that we need a permanent representative," he commented. "This business of coming over for a few days, and having to sell under pressure is no good."

Bromhead, who is on the British Lion board, said he'd have about a dozen pictures available. Plan is to withhold the television rights wherever possible. Among the titles Bromhead will seek to place in distribution are "Virgin Island," with Sidney Poitier and John Cassavetes; "Behind the Mask," a hospital picture; "The Man Upstairs," and following these — "Honeymoon," a Michael Powell production shot in Spain and "Carlton Brown of the EFA (Foreign Office)." There'll be two more after that.

Lion-International's business abroad is up 10% over 1957, Hoare reported. "We're very optimistic," he said. "If we weren't, we wouldn't have spent £400,000 on new studios." One of Bromhead's duties in the States will be

Worldwide Rental Guess: $500-Mil

"I don't have the specific figures," said an officer of a major picture corporation, but it's a fair guess that the principal distributors are grossing about $500,000,000 in annual worldwide rentals."

Rentals on the overall amount to approximately 25% of the total boxoffice gross. Latter therefore is put at $2,000,000,000. This is money coming in only from American pictures and relates to the product of seven companies.

Exec now comes to his point: "While many individual pictures are now being talked about, the public has lost sight of the scope of the industry itself."

The spokesman said he found many of his non-industry associates amazed to head of the figures he offers. "They had picked up the impression that the Yank film trade was dwindling into sort of a fiscal obscurity. And what's obscure about $2,000,000,000?"

ILLINOIS: A CRITICS' SAHARA

Zinsser Lights Fuse on Critics' Issue

The explosive issue of the N.Y. metropolitan reviewers' tender relations with the major film companies is given its first public (as against trade, that is to say, in VARIETY) airing by William K. Zinsser, former film critic of the N.Y. Herald Tribune, in an article due out this week in Esquire Magazine.

The piece lays it out in cold type the day of the "independent" film reveiwer in N.Y. newspapers has virtually passed, a result of an economic situation in which honest opinion must increasingly bow to the advertising dollar. There are few heroes in Zinsser's story.

Zinsser implies not only that he left the job (to become a Trib editorial writer) while the leaving was still good, i.e. before being either pushed out or forced to "soften" his writeups, but he also has some pithy comments re a critic's value to his paper. Quote:

"A critic is useful—to his readers and to the art form that he is reviewing—only if he has standards. If he praises every picture, his readers quickly realize that his reviews are meaningless, and they stop reading. Then the studios stop advertising—for why advertise if reader interest has been killed off? Thus both the newspaper business and the movie business lose."

The Esquire piece actually is taken from the last chapter of Zinsser's upcoming book, "Seen Any Good Movies Lately?," which Doubleday will publish in December. Though Zinsser has always protested that he left the reviewing job of his own volition, and wasn't pushed out by pressure from any film company, Broadway interpreted it's own way the fact that he's been replaced in the job by Paul V. Beckley, who leans backwards not to be "harsh." Trib film criticism now is matched in kindness only by the N.Y. Daily News.

Justin Gilbert on Spot

The Zinsser article appears at a time when the general subject of the critic's relations with the ad-pub heads is once again highlighted by an incident involving Justin Gilbert of the N.Y. Mirror and 20th-Fox's ad-pub v.p. Charles Einfeld. Friction evolves around Gilbert's review of 20th's "The Hunters." Claiming that Gilbert sloughed it off, Einfeld cabled Mirror publisher Charles McCabe, then in Rome, to express his "shocked regret" over the "shabby dismissal" of the film in the Mirror. He called Gilbert's treatment "insulting" and added that it was "unlike the long honorable Hearst newspaper tradition to ignore such a patriotic effort in the public interest." The amount of advertising 20th had done for "The Hunters" in the Mirror was mentioned.

Gilbert may develop into a "cause celebre" if today's (15) meeting of the N.Y. Film Critics Circle to mull over the topic of film company pressure brings action. Bolder than most of the critics themselves, Einfeld said last week he'd be "delighted" to discuss the whole question publicly. "I've got the same right as anybody else, if anything more so, to complain if my company is unfairly damaged," he maintained.

In his article, Zinsser traces the reasons— (a) sluggish film business and (b) a shaky newspaper business that have combined in creating a closer tie between ads and reviews. "By all the rules of journalism, there should be no relation between advertising lineage and editorial content," he writes. "And yet it is generally assumed, in New York motion picture circles, that a movie studio can soften an adverse review—in advance—by bringing pressure on a newspaper. This assumption is more correct than anyone will admit."

There is good reason to believe that the studios over the past 10 or 15 years have managed to get several critics fired, Zinsser opines, although specifying that this hasn't happened on his own paper, the N.Y. Herald Tribune. And yet, the departure of the much-admired Otis Guernsey from the film critic's post at the Trib has never been adequately "explained," and it is known that a good deal of pressure was brought to bear on Zinsser himself. The roof really fell in on him when he panned "South Pacific" and "A Farewell to Arms."

Apparently Zinsser saw the handwriting on the wall. "As the fortunes of the movie industry began to sag alarmingly, I could see that the sands were shifting (at the Tribune), and I asked for my release," he says. It appeared obvious to him that, with Hollywood due to duplicate the big spectacle type films which he found worthless. his situation would become increasingly precarious.

Zinsser notes that "bravery in the face of movie companies can be very expensive, and it is hardly appreciated at all by the general public. Even the iciest movie critic cannot forget that the pressure is always on. Bosley Crowther (of the N.Y. Times) has taken many public lashings from the movie industry. These blasts, appearing in trade papers and magazines, have even tried to discredit Crowther with innuendoes about his personal life and political views."

One of the film trade dailies in N.Y. last week ran a listing of the "Old Man and the Sea" reviews, heading it, 'Times' Review Rebutted." However, in the story it said that "The metropolitan critics were strongly and evenly divided, pro and con. Some of the critics, the trade noted, appeared to go out of their way to register an adverse reaction." Though Crowther's review was the strongest, the generally uncritical Daily News gave the picture only three stars ("A Certain Smile" rated four) and the Mirror and the Journal-American also voiced reservations.

The companies heretofore centered their fire on Crowther who on many pictures, specifically the type of "Old Man and the Sea," has the widest influence and is most often quoted by other critics around the country.

Tricks of the Trade

The position of the film execs re the critics is largely one of "What have you done for me lately?" Comment is voiced frequently that the scribes make their living off the business, therefore are part of it and should "help" it via sympathetic comments. Zinsser's article quotes Archer Winston, the critic of the N.Y. Post, thusly:

"There are many ways of neutralizing, softening and counteracting the opinions of movie critics, and the movie companies know them all, and use them whenever it seems advantageous to do so. I don't blame them, though I think they're shortsighted in trying to reduce the New York movie critics to the status of unpaid press agents. I do blame those, including myself, who have failed to bring to public attention every slightest indication that there is something rotten in the state of New York City movie reviewing in the daily papers."

Maintaining that good criticism is a constructive force, Zinsser says he regrets that "movie criticism is losing its fiber. Under present conditions, as the industry slides into its last decline, no good critic can be truly at ease. This discomfort of the job dwarfs all the others." And he concludes: "I don't think that, since the movie industry is dying, the critic is duty bound to keep it alive with nice words."

ONLY TWO IN STATE 'SERIOUS'

Chicago, Oct. 14.

Newspapers in the sticks don't so much nix pix as they ignore them in terms of intellectual consideration. Reviews, let alone serious criticism, are far and few between.

That's how it tallies from a check of midwest gazettes, whose smalltown-to-rural readership has at the most, generally, only a puff precis of the new pictures to help guide its ticket-buying. VARIETY's sampling indicates this status will continue quo.

Situation, of course, is double-edged for exhibitors and distributors. Albeit classy product would likely benefit at the boxoffice from presumably a favorable audit, run-of-the-mill features, especially if they lack star value or other recognizable bait, could be expected to suffer some if the reviewer carped. As it stands, exhibs—and their customers—take a kind of "pot luck," particularly in towns where reviews are verboten entirely.

All communities sampled are in Illinois, and only two sheets covered run critiques on a regular basis, and then with insufficient frequency to keep up with the flow of new pictures into their respective towns. An example is the Elgin Courier-News, which may carry one review a week, plucking it off the Copley chain wire as written by San Diego-based Ed Martin.

Rockford, where the morning Star and the evening Register-Republic are jointly owned, only the former carries a regular staff review, and only in the Sunday editions. Sister gazette, it's explained, usually needs a news peg if it bothers at all, and cites "The Hunters" (20th), which was treated only because a local man had served in the squadron depicted in the film.

Joliet, Elgin, Etc

As if to demonstrate a certain autonomy, Joliet Herald-News, also part of the Copley chain, skips reviews altogether, notwithstanding fact the town has four firstrun theatres. The daily has also cut back (one of the few to do so) its space allocation for films generally, said to have resulted over a quarrel on disproportionate coverage as between the Great States houses and the independent Mode theatre. "We were," says managing editor Dan Albrecht, "unable to satisfy either one."

Elgin, it's to be noted, may have some basis for resisting celluloids, inasmuch as the town (with 48,000) has but one hardtop in operation. (Great States circuit's bid to reopen the Grove, divested from the chain under the government consent decree, is pending before the Justice Dept.)

There's a "no review" policy at the News-Sun in Waukegan, where three firstruns vie, and in the Champaign-Urbana area, where the Courier favors live local productions, usually via the U. of Illinois. One staffer explains, "There's just an opposition policy on the paper toward it (pic reviews)." Attitude, he hints, probably stems from the notion that the community has a high education level because of the university, the reasoning being that those about who care would more readily take their film cues from such sources as the New Yorker, Time and the N. Y. Times.

The Star in Peoria, state's second largest city, will allot space to only "outstanding pictures," presumably deciding which ones so rate by arbitrary criteria.

What little reviewing there is (of local origin), the sampling found, is handled by an editorial staffer, and not a space salesman wearing two hats, a situation not uncommon in American journalism.

Managements were also queried on amount of space granted to news of pictures since the advent of network tv in 1948, with result

Peck Denies 'Stranding' Prop Man; Temporarily Hired, Fully Compensated

Gregory Peck this week said he had never had a written agreement with property master Samuel J. Martin calling for the latter's employment on "Thieves Market," which Peck planned to produce in Spain last year.

Peck, via his attorney, Allen E. Susman, maintained that Martin had told him that he was in the process of selling his home and moving to Europe "to live there for an extended period." In this connection, he asked Peck for a job as a prop man on "Thieves Market." When Martin and his wife got to Europe, he was put to work on a week to week basis, this employment being terminated when the picture was cancelled.

The Peck letter called "untrue" a story in last week's VARIETY (Oct. 8) reporting a suit Martin has filed against the actor-producer in N.Y. Supreme Court. Martin says he had an greeement with Peck, that both he and his wife fell sick in Madrid and that Martin was asked to and did sign a release. Story also quoted Mrs. Martin.

Return Passage

"Although Mr. Martin was ill during much of the time he was employed, Mr. Martin was nonetheless paid his salary and certain of his medical bills were also paid during that period," Susman's letter said. "Following cancellation of the picture, the Martins apparently decided, for reasons best known to themselves, to give up their intentions to live in Europe. They then requested Mr. Peck to pay their passage back to the United States. Although under no obligation to do so, Mr. Peck was willing to advance two return tickets to them by way of a loan, but by the time the Martins were contacted by Mr. Peck's representative they had already obtained return tickets from some other source."

Statement in the previous story that no one came to see the Martins (while sick) "is not borne out by the facts," Peck attorney stated. "The Martins were visited by Mr. Adre, the production manager for Melville Productions, Inc., the producing company. Mr. Peck's representative had great difficulty at one point in locating the Martins who had left Spain on their own without leaving word as to where they might be found. They were ultimately located in Zurich, Switzerland."

HOLDEN WINS ROUND VERSUS PARAMOUNT

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

William Holden, currently involved in a contractual dispute with Paramount, is free to make a picture for another company. This was decided by Judge Leon R. Yankwich in Federal Court here.

Within the framework of its court row with Holden, Par sought an injunction preventing the actor from appearing in "The Horse Soldiers" for the Mirisch-Batjac-United Artists interests. To rule on the Par motion for the injunction would mean a ruling on the merits of the basic case, said Yankwich, in deciding for Holden.

Par claims to have the actor under contract for six pictures in seven years. Holden contends the film company lost its preemptive rights for his services.

Won't Rule on Blue Law

Washington, Oct. 14.

Again the U.S. Supreme Court has sidestepped adjudication of the constitutional aspects of old blue laws.

Case involved the State-Line Drive-In of Antrim County, which defied the Sabbath ban on theatre screenings in Pennsylvania on the argument that films were regularly exhibited on television channels in homes.

Call Off 'Official Party'; Mexican Guests on Own Save for Linda Cristal

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

No official delegation is representing Hollywood at Mexican Film Festival now under way in Mexico City. Assn. of Motion Picture Producers abandoned its plans to send a group of personalities there when learning Mexican officials had contacted Hollywood agent Johnny Maschio to round up some players for event.

AMPP however, did last Friday (10) dispatch Linda Cristal to Mexico City and several invitees to fete, via Maschio, are going. Personalities proceed "as individuals, per personal invitations," with exception, of Miss Cristal.

COPPEL SCREENPLAYS 'HELLER'

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Paramount has signed Alec Coppel to screenplay "Heller With A Gun," for producer Marcel Girosi.

George Cukor is directing film which will roll in December. Coppel was repped by H. N. Swanson agency in the negotiations.

Open Earlier To Test Blue Law

Philadelphia, Oct. 14.

Philadelphia first-runs and nabes staged a Sabbath revolt (12) against Pennsylvania blue laws by opening their boxoffices an hour earlier than the prescribed time. Under State law, film houses are to be closed from Saturday midnight until 2 p.m. Sunday.

The local film house operators kicked over the traces in a sizable bloc Sunday (12), some of the first-runs unlocking the doors as early at 12:45 p.m. The move, which was sparked by indie chain owner William Goldman, was confined to the corporate limits of Philadelphia.

This led to reports that Goldman had been given the green light by a high city official. He refused to comment on this, but countered: "Baseball and everybody else does it, why shouldn't the film theatres?"

Film theatre operators throughout the city were notified of proposed advance in time in a letter sent out by Lester Krieger, executive secretary of the Pennsylvania Assn. of the Amusement Industries.

Benjamin Fronts Appeal

Film industry execs, at a meeting in New York last week, set the plans for the annual United Jewish Appeal campaign for 1958, beginning with a luncheon Nov. 12 at New York's Sheraton-Astor Hotel honoring Robert S. Benjamin, United Artists board chairman.

Amusement division is participating in campaign to raise $5,600,000 to support its program for promoting better group relations.

"The Last Hurrah" is the "this ain't Jim Curley" story, from Edwin O'Connor's novel, which John Ford and Spencer Tracy have transmuted to the screen in slick style destined for good grosses. The star has made the most of the meaty role of the shrewd politician of the "dominantly Irish-American" metropolis in New England (unmistakably Boston but not Boston) and producer-director Ford has likewise contributed a top professional job.

The two-hour running length is somewhat overboard but Tracy's characterization of the resourceful, old-line politician-mayor has such consummate depth that it sustains the interest practically all the way. A little editing might have helped but the canvas is rich and the political machinations replete.

The graft and coercion is made to appear chiefly as an obbligato to Tracy's do-gooding for the poor wards, and if the wardheelers (dominantly Irish although Ricardo Cortez as Sam Weinberg accounts for another segment of the votes) are crude in their delivery of the ballots, Tracy's quasi-benevolence and impatience with the too proper Bostonians, in their Plymouth Club retreats, more than vitiate the brasher aspects.

Tracy's resourcefulness in besting the stuffy bankers who nixed a loan for a much needed low-rent housing development; his foiling of the profiteering undertaker when a constituent is buried (the wake is transformed into a political rally); the passionate loyalty of his political devotees; the rivalry between the "respectable" elements in combating the direct-approach tactics of the Irish-American politicos; the pride in defeat when the "reform" candidate bests Tracy at the polls; his verve even on his deathbed, as he sends for his old cronies; the opposition men-of-the-cloth supporting the rival political candidates for the mayoralty; and Tracy's own "last hurrah" as he tells off the fatuous banker (Willis Bouchey)—with a parting "like hell I would!"—in reviewing his gaudy career, make for a series of memorable scenes.

Ford's chore wasn't easy; he has too much plot material to dovetail and correlate but the end-result is thoroughly acceptable.

The cast is a roster of stalwarts in the main. Jeffrey Hunter is first-billed, in the support. He is the shrewd mayor's favored nephew who, despite his ties to the opposition sheet, perceives the old codger's humaneness. He is a sympathetic and attractive juvenile who, however, doesn't always match up histrionically against the other prime supporting players, all old pros. These include Pat O'Brien, James Gleason, Edward Brophy and Ricardo Cortez as Tracy's faithfuls; or Basil Rathbone, John Carradine, Carleton Young as the bankers; and others like Basil Ruysdael, Donald Crisp (both as clerics), Frank Albertson, Wallace Ford, Frank McHugh and others.

This is not a "woman's picture" and the femme interest is incidental. There are a couple of missouts also as regards Tracy's playboy-son and the scenes with the babes, and that goes also for the scene of the new candidate and his wife fluffing their way through an "at-home interview" scene for benefit of the tv cameras. But it holds the interest and, coming in a political year, has a neo-topical value.

The technical credits are topnotch; Charles Lawton Jr.'s low-key black-and-white lensing is well-attuned to the theme. But primarily its Tracy's picture. Amidst a bunch of old pros he is head-and-shoulders above them in his thespic assignment. He makes his solo marquee stardom mean something beyond the billing. Abel.

Grip of the Strangler
(BRITISH)

Routine Boris Karloff horror pic which will slot into unambitious bills.

London, Oct. 7.

Eros (John Croydon) production and release. Stars Boris Karloff. Directed by Robert Day. Screenplay, Jan Read and John C. Cooper from original story by Jan Read. At Hammer Theatre, London. Running time, 80 MINS.

James Rankin	Boris Karloff
Kenneth McColl	Tim Turner
Cora Seth	Jean Kent
Pearl	Vera Day
Mrs. Rankin	Elizabeth Allen
Det. Burke	Anthony Dawson
Lily	Diane Aubrey
Hannah	Dorothy Gordon
Kate	Peggy Ann Clifford
2nd Governor	Leslie Perrins
Styles	Michael Atkinson
Police Surgeon	Desmond Roberts
Maid	Jessica Cairns
Medical Superintendent	Ray Russell
Superintendent of Guys	Derek Birch
1st Governor	Arthur Hall
Can Can Troupe Leader	John Elvin

Still trying to cash in on the current horror stakes comes this routine Boris Karloff murder pic. Dialog and screenplay make this okay as an unambitious supporter, but it is all too far-fetched to provide more than moderate entertainment.

Story has Karloff as a novelist investigating the 20-year-old case of "The Haymarket Strangler," who was hanged for murders involving strangling and slashing with a knife. Karloff suspects that the murders were actually done by the surgeon who conducted the post mortems on all the victims. Following through his inquiries, he discovers that his theory is right, but the payoff is that an insane Karloff turns out to be the criminal, which most students will find predictible. Further development is that Karloff has to commit several more murders before he can convince the police of his guilt.

With suitable horror makeup whenever killing, Karloff finds no difficulty in keeping to his usual talented form. He is less successful, however, as the gentle novelist. Vera Day, Elizabeth Allan, Anthony Dawson and Jean Kent lend competent support in this old-fashioned piece which has been directed by Robert Day with more force than subtlety. Period settings are adequate. Rich.

Muchachita De Valladolid
(Girl From Valladolid)
(SPANISH-COLOR)

Madrid, Sept. 30.

Universal Films Espana release of a Cinematograficas DIA production. Directed by Luis Amadori. Screenplay by Luis Marquina and Luis Amadori from Calvo Sotelo's comedy of the same name. Stars Alberto Closas, Analia Gade and Lina Rosales; features Alfredo Mayo, Lopez Vazquez and Vicky Lagos. Camera (Eastmancolor), Jose Aguayo; art director, Enrique Alarcon; music by Cristobal Halffter. Filmed at Chamartin Studios. At Coliseum, Madrid. Running time, 95 MINS.

Patricio	Alberto Closas
Mereedes	Analia Gade
Alexandra Aymat	Lina Rosales
Canciller	Alfredo Mayo
Secretary	Lopez Vazquez
Erika	Vicky Lagos

Calvo Sotelo's diverting and successful stageplay, short on situations and long on character studies, topical satire and smart dialogue, resists screen adaptation. Director Luis Amadori and producer-writer Luis Marquina only partially succeed.

Added prologue footage focusses mainly on Valladolid's twin claims to fame—its Holy week procession and collection of polychromatic sculpture, but contributes little film value to basic stage material.

Naive provincial newlywed Analia Gade discovers that strait-laced virtue is not easily reconciled with the sophisticated unrestraint of her ambitious diplomatic spouse, Alberto Closas. When she fully awakens to the behind-the-scenes role of an attractive dame in foreign affairs, she shakes the straw from her hair and lands her nettled husband the oil deal he had been ardently soliciting from the chancellor's wife, Lina Rosales.

Closas is smooth but his stage performance had more ease and charm. Argentine's Gade is fine only in the deprovincialized portion of her role, because that's the way she stacked. Others are creditable, including director Amadori and technical departments.

Universal should do well with this fairly amusing comedy in Spain. Popular in South America, cast should help film in Spanish-language market. Werb.

The Tunnel of Love
(CINESCOPE)

Racy, risque filmisation of legit hit. Top b.o. forecast.

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Metro release of Joseph Fields production. Stars Doris Day, Richard Widmark; co-stars Gig Young, Gia Scala; features Elisabeth Fraser, Elizabeth Wilson. Produced by Fields and Martin Melcher. Directed by Gene Kelly. Screenplay by Joseph Fields; from the stage play by Fields and Peter De Vries; based on the novel by Vries; camera, Robert Bronner; McSweeney Jr. Previewed at the Westwood Village Theatre, Sept. 19, '58. Running time, 98 MINS.

Isolde Poole	Doris Day
Augie Poole	Richard Widmark
Dick Pepper	Gig Young
Estelle Novick	Gia Scala
Alice Pepper	Elisabeth Fraser
Miss MacCracken	Elizabeth Wilson
Actress	Vikki Dougan
Escort	Doodles Weaver
Day Motel Man	Charles Wagenheim
Night Motel Man	Robert Williams
Themselves	The Esquire Trio

Exurbia is the current tag for the commuter country where "The Tunnel of Love" is located. Judging by the preoccupations of the principals in this Metro comedy, it may hereafter be referred to as Sexurbia. For this Joseph Fields production is ribald treatment.

The Broadway hit on which it is based has been transferred virtually intact to the screen. The screenplay makes a brief bow to motion picture morality with a last-minute switch ending, making the basis for most of the gags an elaborate misunderstanding. But by that time it doesn't make much difference.

"Tunnel of Love" may run into some censorship problems, but this is the only possible obstacle that could prevent it from hurtling to top boxoffice. Gene Kelly's direction, plus topflight performances by the cast headed by Doris Day and Richard Widmark, make it one of the year's funniest pictures.

Although the locale and the social status of the characters in "Tunnel" are pretty special, their situations are universal. Widmark is a would-be cartoonist for a New Yorker-type magazine, whose gags are good but whose drawings are not. He and his wife, Miss Day, want a child and cannot catch. They live in a remodeled barn (naturally) adjacent to the home of their best friends, Gig Young and Elisabeth Fraser, whom they envy in many ways. Young is an editor of the magazine Widmark aspires to crack, and as a parent, Young adds to his and Miss Fraser's brood as regularly as the seasons. Widmark and Miss Day are planning to adopt a baby. Not only do they want the foster child, there is hope (and considerable accompanying comment) that its adoption may work for them as it has for other childless couples and result in natural offspring.

Meantime, back at the barn, Young, whose homework has been stimulated by extracurricular activities, urges his system on Widmark. With this suggestion in the back of his mind, Widmark is visited by an adoption home investigator, Gia Scala. When he wakes up in a motel after a night on the town with her, he assumes the thought has been father to the deed in more ways than one. Just a little over nine months later, the adoption agency presents a baby to Miss Day and Widmark, and Widmark again assumes nature has taken its course. As the baby begins to look more and more like Widmark, others, including Miss Day, begin to get the same idea.

The only important change Fields has made in the screenplay, from the play by him and Peter DeVries (based on DeVries' book), is to explain at the very end that the child is not actually Widmark's. As noted, at this point it doesn't make much difference. While some aspects of the special hot house culture indigenous to the Westport locale may be lost on the citizens of Brooklyn and Dallas, no one, anywhere, could miss the references to Dr. Spock and fever charts, visits to the family doctor, and the counting of months and the result to be expected after nine of them.

It should be emphasized that there is nothing in bad taste about any of this. It is handled with lightness and without a snickering leer at any time.

Miss Day and Widmark make a fine comedy team, working as smoothly as if they had been trading gags for years. Despite the broad nature of the comedy, they also achieve a pleasant romantic effect in which married love is made to seem exceptionally felicitous. They are ably abetted by Gig Young, one of the greatest fly-catchers in current operation, and Gia Scala, who displays a nice and unexpected gift for comedy. Elisabeth Fraser, as the almost perpetually pregnant neighbor, shows a good, off-hand flair for these proceedings, and Elizabeth Wilson, as an outraged social workers, is a standout in a brief appearance.

This is the first time Gene Kelly has operated entirely behind the camera, and he emerges as an inventive and capable comedy director. The timing, emphasis and pacing achieve a maximum return on both comedy and romantic aspects.

Robert Bronner's photography is well-lit and sharp. Backgrounds are handsomely and accurately suggested in the art direction by William A. Horning and Randall Duell, and in set decoration by Henry Grace and Robert Priestley. Helen Rose makes an unobtrusive contribution with dresses for Miss Day and Miss Scala. Wesley C. Miller's sound is slick and editing by John McSweeney Jr. prevents any loss of fun or lag in the proceedings.

There are two songs used in the production, a title tune sung by Miss Day as part of the opening titles, and a novelty, "Run Away, Skidaddle Skidoo," casually introduced in a party sequence, that are not only good pop tunes but have the unusual merit of fitting the structure of a non-musical comedy. Patty Fisher and Bob Roberts did the first, and Ruth Roberts and Bill Katz the second. Powe.

The Trollenberg Terror
(BRITISH)

Exciting science-fiction film with genuine horror thrills; solid b.o. proposition.

London, Oct. 7.

Eros (Robert S. Baker-Monty Berman) production and release. Stars Forrest Tucker. Directed by Quentin Lawrence. Screenplay, Jimmy Sangster from television serial by Peter Key; camera, Monty Berman; music, Stanley Black; editor, Henry Richardson. At Hammer Theatre, London. Running time, 85 MINS.

Alan Brooke	Forrest Tucker
Philip Truscott	Laurence Payne
Anne Pilgrim	Janet Munro
Sarah Pilgrim	Jennifer Jayne
Crevett	Warren Mitchell
Klein	Frederick Schiller
Dewhurst	Stuart Saunders
Brett	Andrew Faulds
Hans	Colin Douglas
Wilde	Derek Sydney
Villagers	Richard Golding, George Herbert, Anne Sharp
Child	Caroline Glazer
Pilot	Garard Green

"The Trollenberg Terror" is a likely candidate for big b.o. honors in the science-fiction pic realm. Based on a successful tv serial by Peter Key, it has had an "X" certificate slapped on it by the censor. Eliminates the under-16's from seeing it, but will give a fillip to the takings. Most U.K. managers will be happy to have "Trollenberg" on a suitable bill.

Like those of most science-fiction films, the story may seem far-fetched to the layman but, as H. G. Wells proved way back, the imagination of authors is often only a few jumps ahead of actual scientific fact. The yarn concerns a creature from outer space secreted in a radio-active cloud on the mountain of Trollenberg in Switzerland. The mysterious disappearance of various climbers brings Forrest Tucker to the scene as a science investigator for UNO. He and a professor at the local observatory set out to solve the problem.

During investigations, two headless corpses are discovered and a couple of ordinary citizens go berserk and turn killer. Main object of the two is Janet Munro who is one of a sister mind-reading act and obviously presents a threat to the sinister visitor. Climax comes when the villagers are besieged in the observatory as the cloud draws nearer and nearer. It is discovered scientifically that the creature can exist only in extreme cold and it is eventually destroyed by fire bombs dropped from a plane.

The tension of this well-made and gripping thriller comes not so much from seeing the creature in the final stages, which turns out to be a huge, repellent octopus-like mass, but from the eeriness of the atmosphere and doubt about when the cloud will strike. Tucker's bewilderment and that of his henchmen accentuate the air of death and disaster.

Jimmy Sangster's taut screenplay extracts the most from the situations and is helped by strong, resourceful acting from a solid cast. Tucker tackles the problem with commendable lack of histrionics and Miss Munro adds considerably to the film's interest with an excellent portrayal of the girl whose mental telepathy threatens the creature's activities and draws her into danger. Laurence Payne, as a newspaperman; Jennifer Jayne, as Miss Munro's distraught elder sister; Warren Mitchell, the professor, and Andrew Faulds and Colin Douglas, as two of the monster's victims, also give the stars full backing.

Stanley Black's music is appropriately sinister while Monty Berman's camerawork and the special effects department's contribution are extremely effective. This is a better-than-most horror film which, despite its extravagant play upon the imagination, retains a ring air of plausibility. Rich.

Home Before Dark

Romantic melodrama with mental illness theme. Absorbing, moving pic, highlighted by Jean Simmons' performance.

Hollywood, Oct. 3.

Warner Bros. release of Mervyn LeRoy production. Stars Jean Simmons, Dan O'Herlihy, Rhonda Fleming, Efrem Zimbalist Jr. Directed by Mervyn LeRoy. Screenplay, Eileen and Robert Bassing; from the novel by Eileen Bassing; camera, Joseph F. Biroc; music supervisor, Ray Heindorf; editor, Philip W. Anderson. Previewed at the studio, Oct. 3, '58. Running time, 137 MINS.

Charlotte Bronn	Jean Simmons
Arnold Bronn	Dan O'Herlihy
Joan Carlisle	Rhonda Fleming
Jake Diamond	Efrem Zimbalist Jr.
Inez Winthrop	Mabel Albertson
Hamilton Gregory	Steve Dunne
Frances Barrett	Joan Weldon
Cathy Bergner	Joanna Barnes
Mattie	Kathryn Card
Hazel Evans	Marjorie Bennett
Malcolm Southey	Johnstone White
Mrs. Hathaway	Eleanor Audley

"Home Before Dark" is the kind of film that once was classified—perhaps smugly—as a woman's picture, and it will certainly find its widest appeal and acceptance in female audiences. It should give the Kleenex a vigorous workout. Based on one woman's battle to regain her slipping sanity, it is a romantic melodrama of considerable power and imprint. Mervyn LeRoy's production for Warner Bros. is exceptionally well cast and staged, and his direction wisely throws the picture to Jean Simmons, who lights almost every frame with uncommon artistry.

The screenplay by Eileen and Robert Bassing, based on Mrs. Bassing's novel of the same name, sometimes seems rather skimpy in its character motivation. It is also difficult at times to understand the mental tone of the mentally ill heroine, played by Miss Simmons. But these are necessarily shadowy areas, anyway, and the test is that while the tale is unfolding it is made so gripping that factual discrepancies are relatively unimportant.

Miss Simmons is the wife of Dan O'Herlihy, who has ceased to love her before mental breakdown and has not changed his attitude on her recovery. Living in their home, to which she returns on her release from hospitalization, are her stepmother, Mabel Albertson, and her stepsister, Rhonda Fleming. They are masterful females who could drive anyone to the edge of madness with their insistence on managing even the smallest details of Miss Simmons' life. They are also allied, none too subtly, with her husband and against her. It was Miss Simmons' suspicion of a romance between O'Herlihy and Miss Fleming that helped crack her fragile grasp on sanity. Now partially cured, she wonders if her suspicion was the fragment of a disintegrating mind or a reality.

Her only real ally in the house is a stranger, Efrem Zimbalist Jr., who is also an alien in the setting of the inbred New England college community. Zimbalist is the only Jewish member of the faculty, and ostensibly a protege of O'Herlihy's. O'Herlihy is the kind of liberal who favors minority groups in principle but doesn't care much for their individual members; they're always the "wrong kind." Miss Simmons and Zimbalist are both on sufferance; she is too weak to know how to fight it, he is too smart and tough to be grateful about it. Their eventual romance ends the picture on a hopeful note.

There is meat here and pretty strong stuff. It is tastefully and soundly handled. Neither in the Bassings' screenplay nor in LeRoy's direction are the cards stacked against the odious family and the community. Miss Fleming and Miss Albertson can't be blamed; they are too shallow to expect any perception of them. O'Herlihy is not shallow, but he is weak. In refusing to acknowledge his vacillation, he shifts it to his wife and almost destroys her. By suggesting his knowledge of what he is doing, against his will, O'Herlihy avoids seeming too heavy and arouses in the end only a scornful pity.

The whole picture is seen from Miss Simmons's viewpoint, which means she is "on" virtually the whole time. It is a long picture, two hours and a quarter, and there is little to relieve the attention to individuals. Miss Simmons must display unusual versatility to maintain interest and sympathy and she does. Her voice is a vibrant instrument, used with thoughtful articulation and placement, the only vital part of her at times—her beauty effectively drabbed by a dowdy gray wig—the only thing youthful and romantic. This is no Ophelia, and Miss Simmons must register with a quiet intensity rather than more showy histrionics, which she does.

Miss Fleming uses her good looks to make her brainlessly vicious character even more effective than it would be in the hands of an ordinary actress. Zimbalist ad-

LOEW'S: IT'S SLANT OR SQUINT

BOTH CAMPS GO 'PSYCHOLOGICAL'

Sources linked with Louis Green and Jerome Newman (in the current hassle with Loew's president Joseph R. Vogel) repeated this week that the G-N group is determined to keep the company in operation, not liquidate. And they rapped N. Y. circuit operator Harry Brandt anent the latter's charge that they had liquidation in mind.

"He has never talked to any of us about our plans, so how can he make such an allegation—such a false allegation?" they asked.

Green and Newman made a further point, this about the support they would receive in the event of a proxy fight. While insisting they hope to avert any kind of proxy row, they declared that they already have had assurances of at least some exhibitor support.

This came as an answer to Brandt's assertion that the entire picture industry is behind Vogel.

"Just as all of Wall Street is not likely to vote for us, it's a certainty that all exhibitors are not in support of our opposition," was the rebuttal. Source on the G-N side said they already have had conferences with "representatives" of important theatre interests and received assurances of backing.

Main point underscored, however, centers on Vogel's personal position. G-N partisans say it's "baffling" that Vogel, having been a theatreman all of his business career, should "now want to run a picture studio." To this they add: "It's like the comedian who wanted to play Hamlet."

It was made obvious that some changes will be made if the G-N group succeeds in its ambition to spin off the Culver City lot, with the theatre end emerging as the "parent" organization. (In opposition, Vogel wants the domestic theatres spun off.)

"The only liquidation we have in mind involves the unconscionable overhead within the organization," said the G-N source. He specifically said he was referring to some high-salaried executives.

Matter of division of the corporation is to be taken up by the board at a New York meeting Oct. 29. Special committee already has voted in support of Vogel but this group, according to the G-N side, was "loaded" with Vogel men.

Columbia Films' Loss: $1,150,000

Columbia Pictures yesterday (Tues.) reported an operations loss of $1,150,000 for the year ended last June 28, compared with earnings of $2,253,000 for the previous year.

Additionally, the company made special writeoffs of $3,837,000. These represent stories, scripts and other production projects which have been abandoned.

Unusual heavy writeoff indicates that the new management under president Abe Schneider and production chief Samuel Briskin wants to get off to a fresh start in this year, i.e., freeing themselves of loss items which otherwise would remain on the books.

Speed-Feed Weitman

Albany, Oct. 14.

Norman Weitman, recently transferred by Universal from Albany to Cleveland as manager, will be given a farewell dinner in the Empire Room of the Sheraton-Ten Eyck Hotel Wednesday night (15).

He's been with the company since 1946, served as Albany manager for almost four years. In the final months, after U closed its local exchange, he was sole representative here. Ernie Ziegler replaced him.

About 70, including a number of out-of-towners, are expected to attend the dinner. Chairman is Clayton G. Pantages, 20th Century-Fox manager.

If Topping Quota, Staff In National's Districts Rack Up 5% of Excess

Los Angeles, Oct. 14.

National Theatres will divide 5% of amount by which each district exceeds its quota among theatre managers, district booker and district manager, under its newly-created "incentive" plan, in first-quarter drive (Oct.-Nov.-Dec.) under the new John B. Bertero administration.

No-limit sign is being tacked up to stimulate new activity by all personnel in building up additional revenue. In first time that chain has engaged in cutting personnel in on the profits, extra biz is expected to be at least 20% higher than last year's corresponding quarter, which was described as "poor," due to better product in sight. With better biz anticipated, take for district personnel is expected to reach a considerable figure.

Also new, exclusively for theatre managers, is a merchandise gift for each manager topping his quota, based on gross of last year's corresponding quarter. A trip to Hawaii for himself and wife goes to each top gross builder in each of NT's four divisions.

Company also will conduct its regular Booker-of-the-Drive award and its District Manager's Week.

A Buffalo Depot For Oklahoma And Detroit?

With the Buffalo shipping depot now fully tenanted, the film companies' general sales managers have under study the possibility of extending the arrangement to Detroit and Oklahoma City.

With the exception of 20th-Fox and United Artists, all the remaining six distributors have merged their physical handling setups in Buffalo, sharing the costs on a co-op basis. Expectation is that the operation will seriously diminish handling costs in the Buffalo territory.

The companies have the choice of playing ball with National Film Carriers, which is continuously pitching to take over their distribution, or with National Screen Service, which has had similar notions. However, the distribs lean more to the do-it-yourself stance, though it may emerge that, in the long run, it'd be more economical for them to have someone else operate the depot.

The last company to move into the Buffalo center last week was Warner Bros. 20th retains its own setup, feeling that it can ship cheaper than anyone else. UA is handled by NFC.

Merger of backroom facilities is part and parcel of the general feeling that something must be done to bring down distribution costs. Closing of exchanges doesn't appear to hold the complete answer. Warners did that in Albany, and soon after reopened its offices there. One of the advantages cited in the merger of physical facilities is the fact that the labor force can be shifted to suit the needs of the moment.

% of Gross for Singing Song Over Main Credits

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Jimmie Rodgers will be the first singer ever to get a percentage of a film for merely singing the title song over the main credits.

The teenage favorite will receive 1% of the profits of "Seven Is For Sinners," indie film being produced by Malvin Wald and co-starring Dan Duryea and William Bishop. Rodgers will make his thesp bow later this year in Metro's "How Good Girls Get Married."

Chicago Peppy August

Chicago film biz was solid in midsummer, per Chi's 3% amusement tax for August which tallied to $98,612, some 10% ahead of the previous month.

Total amusement taxes for August came to $167,190, compared with $153,000 for July.

'Checking' Kills CBS Movie Quiz

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

CBS-TV's panel-quiz show on the motion picture industry, "The Movie Game," has been dropped from the network's planning boards because of the web's inability to clear the film clips needed for the show. The project had drawn warm support from the exploitation and ad-pub section of the Motion Picture Assn.

William Dozier, v.p. in charge of programming for CBS-TV here, admitted the network had been unable to secure the blanket waivers from the studios and craft guilds which its attorneys demanded. Studios and guilds maintained that the use to which the clips were to be put did not fall within the provisions of the trailer clauses in their contracts, and that in each instance CBS-TV would have had to negotiate individually with each actor, writer and director involved.

This would have been an impossible task, Dozier said, and the project was dropped. Dozier pointed out that the show, as constituted, would have been a fine promotion vehicle for the pic industry, but said the difficulties imposed were too great without studio and guild cooperation in the venture.

Show was to have starred Hedda Hopper and Charles Brackett as permanent panelists.

Georgia G.M. Assemblers Still Out; Hurts Theatres

Atlanta, Oct. 14.

Failure of General Motors workers in Atlanta area to go back to work is hurting theatre business hereabouts, especially drive-in trade. GM has a Chevrolet assembly plant as well as a big layout where they put together Buicks, Oldsmobiles and Pontiacs.

Signup by Detroit reps of huge motor car output failed to mollify workers hereabouts and negotiations to settle their differences have not met with much success to date.

Vogel, O'Brien Economy Prowl of Metro Plant; Ben Thau May Depart

Joseph R. Vogel, president of Loew's, and treasurer Robert O'Brien are on the Coast from the homeoffice this week for what's described in Gotham as further readjustments in studio operations.

Left uncertain is the future status of Benjamin Thau, studio administration v.p. Reports have been persistent that Thau, who recently sold out his block of 12,000 shares of the corporation's stock, (declining an explanation at the time) might sever connections with the company shortly.

Only 1 on Sked In Britain For 20th Financing

London, Oct. 14.

Twentieth Century-Fox, which, for the past couple of years has been one of the major producing outfits in Britain, may be suspending its film making activities over here in the near future. Although it has completed about eight or nine features this year, the company has only one advance commitment.

The solitary production on the sked is "Double Image," a filmization of a recent stage thriller by Roger Madougall and Ted Allan, which ran for a season at the Savoy Theatre.

According to industry insiders, 20th's decision to curtail production activities is a direct sequel to the recent reconciliation with the Rank Organization. During the few years in which the 20th product didn't play the Rank theatres, the company created a new chain which included independent circuits, such as Essoldo, Granada, Shipman and King, etc. It was considered necessary to have an inflow of British production for this releasing outlet in order that the theatres concerned would be able to satisfy their legal quota commitments.

Although the present arrangement is for a 50-50 split of the 20th output between Rank and the indies, there is seen to be an increasing move in favor of the Rank theatres; and if that policy is de-

VOGEL STICKS TO INTERPRETATION

Joseph R. Vogel, president of Loew's Inc., is sanguine that "by the end of the next fiscal year" (Aug. 30) the company will be big in the black. Downtowners still urge a spinoff and, as shareholders, feel that two parts of the company is worth more than the whole.

Meanwhile, the "inside" has it that Loew's concluded its 1958 fiscal year with a profit of only 1c. per share.

Countering Vogel's feeling that the studio is essential for future telefilm production (not counting the possibility of tollvision, if ever), that's okay with the Wall Streeters, say they, because "then we'll have two things running for us." This means the spinning off of the studio so that the theatre (real estate) company will not be saddled with the production overhead.

The Louis Green-Jerry Newman faction wants to know when dividends will be resumed (Vogel doesn't see it before "Ben Hur" hits the jackpot in 1960) and they are impatient with what they call "stalling for time." Admittedly, Vogel's current film product is coming through after an abortive start with what were considered to be also "good" pictures, but proved disappointing boxoffice (viz., "Les Girls," etc.).

Despite the incumbent management's claims that every phase of the Loew operation has not lost money ("including the studio"), the Green-Newman group avers that if it weren't for their own investing, and the people who have confidence in them, the stock would not have pyramided to over $22. They insist that the company made a net of "only 1c a share last year."

Newman is currently on a Mediterranean cruise aboard the SS Independence and, upon his return, expects a special committee's report on the recommendations made by the Green-Newman faction for a spinoff dividing Loew's into theatres-music-radio-television stations and production-distribution, the latter to assume the $24,000,000 insurance company indebtedness against the vidpix and feature film assets.

'John Paul Jones' War Rages On

The battle for control of John Paul Jones Productions Inc. entered a new phase last week when Barnett Glassman, the outfit's vice-president in charge of administrative matters, filed suit in N. Y. Supreme Court.

Court was asked to assign to Glassman 100% of the corporation's outstanding stock; to direct John Paul Jones Productions president Samuel Bronston and other defendants to give an accounting for a variety of expenses and salaries; to appoint a receiver to take possession of books, records and funds of the corporation; to enjoin the defendants from selling or transferring any of the corporation's assets, and to remove the defendants as officers and directors.

Earlier, Bronston had filed a $500,000 damage suit in N. Y. Federal Court against Glassman and his attorney, Thomas J. Todarelli. The action maintained that Glassman had subjected Bronston and the corporation to a campaign of harassment designed to force the firm to make Glassman a director and to give him credit for the film "John Paul Jones," which has just been completed and which Warner Bros. will release.

Glassman says the original arrangement was for him to be v.p. in charge of administrative matters and that he was to be assigned 50% of the corporation's stock. Glassman eventually went to Europe to supervise there the building of the two ships for the picture—the Bon-

Metro Music-Records Spinoff Angles

By ABEL GREEN

The Louis Green-Jerry Newman & Co. idea of spinning off the supposedly "healthier" segments of Loew's Inc. into one package and making the studio production and distribution another package is regarded with increasing skepticism within the present Joseph R. Vogel management group.

It knows that the reason MGM Records, for example, has been so successful—and particularly so under prexy Arnold Maxin's aegis—has been chiefly because of the Culver City studio affiliations. "Gigi," for example, is wholly a made-within-MGM soundtrack package. Maurice Chevalier's solo diskings are the direct end-result of his film participation. Talent is attracted to MGM Records with a gleam on that Culver City production potential, whether feature films or vidpix.

Same goes for the Big Three Music Corp. The reason why Robbins, Feist and Miller Music Cos. thrive is because of their strong "in" on synchronization rights, soundtracks, theme songs and basic music incorporated into Metro film productions, and also 20th Century-Fox (which owns a minority interested in the Big Three).

On the other hand, if a spinoff should ever happen, whereby Loew's Theatres-Big Three Music-MGM Records-Station WMGM (N.Y.)-and the sundry other interests in existing television stations are in one package, it is deemed inevitable that the film company would have no compunctions about going into both the recording and the music publishing businesses.

Green has said, "So what? Then this new company would benefit and so would Metro from licensing its soundtracks" However, the big difference is that MGM Records makes a net profit both as packager and producer (manufacturer), all of it redounding, as at present, to the parent Loew's Inc.

On the music end, Robbins, Feist and Miller Music automatically fall within the synchronization orbit for Culver City (and also 20th-Fox) film productions. If the music companies are spun-off and divorced they would be considerably emasculated, without the automatic picture production companies as cushions. Any new music company set up by Metro Pictures would be favored.

This is a new perspective on the divorcement which Vogel feels will dissuade any "spinoff" insistence at the upcoming Oct. 29. meeting.

L.A. Biz Lags; 'West' Light $21,500, 'Colonel' Lean 14G, 'Eden' Slim 11G, 'Defiant' Sharp 23G, 'Cat' 12G, 7th

Los Angeles, Oct. 14.

Lack of fresh product is holding local first-runs to a moderate figure this session, with a pair of regular holdovers and hard-ticket pix the sole coin-getters. "Man of West" is rated slight $21,500 in four theatres. "Me and Colonel" shapes light $14,000 or near in three houses.

Broadway film business continues spotty this stanza despite some good openers and other favorable factors. Weekend trade was helped at some first-runs by the fact that Monday was observed as a legal holiday by the banks and that some places were shuttered along with the schools. 'Country' Smash $27,000 Tops Pitt; 'Geisha' 6½G, 'Parisienne' Slight 7G

Pittsburgh, Oct. 14.

"Big Country" really is making it in a big way at the Penn currently, but not much else is exciting. "Barbarian and Geisha" is rated disappointing at Fulton while "La Parisienne" is limping badly at the Stanley. Harris is up a bit with "Decks Ran Red" but its not much to cheer about. "Windjammer" shows upgrade signs at the Warner. Reissue of "Streetcar Named Desire" at Squirrel Hill is solid in second week and may hold again.

Estimates for This Week

Fulton (Shea) (1,700; 80-$1.25)—"Barbarian and Geisha" (20th). Started very slowly and way below the John Wayne average. Doubtful of getting much more than $6,500, rather routine for a pic of such high expectations. Last week, "Villa" (reissue), $3,500 in 5 days.

Guild (Green) (500; 99-$1.25)—"Constant Husband" (Indie) (2d wk). Holding up fairly well at $2,000; should be able to hold another stanza. Last week, $2,600.

Harris (Harris) (2,165; 80-$1.25)—"Decks Ran Red" (M-G). Looks

Many Top French Stars Not Playing Paris This Season; They're on Road

Paris, Oct. 7.

Although the new legit season here looms big in quantity, many of the top theatrical stars will not be seen in Paris this year. Most of them will be on the road as touring companies get more lucrative in France. Big pay, and the film producers who watch provincial popularity of names and engage them many times on that alone, are contributing to all the theatrical personages going in for all this touring of the hinterlands. There also is the recent growth of traveling legit to contribute to this popularity of roadshows.

More pessimistic theatre directors feel this eventually might hit Paris boxoffice with provincials getting used to the theatre in their own towns, and ignoring it on visits to Paris. Others feel it will have the opposite effect by building out-of-town audiences with these old and new touring vehicles, making more people want to see new shows here on their visits.

At any rate, the theatrical exodus is on. Top touring outfits are Baret, Karsenty, Rasimi and Herbert who are estimated to play to over 750,000 patrons every season. They pay up to $600 per night for such names as Elvire Popesco, Danielle Darrieux, Sophie Desmarets, Raf Vallone, Jean Servais and Raymond Pellegrin.

Reprises and recent Paris hits make up the repertoire of these touring outfits. Outgoing season started this week with such recent hits going on the road as "Love of Four Colonels," "The Egg," "The Caine Mutiny Courtmartial" and "View From a Bridge."

National Film Theatre In Salute to M-G Pix With 10-Week Season

London, Oct .7

The National Film Theatre will be patting Leo the Lion on the back from Nov. 1 with a 10-week season called "The Lion's Roar." This will feature 47 of Metro's outstanding pix on 16m stock, and every film will be available to British Film Societies. The season is designed to show the pattern of Metro's contribution to the industry and will consist of eight separate sections.

First section will be "The Golden Years." It will include Marie Dressler's "Tugboat Annie" and "Marie Antoinette." Section No. 2 will offer "Grand Hotel," "Queen Christina" and "Marie Walesska" as samples of Metro's star-making.

Third section spotlights musicals and will include "Maytime" and "On The Town." American life will be illustrated by such pix as "Boys' Town" and "The Hucksters." Section five switches to the Pioneer Spirit with "Trader Horn" and "Northwest Passage" as typical Metro examples. Laurel and Hardy and the Marx Brothers will roar for Leo in the slapstick comedy section, and another part will be devoted to Metro's treatment of sophisticated comedy, with such greats as "The Women," "Ninotchka" and "The Philadelphia Story."

The 10-week season will parade all of Metro's stars, past and present, and for National Film Theatre patrons will provide a nostalgic followup to previous seasons surveying United Artists and Warner Bros.

No Tele, New Zealand Sees Cinema Upbeat

Auckland, New Zealand, Oct. 7.

With cinemas closing down in many parts of the world, TV-less New Zealand continues to buck the trend. The Kerridge-Odeon, largest chain here, has completed or has under construction 10 new theatres in the last three years. With the exception of the Odeon here, these are located in smaller cities, all being intimate houses, 700-750-seat houses being favored.

Building activity has increased since the government vetoed schemes for drive-ins put forward by the combined Kerridge-Odeon and Amalgamated Theatres interests last year. Apart from new buildings going up or planned, many existing cinemas are receiving facelifts.

Italo Distrib Fights Ban of Censor Board

Karachi, Oct. 7.

The West Pakiston Board of Film Censors banned a couple of months back the exhibition of the Italian film, "Orlando." Pic had earlier been passed as suitable for general exhibition by the Karachi censors. Shemiran Pictures, distrib of the pic, has challenged the decision of the West Pakiston Board in the Lahore High Court. The writ petition has been admitted and is due to come up for hearing shortly. Shemiran Pictures also challenged the validity of the sections of the Cinematograph Act covering censorship of films.

Petitioners claim a motion picture comes within the right of "freedom of expression," a right guaranteed under Section 3 of the constitution.

West Pakistan Tougher On Films It Rates As Based on Crime, Horror

Karachi, Oct. 7.

West Pakistan Board of Film Censors has put a stern check on the exhibition of films based entirely on crime and horror. Members of the board feel that such films have a bad effect on the public mind, especially that of youths. The board sent circulars to all importers of foreign pix urging them to exercise great care and discretion in importing films from abroad. Such importers have been warned in their own interests to ship in only films that do not depict crime and horror in a manner that would invoke provisions of the censorship code.

In the 12 preceding months, 33 foreign films were declared unsuitable for public exhibition by the board on the ground that these pix depicted violence, lawlessness and methods of crime.

The irony of the setup, however, is that most of the films banned by the West Pakistan Board of Film Censors were declared suitable for exhibition, either for universal exhibition or for "adults only," by the Karachi Board of Film Censors. There were only one or two pictures that were declared unsuitable for exhibition by both boards.

The films which were declared unsuitable by the West Pakistan Board, on account of violence, lawlessness and methods of crime include "Crime in Streets," (AA), "Dragon Wells Massacre" (WB) "Tin Star" (Par), "Rebel Without Cause" (WB), "Gun Fight at O.K. Corral" (Par), "Robbery Under Arms" (Rank), "Tall Stranger" (AA) and "Saddle the Wind" (M-G).

Films banned on other grounds during the same period include: "10 Commandments" (Par), Orlando (Italian) and "Bon Jour Trieste" (Col).

Donen at Amsterdam Preem of 'Indiscreet'

Amsterdam, Oct. 7.

Stanley Donen was presented to Prince Barnhard during a gala performance of his "Indiscreet" (WB). Pic was picked to be shown on festival shows to commemorate 40th anni of the Nederlandse Bioscoop Bond (Dutch Cinema League). The NBB represents the Dutch cinema owners, film producers and the distributors.

In Holland, there are only 541 cinemas and the NBB has a monopoly and decides if new theatres may be opened. Since 1918 a lot has changed. Cinema attendance here is small (every Dutchman goes to the cinema about six or seven times yearly) compared with England, Belgium or France. Every year some 500 pix are shown in subtitled versions, which makes it easier on foreigners who want to see films when on holidays here. Dutch pix are rare though 1958 will have at least three. Two have already been shown, and the prestige production of this year, "Fanfare," will be shown Oct. 23.

ACTT Attacks Rank's New Plan as 'Hari Kari'

London, Oct. 14.

"This is not rationalization, it's hari kari" said George Elvin, general secretary of the Assn. of Cine and Television Technicians, when he spoke as a stockholder at the Rank Organization's annual company meeting. While he welcomed a more enlightened exhibition policy which provided for extended runs and the possibility of films earning more revenue, he thought the closure of 80 theatres and the combination of the existing Odeon and Gaumont circuits was against the interest of the public, the industry and the shareholders.

Admitting that he was only a small shareholder, but speaking on behalf of an important organization within the industry, Elvin contended that the rationalization plan would not benefit employees either. His members at Pinewood, he said, were not talking about their next film but about when they were going to get the sack. He appealed to the board to think again and to consider his view that making less films and closing theatres was the wrong way to settle industry problems.

Another stockholder said that while he was pleased (as a shareholder) that the organization had entered the commercial tv scene, he regarded television (as a citizen) as the most objectionable invention of the century apart from the atom bomb and the Welfare State.

CNC Hints Fresh French Pix Crisis

Paris, Oct. 14.

Statistics recently released by the governmental Centre Du Cinema hints there might be a full-scale film crisis brewing here. Only bigger local and foreign receipts apparently can really stave it off. This stems from the fact that, in spite of hiked admission prices since last year, the first and second quarters this year have not seen a corresponding rise in the film producers' final take.

In fact, of the $175,000,000 overall gross for the first part of 1958, more than 28% came from the French Film Aid coffers. Foreign take was about equal to local revenue on this score. The CNC feels that if there is not a definite rise in producer's income the Film Aid might become higher than the film gross on which it is based.

Some changes and needs listed by the CNC are a needed rise in producer's share of the grosses, more general entertainment films (for family trade) as well as more taking of risks for the quality pix for foreign marts, a probable change in programming with double features allowed where necessary, and more dynamic public relations.

CNC also feels that a tighter control of foreign receipts should be instituted, such as will be done in the U. S. by the French Film Office, as well as stepping up foreign French Film Weeks. Incidentally, under Unifrance Film, the government unit to hypo French films abroad, five film weeks are set for the near future in the U. S. (San Francisco Film Fest), Finland, Mexico, Ireland and Canada.

'Carry On' Breaks House Records on Pre-Release

London, Oct. 14.

Anglo Amalgamated's comedy about the British army, "Carry On Sergeant," has been on a record-breaking spree on its pre-release engagements prior to going on general release on the ABC circuit Oct. 27. It has broken house records in 18 out of 40 dates, although running out of season in holiday resorts.

In its first two West End weeks at the Plaza, "Sergeant" grossed around $22,000. Last week at the Metropole, Victoria, the $8,400 was the best at that house in about three months.

Among the situations in which it has topped previous records are Whitby, Scarborough and Bognor. At Swansea it was only $36 below the house record and at Southport, where it played the ABC first-run theatre, it was subsequently booked for a second date there by the opposition.

Dramatist & His Agent: Both Heels

Zurich, Oct. 7.

John Osborne's initial opus, "Epitaph for George Dillon," written in collaboration with Anthony Creighton, registered impressively in its German-language premiere at Schauspielhaus here thanks to a flawless production staged by Leopold Lindtberg and a series of high-calibre performances. The play itself, in a skillful German adaptation by Hans Sahl, was locally deemed inferior to "Look Back in Anger," staged here last year.

"Dillon" hits Broadway Nov. 4 at the Golden Theatre. It's title character is an unsuccessful actor-writer living off a British middle-class family and seducing the teenage daughter.

A histrionic highlight is contributed in third act by an unscrupulous legit agent convincing Dillon to "spice" his unsuccessful plays with sex, rape, dope addicts and "mass appeal" flavorings.

Study How to Cut Politics 'n' Graft From Buenos Aires' Colon Opera

Buenos Aires, Oct. 7.

Committee appointed by Buenos Aires' Architect Mayor, Hernan Giralt, to plan the reorganization of the city's Colon Opera Theatre, is now about ready to get down to cases, after having enlisted recommendation from the country's leading musicologists, conductors, musical associations, and even from Francisco P. Principe, representing ticket subscribers.

American conductor Jacques Singer was also consulted and placed on the committee, to advise from a guest musician's angle.

Report is to cover suggestions for completely autonomous management, free of political interference, with approved patterns for future contracts and redistribution of the theatre's internal functioning. A decision will have to be made as to whether the theatre is to continue maintaining the costly ballet, choral and orchestral schools, and up to what point the theatre can be self-supporting.

The Committee has also to determine whether graft accounted for the increase of this year's budget from 45 million to 80 million pesos.

Some suggestions are that the Colon Orchestras and Ballet undertake foreign tours to help cover their cost, and give foreigners an idea of local culture.

Edinburgh Says 'No' To Sun. Cinema Shows

Edinburgh, Oct. 14.

City magistrates here have nixed a plea by local exhibs for Sunday shows. The Edinburgh Town Council refused the request and also turned down a plea to hear a deputation from cinema employees on the subject.

The civic head, Lord Provost Johnson-Gilbert, said the observance of Sunday, even in this present day and age, was deeply rooted in the Scottish race. Bailie Magnus Williamson said it was "hypocritical" that during the three weeks of the International Festival they had allowed Sunday cinema shows, and on other occasions "in the sacred name of charity" they allowed Sabbath stage performances.

Reithof Sees Trend To More Foreign Dubbing As Aid To U.S. Exhib

Paris, Oct. 14.

Dubbing of important foreign films, especially American, has been standard procedure in the main European film producing countries' general film markets for over 23 years. With the decline in Yank pix production, the need for offshore program features may make dubbing an integral part of the U.S. film exhib setup also.

This is the opinion of Peter Reithof, one of the earliest American dubbers of foreign films. Reithof points out that up to now the U.S. almost always made more than enough pix for its own needs and foreign pix were mainly for film patrons at arty houses. But since the war various foreign films have cracked the general distrib mart in the U.S.

Reithof claims that dubbing has been accepted completely on the Continent, even if it is quite ordinary. Audiences seem to want to hear actual talk rather than go along with the subtitles. He thinks that the breakthrough of foreign films into Yank marts has led to more adult approaches from Hollywood itself on seeing the audience reactions to offshore pix. In fact, U.S. arty houses, in a large measure, are reverting to American "art" films.

It also helps Yank films in the long run in giving foreign filmmakers dollar income to pay for Yank pix.

Reithof says that a film costs about $20,000 to dub well in the U.S. but only about $14,000 here. He also feels that certain purely technical problems can be gotten around via careful dubbing.

Co-Prod. Pix Problems At Actors' Italo Meet

Rome, Oct. 7.

Union problems concerning actors engaged for international co-productions, as well as labor problems arising from dubbing of professional actors by others in national productions, are among the main topics of discussion at the ninth International Assembly of Actors, to be held in Geneva Oct. 8-11.

Meet is sponsored by the Federation Internationale des Acteurs (F.I.A.), and will be attended by actors and union reps from 27 countries. Umberto Sacripanti is attending as Italian delegate, as rep of the Italo Actor's Union, S.A.C.I.

Beecham's Comment

Buenos Aires, Oct. 7.

Britain's musical baronet, Sir Thomas Beecham, took 12 curtain calls and a shower of flowers as he closed out his "farewell" here. It was a warming tribute but the stay had been taxing. Numerous strikes were inconveniencing, including a medical strike at the time his wife died and a postal strike making it impossible to send or receive mail.

Sir Thomas made no secret while here of his opinion of the Colon Theatre mismanagement. He described house as going to "rack and ruin" due to "positively and absolutely not the slightest semblance of intelligent management." According to him no opera could be produced were it not for some 10 to 12 veterans of the backstage staff who keep things going, work hard and intelligently and are experts at their jobs. He also had high praise for the Chorus Master, Tulio Boni and Maestro Kinsky.

New Delhi, Oct. 7.

Dancing in a dhoti on the dance floor of the dining hall at one of the largest luxury hotel in the East, this capital's government-managed Ashoka, is barred But dining there in the same garb is allowed. These regulations obtaining for this modernistic hostelry were publicized here in the halls of Parliament by A. K. Chanda, Indian Deputy Minister for Works, Housing, and Supply, in response to angry questions on the subject. Ruckus started over alleged refusal of entry to the Ashoka dining hall of a dhoti-clad Indian.

Chanda read in full the dress regulations for the dining hall. They seem aimed, he pointed out, at too-informal Occidental-style dress,—such sports shirts—rather than at Indian garb. The dhoti, a floppy white wrap-and-tuckup garment, is an Indian equivalent to western man's pants.

British Indies Leery of Rank Plan For Major Chain, Subsid Circuit

London, Oct. 14.

On the eve of its monthly general council meeting, more than 100 exhibitors were entertained to dinner by John Davis to hear a first-hand report on the Rank Organization's rationalization proposals and to take part in a direct question-and-answer session.

In a long, prepared statement, the Rank topper elaborated on the announcement he made a week earlier, in which he reviewed the trends which had led to a decline in attendance and a consequent drop in the volume of available product. His plan to set up a major circuit of 300 theatres and a subsidiary chain of 80 houses was received with mixed feelings by the indie theatre operators, many of whom felt that they would suffer in a product squeeze. There was also some concern at the prospect of continuing to pay a compulsory levy into the statutory Eady Fund in support of British pix which, many of them feared, they would have no opportunity of playing.

Alderman F. G. W. Chamberlain, Lord Mayor of Bristol and a prominent member of the local CEA, described Davis's statement as the final bulletin of the death of the film industry. The picture business, he added, was dying slowly and showmanship was going by the board. Davis challenged these comments and emphasized the Rank Organization's decision to make important films—"and by important I mean films that make money at the boxoffice."

Davis Answers Critics of Plan

Answering Lord Westwood, a Newcastle exhib, Davis said the decision would not have been altered had the admission tax been abolished. It was governed by the supply of product. Another indie who complained at the publicity given to the shuttering of theatres and asked why the rationalization had not been introduced secretly, was told that a private meeting of the industry had been given the facts, but these leaked.

Cecil G. Bernstein, the Granada circuit chief, contended that his chain had been more instrumental in altering the release pattern. They had played "The King and I" (20th) in a situation barred by the three major circuits) for five weeks and then brought it back for another two weeks. He also cited the example of "South Pacific" (20th), which was grossing more money than any film since "Gone With the Wind" (M-G). He pointed out that all of them had closed theatres; his circuit had certainly done so. And in just such areas, they were making more money in their remaining open theatres. He added that he could not see what else Davis could have done.

Davis insisted that the policy of extended runs would not hurt the exhib in subsequent-run situations. Evidence within their own circuit had proved that where a pic did well and played an extended season it also did well on its second engagement. He added, however, that such matters were controlled by distributors and producers. Kenneth Winckles illustrated this point by citing the company's experiences in negotiations with Paramount to play "10 Commandments." The terms, as dictated by Cecil B. DeMille, included 70% film hire. They had now rented their theatres to Paramount, but even a four-wall deal had brought repercussions from patrons who were objecting to increased prices.

At the Cinematograph Exhibitors Assn. council meeting the following morning (10) it was decided to resume the discusson on the rationalization proposals next month when, it is hoped, more facts will be available.

Calvo Heads U in Italy

Rome, Oct. 7.

Orlando Calvo has taken over direction of Universal-International's Italian operation following recent resignation of longtime topper Emanuele Zama, who had been g.m. here since 1945. Calvo was brought up from U-I's South American operation.

Zama was feted on his departure from the company, with employees offering him a gold medal and a scroll.

Ride Chi Opera Season

Chicago, Oct. 14.

With culture excitement fanned by kickoff last week (10) of Lyric Opera's seven week season, the arty World Playhouse is reprising filmizations of three of grand opera's warhorses.

Filmery's current attraction is "Aida," with "Madama Butterfly" and "Don Giovanni" set to follow.

Ionesco Playlets Rate Cheer-Jeer Vote in Berlin

By HANS HOEHN

Berlin, Oct. 7.

The first week of this year's Berlin Cultural Festival was dullish but the second was enlivened by the Roumanian dramatist, Eugene Ionesco. Two of his one-acters created debate, applause and screams of protest. His so-called "anti-play" at the Hebbel Theatre ("The Bald Soprano") drew whistling, stoming and cries of "fie!" and "shame!" while supporters raised a counter-clamor "Soprano" was brought here by the Frankfurt Municipal Theatre. It was, besides controversial, a great performance, expertly staged by Heinrich Koch, with a fine cast. Most of the critics took a fancy to it, at least amused.

The other Ionesco one-acter, "Jacques," was on a twin bill with Jean Genet's "The Maids," at the Tribuene, sort of an off-Broadway theatre. Again much applause for the existentialist while many walked out before the play ended.

German presentation of "Blue Jeans" (in N. Y.: "Blue Denim") by James Leo Herlihy and William Noble (latter came personally to Berlin) received friendly recognition of its teenage alienation theme, nothing more.

Of special interest was the French-language production of Anouilh's "L'invitation au Chateau" by Productions Theatrales Georges Herbert of Paris. Five-act comedy starred Georges Herbert and Dany Robin, his wife, who was generally found a "sweet creature."

Komoedie am Kurfeurstendamm had the German preem of Lesley Storm's "Road of a Dove" (German title: "Women Are Better Human Beings") on its festival list —a solid flop. Piece centers around an American woman who, married to a Scotch lord, keeps giving birth to a girl, six in a row, although a boy is badly wanted. The happy end sees her getting twins and one baby is fortunately male. Comedy is not only banal but tasteless.

The Landestheater Darmstadt, which has the reputation of an art oasis in Germany now, contributed the classical comedy "Lysistrata" (by Aristophanes, with a new German translation by Wolfgang Schadewaldt) to the festival. Gustav Rudolf Sellner, one of this country's top stage directors, treated it more like a cabaret show and this was no mistake, as to entertainment.

Worth mentioning with regard to music: The preems of four chamber operas performed by the Studio of the Municipal Opera House: "Corinna" (by Wolfgang Fortner), "Daybook of an Insane" (Humphrey Searle), "Anaximander" (Werner Thaerichen) and "Fiesta" (Darius Milhaud). All four 25-minute one-acters, were written upon request of the Festival management.

India Film to Soviet TV

New Delhi, Oct. 7.

An India feature, SB Films' "Tansen," is being sent to Russia for Soviet televising. Bengali-language biopic will be seen on Moscow tv.

Producers are sending the film to the Commies at the instance of the Indian government. It forms part of a plan for showing of Indian pix on Russo tele.

'Witness' N. Zealand 18-Week Run a Record

Auckland, New Zealand, Oct. 7.

"Witness for Prosecution" (UA) completed an 18-week run at Auckland's 700-seat Odeon, a New Zealand longrun record for any picture.

Previous tops was the 16 weeks for "Quiet Weekend," an English comedy. The Odeon, a new, class cinema of the Kerridge-Odeon circuit, operates at increased admission, a fact which emphasizes the record of "Witness."

Consolidated Amus. Co. (Hawaii) Sold to Yank Outfit for $8,000,000

Honolulu, Oct. 7.

Largest single corporate transfer in Hawaii's history will turn over Consolidated Amus. Co. to a stateside syndicate for a price announced of more than $8,000,000.

Agreement to sell was made with Hialand Development Corp., of Oklahoma City. Purchasing company was organized recently by a group of Oklahoma and Kansas investors along with John A. Eagle, Honolulu real estate operator.

Buyers were represented here by Arthur L. Wood, A. C. Martin and Kenneth E. McAfee — accountant, oilman and attorney, respectively, all of Oklahoma City.

Fred Williams, president of the Isle chain, said the purchasers intend to continue the picture end of the company under present management.

Circuit operates 18 theatres on three of Hawaii's four major islands. Additionally, it has 75% interest in Hawaiian Broadcasting System, operators of KGMB-TV and KGMB-radio here, both CBS affiliates. It's believed some houses may be closed in order to develop Consolidated's vast real estate holdings to a maximum.

Firm's books carry the realty holdings at $1,200,000. But skyrocketing land values mean that the site of just one of the chain's showhouses (the Waikiki) actually today is alone worth $1,000,000.

Consolidated has 450 employees and 1,500 stockholders. Latter must approve the sellout. Stock's book value is listed at $22.67 per share. Stock was selling for about $27 a share until reports of the sale brought it up to $32 Friday (26). Stockholders may get between $38 and $39 per share once the sale is ratified.

REOPEN LONDON HIPP FOR BRITISH PIC PROD.

London, Oct. 7.

The London Hippodrome, now a theatre-restaurant, opened up as a film set for one Sunday only for final sequences of the Anna Neagle production, "The Lady Is A Square." Herbert Wilcox directed a cabaret sequence in which Frankie Vaughan appears as an unknown singer getting a break as a deputy soloist in the "Talk of the Town" show.

Later, Miss Neagle and Vaughan were filmed doing a jive dance, just a few yards from the spot where she made her first West End starring appearance in "Stand Up and Sing" some 28 years ago. Extras represented the diners and the Hippodrome staff was on duty in usual capacity.

Bardot's Latest Opus Breaks Paris Records

Paris, Oct. 14.

Brigitte Bardot's latest starring pic, "In Case of Accident," which Columbia will handle in the U. S., is breaking boxoffice records here. Film got good and dissenting reviews here, but in its first week, at two houses, broke both theatre records with 43,216 attending for two $50,000 gross.

B. B. got nods for her acting improvement and now is definitely tabbed a big name personality star here. Her next pic starts in November on French and English locations. It is "Babette S'En Va'T'En Guerre" (Babette Goes to War) with B. B. caught up in the Free French Army during the last war with adventure-comedy plot. French director Christian-Jaque replaces Miss Bardot's ex-husband Roger Vadim at directorial helm. Roul Levy will produce.

Peace at Last Between ABP, Brit. Film Biz

By HAROLD MYERS

London, Oct. 14.

There is peace at last between the British film industry and the Associated British Picture Corp. A compromise settlement has now been negotiated giving the corporation the right to show some of the Ealing backlog on commercial tv, subject to certain restrictions and limitations.

The compromise, negotiated by the Film Industry Defense Organization (FIDO), has now received the backing of the five major trade associations. The last to give it the nod was the Cinematograph Exhibitors Assn., which endorsed the recommendations at the general council meeting last Friday (10).

In the agreement reached, the FIDO board accepted that there was a binding agreement between ABC-TV and Ealing as far back as August of last year in respect to 95 films, and the network has complete freedom in regard to their exhibition on the airwaves. Nevertheless, ABC-TV has given an undertaking that not more than 60 of these will be shown on tele without further consultation with FIDO. Also that their presentation will be limited to the company's own outlets in the Midlands and the North, and that they will not be shown more than once and only on Sunday afternoons.

The settlement brings to a close one of the most controversial issues of recent times. FIDO came into being as a result of the first news that ABC-TV was negotiating for the Ealing backlog and, under the scheme subsequently endorsed by the industry, a fund is being raised out of boxoffice receipts to compensate producers who might be tempted with a tv releasing deal. After the constitution of FIDO had been adopted within the industry, ABP made a successful takeover bid for Associated Talking Pictures, (the Ealing Films parent outfit), and by that bid gained control to the entire Ealing backlog, believed to number some 200 pix.

Threatened with a complete collapse before the Defense scheme had got off the ground, the FIDO board swept swiftly into action and warned the corporation that unless a satisfactory agreement could be negotiated, a complete boycott would be imposed. It was made clear that such a boycott would not only apply to the companies within the group, but to all others who traded with them.

The settlement came about after two special FIDO board meetings last week, and at the first a subcommittee, headed by Arthur Watkins, the British Film Producers Assn. prexy, was appointed to continue negotiations with the ABP board. At the second meeting, held last Wednesday (8), there was agreement in principle, subject to ratification by the constituent industry bodies. That endorsement came within 48 hours.

Wardell Gaynor Inc. has been authorized to conduct a film productions business in New York. Address is c/o Storyboard, Inc. Isadore G. Needleman was filing attorney at Albany.

On stage, with the producer, will be 30 of Holland's greatest heroes of this salvage operation, the Dutch Royal Navy Band and high government dignitaries.

Bureau of Missing Business

The Talking Cure

By ROBERT J. LANDRY

Spyros Skouras will address this week's Allied Artists Assn. convention in Chicago and also the Theatre Owners of America convention in Miami next week. Thereby the head of 20th Century-Fox expresses once again his inclination to action, to face-to-face discussion, to a conviction that problems are soluble and complaints are serious. In exposing himself to hecklers, in playing Daniel in the lion dens (plural) of exhibition he is unique at the present time among company presidents and unique, it must be added, in intellectual provocation and daring.

Skouras may not have all the answers. Nobody does. But the answers he has, the thoughts he has, he shares. He believes in and practices the talking cure. Because of this fact he will, this week and next, be making trade news and it is probably justified to say that he will again be making that nowadays-often-neglected thing called exhibitor good will.

Without attempting to guess the nature of Skouras' remarks, but alluding solely to the example of a company president taking this kind of initiative, it is of the utmost pertinency to the problem of missing business that there shall be give and take of views. It is the history of nearly all businesses in America that when the manufacturers, jobbers and retailers stop knowing each other trouble sends down deep roots.

Current Alibi: Electioneering

Minneapolis, Oct. 14.

Fact that September was worse generally and October has started out under par in the local subsequent-run neighborhood houses for what normally has been a depressed boxoffice period is attributed in exhibitor circles here to its being an election year that finds contests hotter than usual and more political meetings.

Even pictures which have done smash business downtown, like "No Time for Sergeants" and "La Parisienne," haven't been clicking uptown.

At an advanced admission, "Sergeants" chalked up an eight-week loop firstrun downtown, with one exception the longest engagement of any non-hard ticket picture in a big theatre the past several years. And its grosses were terrific.

"Sergeants" could have stayed even longer downtown on the basis of its final week's business, according to RKO Theatres division manager Harry Weiss. However, under the local clearance setup it immediately had become available for the neighborhood houses in the earliest 28-day slot, it having been a moveover picture and the 28 days being counted off after the end of the first theatre played.

The next day after it closed downtown it opened day and date at all of the 10 uptown theatres in the earliest 28-day slot. Considered an ideal family picture and shown at regular 85c prices, as compared to the $1.25 downtown, it's failing to pull big in any of the situations.

"La Parisienne" ran five weeks downtown to excellent grosses. It's the first Bardot picture to play in the neighborhood non-art houses and they expected a cleanup, in view of the sensation the French star has been creating here. ("And God Created Woman" now is in its 13th week at the local uptown "fine arts" Avalon after long runs downtown and in three other neighborhood art houses here.)

But business has been light almost all down the line and some of the neighborhood exhibitors have been receiving protests against playing a Bardot picture at all, although "La Parisienne" has not been condemned by the Legion of Decency and is not considered particularly daring.

It isn't a case either of the pictures having been "milked" downtown, in the opinion of Nate Fisher, owner of three uptown theatres. Regardless of how long blockbusters run in the loop, he says, they invariably cut a wide neighborhood boxoffice swath.

At this particular period, the uptown theatres go into a boxoffice slump every year because of schools' starting involving expenses for parents and, thus, smaller entertainment purchasing power, and the new television season's start with a bang.

British Ad Campaign

London, Oct. 14.

Associated British Cinemas, the chain of theatres controlled by Associated British Picture Corp., is launching a national advertising campaign to stimulate attendances, which will run through until the Spring.

The campaign had been championed by ABC for some time and it was hoped that other section of the industry would participate, but as the negotiations looked like being protracted, the company has decided to go it alone, rather than miss the start of the Fall season. Associated British has indicated that it would be ready to amend its individual undertaking in favor of a more comprehensive all-industry project.

The advertising follows a complete audience survey made by the company in which it was ascertained that the greatest fall-off in attendances was among the middle-age groups. The campaign, therefore, is being directed towards stimulating a return to regular cinema-going by this audience segment.

Navy League Tie

Washington, Oct. 14.

Navy League chieftains are cooperating with MGM and Loew's Capitol Theatre here to stage a V.I.P.—studded Navy Day world premiere of "Torpedo Run," Glenn Ford and Ernest Borgnine starrer.

At the Capitol on Oct. 23, Ford will receive usual key to the city in front of the theatre, followed by a stage ceremony in which both Ford and Edmund Grainger, producer, will be handed the Navy League's "Award for Meritorious Service."

Bargain With Exceptions

Kansas City, Oct. 14.

Fox Midwest Theatres is instituting the use of a student discount card, offering them via screen trailers in each of its theatres and by daily newspaper ads. The Fox version requires the student to buy the card at one dollar, which gives him discounts around 20% on theatre admissions for a year.

There is also a bonus for the card buyer in that he gets "one free empty wallet ticket" to start things off. But the circuit is reserving the "right to withhold" the discounts on road show and special attractions.

Regularly registered students in a high school or college, age 12 to 21, are eligible for the discount cards. The actual discount varies as admissions are bracketed for the student card holder—he pays 50c when the regular admission is 60 to 75c; 65c when the regular rate is 76c to 90c; 75c when 91c to $1.05; and 90c when $1.06 to $1.25 prevails.

Cards have been offered past couple of weeks and are quickly catching on. About 10,000 are expected to be put in use here, according to Leon Robertson, city manager.

Little Eva in Little Pieces

Colorama Features Inc. (which means Jules Weill and Carroll Puciato) has worked out a novel front-of-house display for its revival of the old silent "Uncle Tom's Cabin" (originally Universal) which will soon hit the market updated with a sound-track by Raymond Massey (Massah Lincoln).

The economy-package point-of-sale aid is first of all a 24-sheet but designed to break into various smaller component sizes for poster use, sandwich boards and stands. The whole layout is printed in 12 pieces, measuring 41" by 54" each.

Tired Blood Complaints

Minneapolis, Oct. 14.

Alarming stage has been reached here again where even many of the important pictures have been failing to click satisfactorily at the boxoffice and there's many a worried exhibitor.

It's bad, on the whole, uptown as well as in the loop.

"I've never seen it this poor—this is the worst ever for this par-clares Bill Volk, co-owner of the four top local neighborhood houses, including the Terrace, one of the nation's most beautiful and prosperous.

Such highly praised pictures as "The Matchmaker," "Damn Yankees," "The Big Country," "The Reluctant Debutante," "The Naked and the Dead," for example, in their recent or current loop firstruns haven't showed enough boxoffice strength here to satisfy their distributors or the exhibitors. And that's a cause for concern, local exhibitor leaders feel.

After a big first week, "The Defiant Ones" began to slip badly. On the other hand, "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" has been a sensational grosser.

In the neighborhoods "No Time for Sergeants" and "La Parisienne," which did smash business downtown firstrun, are comparative boxoffice flops currently. Lesser pictures are far in the dumps, asserts Volk.

The boxoffice usually takes it on the chin at this time of the year because of such adverse factors as the starting of school, requiring parents' monetary expenditures for their offsprings, Friday night football games and the return to television of important and new shows, Volk points out.

However, the drop now is to a record bottom, according to Volk who believes that the fact it's an election year with many hot fights and numerous political meetings every night may be aggravating matters.

By reason of the fact that 150 of this territory's theatres have been signed to membership and the hope of solid financial ground, the Northwest Exhibitors Business Building Forum's perpetuation now is assured.

This means there'll be in the area a constant united effort to boost the boxoffice and that no stone will be left unturned to sell every picture to the limit throughout the entire year.

The Forum's board of directors was so informed by Harry Greene, its chairman, at its first meeting since the recent conclave here.

The board voted to seek a permanent administrative head at a substantial salary. Among other things, his duties will include the issuance of weekly bulletins to all ticular period of the year," demembers. These bulletins will include showmanship ideas, suggestions on selling specific pictures, etc.

These bulletins will be in addition to the boxoffice stimulating ammunition furnished at the conclaves to be held here at least twice a year, it was decided. At the first two conventions those in attendance received costly kits which contained advertising and exploitation material for the two 1958 boxoffice drives.

Every new idea likely to help the boxoffice will be passed on to members as soon as it comes to light, they'll be advised immediately as to what has been considered the best approach in selling available attractions and they'll be informed what the big circuits and most successful exhibitors are doing along these lines, according to the board's plans.

There's also one other exhibitor organization in this territory, the older North Central Allied of which Frank Mantzke is president.

Latest of The Last on BB

Discussions are now under way between Theatre Owners of America and the Motion Picture Assn. of America to establish whether MPAA might be willing to go for a radio campaign scaled to a lower budget than that originally planned.

This is virtually the last move to try and save the BB drive. If it fails, then TOA will seek to "adopt" the campaign and make it available to all exhibitors for their own use. BB campaign at a lower budget would mean a lesser number of spots and a greater concentration in coverage.

There was some optimism in the TOA camp last week when Allied of Michigan and Allied of Wisconsin came through with funds. Original estimates for the campaign ran to $300,000 for airtime and between $75,000 and $90,000 for other expenses. Exhibitors were to have put up half the money and the producer-distributors the rest. As of the moment, some $150,000 are in the exhib till.

There have been some acid back-and-forth comments re the failure of the BB campaign to get off the ground. The distributors feel bitter about being "let down" by exhibition. Some exhibitors, while admitting that the theatremen haven't exactly outdone themselves, nevertheless argue that there were some little-publicized reasons for their hesitancy, including the charge that the campaign was "deviated" from its original purpose, which was—pure and simple—to bring people back to the wickets.

Lobby 'Radio Station'

Dallas, Oct. 14.

The lobby of the Majestic Theatre was turned into a MARS radio station for the engagement of "The Hunters" (20th) which opened here.

The U. S. Air Force Recruiting Station here is installing a Military Amateur Radio Service station for theatre patrons to send messages to friends and relatives in the Air Force wherever they may be stationed around the world.

Messages will be accepted by the MARS station each evening from 6 to 9 p.m. during the engagement of the pic.

13,000 Over 65

Albany, Oct. 14.

Philip M. Kaiser, special counsel to Governor Averell Harriman on problems of the aging, characterized a plan under which three leading Albany motion picture theatres will slash prices for retired senior citizens, starting Wednesday (Oct. 1), as "a very exciting idea" and one which "I am sure will set an example to other communities."

The 1950 census showed 13,000 persons 65 or over, in Albany County.

San Antonio, Oct. 14.

With the current craze of hula hoops, the Statewide Drive-In Theatres, the Alamo, South Loop 13, Mission and Trail Drive-In will stage hula hoop contests.

Argues That If Small Exhibs Expire Infection May Become Epidemic

Minneapolis, Oct. 14.

Something new for the industry here is the helping hand that the big circuit and most successful individual exhibitors now are extending to the little fellows, especially those in the small towns, to try to keep them in business.

This, it's explained by such theatremen as Charles Winchell, United Paramount president-general manager here, is in the belief that the industry's soundness and genuine health require that exhibition be kept alive in as many towns as possible.

In a trying time for the little fellows, instead of the former to heck with the other guy and the devil take the hindmost attitude, Winchell and others in this territory point out that many of the little fellows are in plenty of trouble and it's to everybody's benefit, in the last analysis, to give them assistance.

Some exhibitor leaders, like North Central Allied president Frank Mantzke, feel that the industry's distributing end hasn't been sufficiently cognizant of the situation's seriousness and have been falling down on the job as far as aid for the little fellows is considered, although, he points out, 20th-Fox "now is awakening."

"The disease that is fatal to the small exhibitors can spread to the bigger fellows and the adverse effect of many theatre deaths eventually is sure to hit Holywood itself a jolting blow," says Mantzke. "Also, the prestige of exhibition generally is undermined. It's just no good when the residents of many towns are deprived of the chance to see pictures in theatres and are eliminated from the theatregoers' ranks."

One of the main reasons why successful and prosperous circuit owners Eddie Ruben and Harold Field along with Winchell organized the Northwest Exhibitors Business Building Forum, the new exhibitor organization here, is because of a desire to help the smaller exhibitors stay or get on their feet.

The Forum is placing at the small exhibitors' disposal the brainpower of the United Paramount and Ruben circuits' publicity, advertising and exploitation departments. At two meetings a year members will receive kits containing showmanship ammunition and in between meetings they'll get bulletins containing accounts of the gimmicks, ideas and showmanship stunts which are proving successful.

In all this connection, United Paramount Theatres last week held a meeting at Sioux Falls, S. D., to which more than 100 independent exhibitors were invited to hear pep talks and learn about all of the impending product and how best to sell it to their publics.

Presided over by E. L. Hyman, Paramount Theatres vice president, and his assistant, Bernard Levy, it was the first such gathering to be held in the grass roots and it was designed to convince the small-town exhibitors that the big circuit also is concerned about their welfare, said Hyman.

A similar meeting had been held in Minneapolis this year and evoked much enthusiasm.

Indie Leadership—Look at Oscars

[Perlberg Rebuts James Stewart]

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Producer William Perlberg has charged as 100% wrong statements made last week by James Stewart which constituted a slap at independent film companies "for failing to deliver quality product." Backing up his views, Perlberg noted that 15 of the last 20 films nominated for the Best Picture Oscars were produced by indie companies and all of the last four winners—"On the Waterfront," "Marty," "Around the World in 80 Days" and "Bridge on the River Kwai"—are independent films.

Pointing out he has a healthy respect and admiration for Stewart both as a man and an actor, Perlberg claimed, "When it comes to some of the opinions he expresses, he's in over his head in a field he hasn't given much thought to."

'UNRULY HOUSE' AWARD STANDS

$60,000 Standard, $67,000 Widescreen Base Negative Price in U.S.-Soviet Film Trading; Finally Official

Russia and America have come to agreement in broad terms on the long-projected but previously unmaterialized idea of swapping motion pictures and along with it some definite understandings about film festivals (Soviet pictures in the United States plus personalities and vice versa).

As disclosed by the Motion Picture Assn. of America, in New York Thursday (9), an official memorandum of agreement has been signed and this covers the exchange of pictures and picture people along with joint production of feature, popular science and documentary films.

It amounts to this—

(1) Motion picture companies of the States will purchase seven Soviet features and of these four already have been selected. These are "The Cranes are Flying," "The Idiot," "The Captain's Daughter" and "Swan Lake." The other three are to be selected by the U. S. companies within 30 days of the signing of the agreement. Sovexportfilms, as part of the deal, will purchase 10 U. S. features. So far selected are "Great Caruso," "Roman Holiday," "Lili," "Marty," "Old Man and the Sea" and "Oklahoma." Sovexportfilms is to choose the additional four within 30 days.

(2) The price is to be in dollars at the rate of $60,000 for each standard size film and $67,000 for each entry in widescreen.

(3) It's agreed that each side will release the product of the other side in dubbed or subtitled versions. "The content of the films must be preserved and any change must be agreed upon by the other side. The release version must be agreed upon prior to its distribution by a representative designated by the other side."

Blueprinted In Jan.

Memorandum of agreement came about as a followup to an agreement between the U. S. and U.S.S.R. in Cultural, Educational and Technical fields as developed in Washington last January.

Participating in the followup Moscow accord were, on the Soviet side, V. Surin, Viceminister of Culture; A. Davydov, director of Sovexportfilms; A. Slavnov, head of Foreign Relations, Department of the Ministry of Culture; E. Kachugin, assistant director of Sovexport.

American delegation was headed by Eric A. Johnston, president of the Motion Picture Assn. of America and the Motion Picture Export Assn. of America. Participating with him were Turner B. Shelton, director, Motion Picture Service, U. S. Information Agency; Kenneth Clark, MPEA v.p.; Hans Tuche, attache, American Embassy, Moscow.

The features involved are for theatrical presentation only and each side is to use its best efforts to attain maximum distribution, with full publicity support. (In past Yank companies have balked at distributing any Red pictures.)

On the documentary front, 15 such pictures presented by the U.S. already have been selected by the Soviet Embassy in the U. S., subject to the approval of the Ministry of Culture. In turn, the American Embassy in Moscow has picked out 15 Soviet documentaries, for final approval by the U. S. Information Agency.

'Film Weeks'

Film weeks—one to focus on Soviet pictures in the U. S. and the other anent American pictures in Russia—are part of the accord, with details to be worked out on the governmental levels.

Further, the first Soviet picture to be exposed in the U. S. is to be given what appears to be an elaborate premiere in Washington. The first Yank picture to be unveiled within the iron curtain is to be given an equally formal showcasing in Moscow. Two or three personalities are to be invited to participate on the exchange basis, preferably with the Americans to be ones identified with the American picture being show, and vice versa.

Each side, via film organizations, is to pick up the check for the traveling and other expenses accruing to their respective performers.

The matter of joint production has been placed in the hands of a standing committee. But it was pointed out that American and Soviet producers are free to carry on negotiations and conclude agreements on their own.

Memorandum of agreement was signed by Johnston, Shelton, Surin and Davydov.

B. B. Kreisler's Russian Okay

In the wake of the Motion Picture Export Assn. film deal with the Russians, Moscow has made its first purchase of independent product via an agreement with B. B. Kreisler of International Film Associates Corp.

Confirmation of the Soviet intention to purchase one or more pix from Kreisler, who represents indie producers, came from A. Davydov, head of Sovexportfilm. He said that "The Brave One," "Tomorrow Is Forever" and the documentary "Leonardo Da Vinci" were now being previewed in Moscow.

Kreisler-in turn has taken on the Russian "Magic Violin" featurette for the U. S. and is dubbing it. Kreisler said he will receive payment for whatever films the Russians buy in dollars. Moscow will inform him of its selection within a month.

Kreisler noted that his deal was covered by the terms of the film agreement signed by Eric Johnston in Moscow. Kreisler went to Moscow last year and huddled with Davydov on film purchases. Deal was held up pending finalization of the MPEA agreement.

FRISCO'S 100% LOSE-OUT

20th-Fox Withdraws 'Rally' For Studio Editing

San Francisco, Oct. 14.

American film company hesitancy to play ball with the San Francisco Film Festival was underscored last week when 20th-Fox pulled its "Rally Around the Flag" from the fest. Company informed director Irving Levin that the film won't be ready.

This leaves the affair without any American representation whatever.

Alex Harrison, 20th general sales manager, originally had promised Levin the film. However, it turned out that the picture had to remain at the studio for further editing. ("Rally" also has been pulled from 20th's fourth quarter release sked.—Ed.).

DENY APPEAL OF ALBANY PARTNERS

Albany, Oct. 14.

The New York State Court of Appeals on Thursday (9) denied a motion by Neil and Nettie Hellman, doing business as Albany Royal Theatre Corp., to appeal from an unanimous decision by the Appellate Division, Third Department, affirming a jury verdict of $16,500, plus $165 taxed costs, to Charles Antinucci, an infant by his father, Dominick, as guardian.

The judgment was for injuries received when the lad, then 10, was set on fire in the Royal Theatre (now dark) on Sunday afternoon, May 23, 1954. The boy had lighter fluid thrown on his clothing, by an unknown person seated behind him, the liquid then being ignited by a cigarette.

It was the first time an "accident" of this precise kind had happened hereabouts. The first time, too, the State's highest court had been called to pass upon the responsibility issue.

Hellman and his mother, in asking leave to appeal, argued, through attorney Martin J. Conboy, that: (1) the evidence did not support the findings of the jury that the defendants were negligent; (2) in the exercise of reasonable care, the defendants were not required to anticipate so unusual a circumstance as that causing the plaintiff's injuries; (3) defendants were not responsible for "the unforeseeable, the vicious act of the stranger" which caused the lad's injuries; (4) errors on evidenciary rulings effecting the substantial rights of the defendants were committed by the trial court.

Refusing to accept this plea the Appellate Division, in an opinion written by Justice James Gibson, held that:

"There was ample evidence that the Saturday-Sunday afternoon audiences at the Royal (now dark) consisted largely of children; that they 'often were unruly"; that during a period of weeks or months immediately preceding the case, the flames of lighted matches had been seen; that cigarette butts and burnt wrappers had been found on the floor; that the 'supervision as to this danger was inadequate.'"

Likewise, that the testimony by the original defendants was "unimpressive and did little to offset that conclusion"; that the jury findings the operators' supervision had not been adequate were justified; that there had not been an objection, originally, to amount of damages awarded; that the court did not err on rulings.

Antinucci argued, via brief of attorney Reuben H. Kohn, that the evidence showed no one was on duty within the theatre at the time of the mishap (the usher and the doorman had gone out to eat). Also that the boy had received no assistafice, in putting out the flames, from anyone connected with the theatre.

Only the concession stand attendant, Mrs. Regina Endres, "patted out" the flames, after the youngster had first run to the rear of the theatre, rolled on the floor, and then gone to the men's toilet. There the lad tried, for three or four minutes, to put out the flames, with water he flushed up. The boy testified he tried to run water, but it did not come.

Manager Experienced

Manager Victor Bunz, who was in the lobby (taking tickets), brought the boy to the police station, according to the Antinucci brief. Officers took Charles to Albany Hospital. The boy was described as an accurate witness.

There was some conflict of testimony as to what supervision the Hellmans provided, and as to conditions in the theatre at or just before the accident.

Mrs. Endres and doorman Burmetto (whose son had gone in the theatre with Antinucci, but was not there at the time of the accident) were called to testify for the plaintiff.

Bunz (onetime vaudevillian) had operated the Family in Waterford for 12 years, and had worked in Warner and Fabian theatres of Albany and Troy, before joining the Hellman organization. Defendants contended his long experience proved Bunz to be a competent manager.

They also emphasized no accident of the kind had happened before in the eight years of operating the Royal (then a week-end situation).

Buddy Adler returned to desk yesterday (Mon.) as 20th Fox production chief, following five weeks of illness.

Selloff of Post-1948 Features Seen Clearly Part of Rationale Of Bankers Behind Producers

By GENE ARNEEL

Sale of post-1948 pictures this week became a more immediate possibility. Actual unloading hasn't been specifically suggested. But the value of these "modern" pictures for television and theatrical reissue is being significantly underlined in several quarters.

The current dispute at Loew's served to bring into sharp focus the attention being given post-1948's as a potential large revenue source. The corporation's indebtedness of $24,000,000 is to be assumed by whichever of the two after-divorcement companies takes title to the residual rights in the new product.

At least, this is the proposal of the so-called Wall Street interests on the board, headed by Louis Green and Jerome Newman. It seemed clear that they wouldn't hesitate to sell the product to tv as a means of wiping out this indebtedness.

Rumors afloat over the past couple of weeks indicated the possibility of a sale of Universal by Decca Records, which owns 82% of the film company. These rumors were flatly denied by the picture outfit itself and Wall Street brokers who keep a close watch on pic trade maneuvers.

But, and this is the point, the Wall Streeters, upon inquiry, said U would be a valuable property to any prospective purchaser. The assets they underlined were the post-1948's.

As already reported, the Samuel Goldwyn organization already has placed numerous films on the block, including "Hans Christian Andersen" and others made after 1948.

Culture-to-Culture

Chicago, Oct. 14.

Open letter from "Dad Dearborn" in Chi Daily News to insurance mogul James S. Kemper, owner of the Civic Opera House:

"It appears that culture in Chicago has been miraculously 'saved' by the failure of a movie. How appropriate that it was called Cinemiracle."

Missive refers to boxoffice sinking of "Windjammer" at the Opera House, where it was skedded to resume in December after Lyric Opera season, but won't. National Theatres, instead, will sub-let to long-hair attractions.

Allied Artists' Reduced Loss

Allied Artists reduced its loss for fiscal year ended June 28, 1958 to $1,189,688, from previous year's loss of $2,458,910, improved to $1,783,910 with a credit of $675,000 recovered from Federal taxes.

In making annual report, prexy Steve Broidy noted that no such tax credit was available for 1958. As of June 28, 1958, however, he reported that company had available for tax purposes a carry forward of losses relating to years ended June, 1957, and June, 1958, amounting to approximately $1,700,000 to be applied against future profits. Topper also reported a more favorable outlook for the current year.

Broidy blamed current dwindlings on declined U.S. and Canadian film rentals, which he said were off from $13,822,000 to $11,311,000. Total grosses income was down from $18,138,000 to $15,977,000.

Although domestic grosses were off, he said, foreign biz improved, from $3,980,000 to $4,427,000. Part of this increase was result of AA's high-budget product, "Friendly Persuasion" and "Love in the Afternoon," moving into foreign release. This resulted in a decline in inventorie from $9,219,000 two years ago to $4,814,000 in current statement.

Broidy pointed out he expected current year's operation to show a profit on first quarter, when it's available for annual stockholders' meet Nov. 12.

Current and working assets, according to statement, exceed current liabilities by $2,580,000 and bank loans amount to $2,442,000.

For current year, AA plans to release 32 films, four in high-budget class, and has in release now 16 new films.

Art House Rents Out For Local Operatics

Kansas City, Oct. 14.

Rockhill Theatre, operated by Little Art Theatres as an art house, this week cut to a schedule of films three days per week, Friday, Saturday, Sunday. Other four days of the week for the next month are taken by the new Lyric Opera Association, semi-pro producing a series of operas in English.

Rockhill is utilizing the period to bring back a number of films on which it has had requests. First is "Diabolique," which was back played the rival Kimo. Manager Ross Caccavelli has also set a reissue of an Alec Guinness film as the second attraction, and has other past favorites to round out the month.

Series of four operas will be the initial effort of the Lyric group formed here last summer. If it proves successful, the idea is to have an annual fall opera festival. Series opened Monday (29) with "La Boheme."

Home Before Dark

vances in stature considerably with this portrayal and becomes a consideration for more important things. Miss Albertson plays with abrasive technique and minute inflection to create a memorable character. Steve Dunne, as another weakling in Miss Simmons' life, does a good job, and others in the large cast who stand out include Joan Weldon, Joanna Barnes, Kathryn Card and Joel Marston.

Joseph Biroc's black and white photography is suited to the grim New England atmosphere. It is winter, a depressingly gray winter, and the locations in Massachusetts give the picture the authentic feel. Art direction by John Beckman is helpful in this. Technical credits include the good editing by Philip W. Anderson and proficient sound by Stanley Jones.

There is a title song by Jimmy McHugh and Sammy Cahn which will be sung behind the titles by Mary Kaye, but it had not been added to the picture at the time it was previewed. Ray Heindorf's musical score is background music, ably done. Powe.

Hollywood, Oct. 8.

Allied Artists release of Lindsley Parsons production. Stars Barry Sullivan. Peter Graves; features Gita Hall, Thayer David, John Alderson, Rico Alaniz. Directed by Harmon Jones. Screenplay, Jack DeWitt, Turnley Walker, based on Jack London's "The Sea Wolf"; camera, Floyd Crosby; editor, John Blunk; music, Paul Dunlap. Previewed Oct. 6, '58. Running time, 83 MINS.

Wolf Larsen ..... Barry Sullivan
Van Weyden ..... Peter Graves
Kristina ..... Gita Hall
Mugridge ..... Thayer David
Johnson ..... John Alderson
Louis ..... Rico Alaniz
Matthews ..... Robert Gist
Leach ..... Jack Grinnage
Haskins ..... Jack Orrison
Henderson ..... Henry Rowland

This sixth time around for "The Sea Wolf"—tabbed here for its lead character—catches the Jack London flavor but subject itself is inclined to be somewhat old-hat. By cleaving so closely to original, in light of modern screen melodramatic taste the sum total doesn't stack up as particularly exciting or forceful fare. Names of Barry Sullivan and Peter Graves, however, should see it through program market for moderate returns.

Sullivan, hard-hitting as the brutal sea captain in this Lindley Parsons production, follows in part such stalwarts of the past as Hobart Bosworth—who produced, directed and starred in original 1913 version—Noah Beery, Ralph Ince, Milton Sills and Edward G. Robinson. Under Harmon Jones' vigorous direction, he gives good shadings in restrained style to wolfish character who skippers the worst hell ship afloat but attracts whatever crew he doesn't shanghai because his sealing operations in North Pacific always nets men more money than any other ship. Graves portrays the wealthy young landsman, Van Weyden, whom Sullivan picks up after a shipwreck and makes one of his crew, the only man aboard unafraid of the half-mad killer who finally meets his death at the hands of this crew.

The Jack DeWitt-Turnley Walker screenplay unfolds entirely aboard Wolf Larsen's sealing schooner—circa 1892—where plenty of interesting maritime scenes add to film's pictorial values. Limited confines of the ship doesn't prove any deterrent to the action, which in itself Jones keeps at a realistic clip, and good atmosphere is established through Floyd Crosby's facile camera work.

Sullivan and Graves, latter persuasive as the soft landsman who hardens under Larsen's tutelage without absorbing any of cruelties that result in master's death, are backed by a competent cast. Gita Hall is in briefly for pic's sole femme character, rescued from another shipwreck; Thayer David is the cookie who loses his foot to a shark; John Alderson, Rico Alaniz, Robert Gist and Jack Grinnage are crewmen.

Technical departments are well handled, including John Blunk's editing, Paul Dunlap's music score and William Ross' art direction. Whit.

Monster on the Campus

Well-developed shocker for the scifi market.

Hollywood, Oct. 8.

Universal release of Joseph Gershenson production. Stars Arthur Franz, Joanna Moore; features Judson Pratt, Troy Donahue, Nancy Walters, Phil Harvey. Directed by Jack Arnold. Screenplay, David Duncan; camera, Russell Metty; editor, Ted J. Kent. Previewed Oct. 7, '58. Running time, 77 MINS.

Donald Blake ..... Arthur Franz
Madeline Howard ..... Joanna Moore
Mike Stevens ..... Judson Pratt
Sylvia Lockwood ..... Nancy Walters
Jimmy Flanders ..... Troy Donahue
Sgt. Powell ..... Phil Harvey
Molly Riordan ..... Helen Westcott
Gilbert Howard ..... Alexander Lockwood
Dr. Oliver Cole ..... Whit Bissell
Sgt. Eddie Daniels ..... Ross Elliott

Universal comes up with a pretty fair shocker in this expertly produced story of retrogression. Its premise is logically developed without any great strain on the imagination, acting is convincing and there's a general professional air about the unfoldment. Film is a good entry for its particular market.

Plottage of the Joseph Gershenson production follows a chain of terrifying events which occur on a college campus after the carefully preserved body of a species of fish that has lasted millions of years without evolving from its original state, arrives from Madagascar. A gentle police dog suddenly becomes a raging, snarling attacker, resembling in appearance and manner a phehistoric wolf; a dragon fly feasting on the fish carcass becomes a two-foot flying killer. Two horrific murders are committed by a beast-like creature. All these gruesome happenings, it develops, are due to whatever comes in contact with fish transforming backwards to their native savage state in the evolutionary scale.

Jack Arnold's direction of the skilfull David Duncan screenplay builds constant suspense and provides a sock climax. Arthur Franz, science instructor who falls victim to the dread, deceased blood of the fish, delivers strongly as the unwitting murderer who commits his crimes while transformed into a beast. His experiments finally prove that he, himself, is the monster and in remorse he again injects himself with the blood so he is killed by the police.

As his fiancee, Joanna Moore lends fine presence and Judson Pratt also scores as the homicide lieutenant in charge of the case. Troy Donahue and Nancy Walters are good as pair of students, Alexander Lockwood as college prexy-father of heroine and Whit Bissell as college doctor also are okay. Helen Westcott is one of the murder victims.

On technical end, photography by Russell Metty and special photography by Clifford Stine are standouts and Ted J. Kent's fast editing adds to suspense. Whit.

Indirect Loans

Act, passed by Congress this year, goes into operation in December with the creation of independent privately owned investment groups throughout the country. This program involves government financing for private lending firms who will make loans to small business. Such groups can organize for as little as $150,000 and borrow a like amount from SBA. In turn, they lend money over as much as a 20-year span to small business firms. But the rub is that they are not bound by an interest rate as low as SBA's 5½%. In fact, there is no federal ceiling on what interest can be charged.

Although the new small business investment program is not yet finally worked out, SBA legal experts see the rules blocking direct loans to ozoners as not applying to the new investment groups.

Regional Small Business Bureau directors from across the nation spent last week in Washington getting briefed.

to seek coproductions for those studios. Going by current schedules, the stages will be only 50% occupied by B-L's own films.

Several B-L pix, "Blue Murder at St. Trinian's" and "The Green Man" and "Geordie," have done well in the States, Hoare said. "If a picture costs $4,000,000 and you get $100,000 in America, it's disastrous of course. But our films rarely cost over £300,000, and on such a budget a $100,000 return from the U. S. isn't bad at all." Bromhead's duties will be to make distribution deals and to supervise release, expenditures, etc.

Back to Breathe Broadway's Free Air, Newman Says Coast Studios Hate 'Independence' in Any Actor

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

One of the chief reasons so many New York actors return to the stage after working in films is because major film studios don't like independence in thesps—they "feel the way to keep an actor is to have him knuckle down and be a puppet."

So asserts Paul Newman, returning to N.Y. to star in Tennessee Williams' "Sweet Bird of Youth" when he finishes starring in "The Philadelphian" at Warner Bros. Newman labeled James Stewart's recent blast at such thesps "ridiculous." Stewart had lashed the N.Y. thesps on grounds they merely came here for a quick buck in pix, then returned to N.Y. to "express themselves artistically, or have four kids."

Newman, currently starring in "The Philadelphian" at Warner Bros., said "the studios hate independence. An actor gets tired of bucking this wall. You can't buck it all the time, the next thing you know you get old, tired and grey. The more tired an actor gets the less effective he is."

"I am surprised that Stewart said what he did. Acting is a craft, and why you would say a person is 'destroyed' because he wants to stretch himself, I can't follow that thinking at all. If a person has the opportunity to work in movies, the stage and tv, he should. You're pretty foolish if you don't. What Stewart said is ridiculous—that an actor should work only in movies. It's limiting to do nothing but movies.

Stewart said the N.Y. actors should make their studio work at least a 50-50 deal. If the studios came through with a 50-50 deal, there would be a lot more loyalty from the actors, and they would stay out here. Actors should be treated with respect, not as human machinery which you dial at the proper time. What do the movies do for the established N.Y. actors who come here precisely? They sell off their contracts, or piddle around with them. Studios should learn it's very important that they maintain the loyalty of actors.

"Who is the actor responsible to —the movies or himself? Basically, my disagreement with Stewart is that good work can be done in three media, and that an actor who doesn't avail himself of such opportunity is limiting, not stretching, his ability," said Newman.

Newman is under exclusive contract to Warner Bros.

a string of Academy Award winners is being screened.

The exhibitors appear to be sanguine re the future of the oldies in their houses. Theatre Owners of America's entire concept of purchasing post-'48 films to keep them off television is largely based on the notion that the theatres would replay the oldies, thus providing part of the coin needed to pay for the wholesale purchase.

Two factors appear to stand out in favor of reissues. One is the growth of a "new" audience which has never seen the screen greats. The other is predicated on the fact that some of the stars of today had substantial roles in pictures made 10 and 15 years ago, when—like Brando—they were known but not yet on top. There's a third consideration, and that is the dropping production volume this year, which should make a good deal of screentime available for either oldies or imports. In many areas, the oldies are preferable.

Reissue picture has been made more difficult by television since some of the companies sold outright. Outfits which reissued the majors' product (prior to putting it on tv) have done excellent business in many instances.

Illinois Critics

that no clearcut pattern emerged. Some gazettes, it's claimed, actually devote more space now to films than ten years or so ago, while other (e.g., Joliet) have cut down, usually either to favor video or simply because of upped production and newsprint costs. Significantly, at least one editor said that if anything, his paper had reduced lineage on tv developments "because it's in more direct competition with us."

In all cases, the papers said they had never been broached by an exhib or distributor for a review (if the paper's policy normally omitted same), or to obtain a "go easy" judgment, either for all releases or a particular one.

John Huston's Next Spot: Afghanistan

Director Contrasts Foreign Crews With Hollywood—Never Cheaper Because It Takes Longer

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Projecting a desire to shoot a picture in one of the few countries Hollywood has yet to invade, John Huston has revealed he is skedding "The Man Who Would Be King," Rudyard Kipling story he owns, for production in Afghanistan.

Project came to light as part of a press conference called at 20th-Fox upon director's completion of "Roots of Heaven" for Darryl F. Zanuck and his return from Africa, Europe and New York. Admitting he's known as a location director, Huston noted he hasn't made a film on a Hollywood sound stage since "Red Badge of Courage" eight years ago. When someone has a picture they want made in an out-of-the-way place, they say it will appeal to Huston, the director said, adding, "And it usually does."

Huston declared it is not more economical to shoot away from Hollywood because it usually takes longer. He noted that foreign crews work "almost desperately hard" trying to prove they are as good as Hollywood crews. "They haven't the experience or the expertness that mass production can give them," he said, "but they do everything they can to make up for it in spirit." Director said countries like Japan (he directed 20th's "The Barbarian and the Geisha" there) are so busy with their own production, they have little time for American companies. "It's only their inherent courtesy that makes it inviting for us," he explained.

Huston declared he sees no difference between producing and directing, except that it might be too much work for one man. He confessed he was uneasy about going to work for Zanuck but further explained the pair saw eye to eye on "Roots of Heaven" and that the film shows no line of demarcation between creative forces of the two men The $2,300,000 film was brought in $200,000 under budget, he said.

Asked why no "big star names" were cast in the film when so much money and effort was to be expended, Huston said Zanuck wanted William Holden for the role later given to Trevor Howard, but Paramount wouldn't let the actor, who was under contract, do the film.

Huston leaves Sunday night for Mexico to scout locations for "The Unforgiven," which he'll direct for Hecht-Hill-Lancaster. First of his three pix for Seven Arts Productions will be "Freud," to be lensed later next year in Vienna, while the other two likely will be "Montezuma," which he said will cost as much as any film ever made, and "Lysistrata." Only pic on Huston's sked which may be filmed in Hollywood is Arthur Miller's "The Misfits."

American International

in Australia on a $750,000 budget; "Eve and the Dragon," Stanley Shpetner production lensed in South America on $1,000,000 budget; and "Take Me to Your Leader," combo. live-action - and - animation film.

Intent on orderly release of product, Nicholson states company will "continue to think like exhibitors," and couple expanded selling campaigns to pix with proven sales hooks. New projects include "Machine Gun Lady," to be written and produced by Shpetner; "Jail Breakers," "High School Bride," "The Drag-racers," Lou Rusoff production; and "Insect Woman," Roger Corman production.

Terry Turner has been retained by AIP, according to Nicholson, for a "blockbuster" exploitation campaign on forthcoming release, "The Spider."

veloped, there will be less need to guarantee an adequate supply of British pictures.

In the current year, 20th has been second only to the Rank Organization in the volume of production. Among its British pictures this year have been "Harry Black," "Naked Earth," "Intent to Kill" and the yet to be shown "The Sheriff of Fractured Jaw" and "Inn of the Sixth Happiness."

Lake Placid Theatre, Under Priest's 'Ban,' Closes; Manager and Owner Give Conflicting Interpretations

Hard hit by a combination of bad business and a six-month ban for Roman Catholics imposed by the local priest, the Palace Theatre in Lake Placid, shutters tonight (Wed.) It had been in continuous operation since 1928.

The Palace is Lake Placid's only indoor theatre. The nearest other house in 12 miles away, in Saranac. The Palace incurred the wrath of the Catholic pastor, the Right Rev. James T. Lyng, when it refused to pull the French "And God Created Woman." In consequence, Lyng imposed the ban, which runs to Jan. 27, 1959.

According to James P. McLaughlin, Palace manager, the closing is a direct result of the ban, since Placid nominally is a good 60% Roman Catholic. However, it is a fact that the out-of-season months have always been weak for the Palace, which thrives on the vacation trade. There have been times in recent years when the theatre lost as much as $45 and $50 a day during the off-season.

Peter Roland, president of Adirondack Theatre Corp. which operates the Palace, stated flatly last week that the ban had nothing to do with the shuttering. "We've considered closing for the past ten years. We almost closed last year, but then the new ski development came along and we thought we'd get extra thrade that way." He said the Palace would be renovated and probably reopened in the late spring.

"We do 80% of our gross, and get some 90% of our profits between June 1 and August 15," Roland said. "The rest of the time, we operate as a public service. It's just becoming too expensive now."

Manager McLaughlin, a Protestant, doesn't see it that way. "The board, which is headed by three Catholics, had to bow to this ban," he said. "Actually, the crisis was a long time in coming. Msgr. Lyng and his assistant, (The Rev.) Albert Salmon Jr., have been building it up for quite a while, partly out of resentment that the local people catered to non-Catholic tastes in the vacation season. That was the case with us, when we played 'And God Created Woman.' Lyng and Salmon kept condemning and forbidding their people to see many pictures, including 'Oklahoma' because it had a song in it which wasn't acceptable to them."

Imposition of the six-months ban came when the theatre turned down Msgr. Lyng's proposal that it pull "God Created Woman" and accept instead a small payment from him. Lyng called the picture "an assault on the ideals of decency."

Later on, the two local Protestant clergymen, while also disapproving of the Brigitte Bardot film, affirmed their belief in "the right of individual judgment" and said they could not approve of "the use of threats and reprisals as a moral lash." They felt that it was unfortunate that "one religious group would set itself up as the sole protector and arbiter of morals for the entire community."

McLaughlin said last week that, at the outset, the Palace board had been willing to pull the Bardot film, but that the staff had threatened to walk out if this was done. Roland said that, following renovation, the house probably would reopen in the spring. Lack of a local theatre would'nt matter too much to residents, he held. "When they have free time in the winter they sit in front of their tv sets anyway," he added.

Allied Convention

"reasonable" clearances, "Then let us see what happens."

Primarily, Kirsch made it clear, the Justice Dept. must take the rap for distribution inequities by "failure of the Attorney General to enforce" the decrees. In this he echoes the other exhibs' trade body, Theatre Owners of America. Small exhibs contend that one result of this "laxity" has been ticket price-fixing by the majors, denying to them the sensible practice of adjusting admission to fit specific situations and pictures.

In fingerpointing at the D. of J., Kirsch said "Allied feels there has been a dereliction of duty," and reminded delegates that Congressional redress is now being sought.

Raises Other Points

Circumvention of the clearance aspects of the Federal edict, according to Kirsch, is a prime factor in killing off the small operators. "By all the laws of sound economics it is wrong, just as the whole doctrine of fewer pictures and fewer theatres is wrong. The industry cannot hope to conquer television and other rival enterprises by surrendering the theatres, which are its front line troops."

If sub-run patronage still is dwindling, "that is due in very large measure to the fact that those theatres can no longer offer timely showing of the pictures."

Kirsch warned that lopping off marginal independents by continuing current distribution practices won't cure the industry. To think so, he said, is a delusion. "This industry cannot survive half sick and half well. There must be total recovery or there will be none."

Allied leaders, Kirsch went on, "are convinced that with the infusion . . . of elementary principles of fair play, saving the independents is far from a hopeless task." For one thing, he noted, video, "our principal tormentor," looms much less formidalbe now that the novelty has dissipated. Leveling of tv's appeal will continue he predicted, unless additional vaults of motion pictures are opened to it.

Kirsch linked restoration of the indies, with its consequent benefits all along the line, to a firm practice of giving them access to the best pix while they're still timely. His equation: fresh product means more receipts adding up to higher rentals.

"Why should the prints of a particular picture be limited to a number taken by a distributor out of thin air before the picture is released? Why cannot that number be increased with respect to particular cases after it becomes apparent that a picture is going to be a smash hit if shown seasonably in the theatres?"

San Antonio Oct. 14.

Co-stars Sarita Montiel and Armando Calvo and is filmed in a color and a new process called Mexiscope.

Planned 'Diet' Of Prints Hit At Allied Meet

Chicago, Oct. 14.

With mixed feelings, Allied States Assn. confab formally blessed Paramount for expanding its 1958-59 release schedule. Though it welcomed Par's promise as a "contribution . . . towards relieving the existing shortage of acceptable" pictures, the exhibitors' group indicated apprehension unless (a) print quotas are boosted to "adequate levels," and (b) pix are released "in accordance with time-honored practice." Latter fear, said resolution, was prompted by frequent use by Paramount of the word "merchandising" in its announcement.

Huddling with reporters, Allied prez Horace Adams again hammered on the exhibs' theme that feature availability, meaning prints in quantity, is crucial to survival of the industry. Citing such films as "Bridge On River Kwai," "Peyton Place" and "Ten Commandments," Adams wailed, "so you have quality, but what good is it if you can't play it when it's fresh?"

The Cleveland showman said current release practices, defy the consent decrees because they discriminate. He said the public sloughs even a quality picture if it plays a situation, say, a year or more after first release. And as for print "shortages," he suspects this to be "a preconceived idea, not a happenstance."

In another resolution, Allied reaffirmed its action of last May in Baltimore which okayed the industry's biz building campaign, but expressed regret the radio phase of the plan lay fallow over the summer, depriving drive-ins of any benefit.

Adams said Allied's indoor and outdoor groups will probably combine their 1960 confab at Chi's Hilton hotel. Unity move is aimed at cost-cutting, especially regarding theatre equipment exhibits.

the film story about her husband. The truth is that Prien and his crew went down under attack by the British destroyer Wolverine. In the film, Prien's submarine is sunk, but he is saved by a passing British freighter. Later, that ship is sunk by a German submarine, and Prien dies.

Invented for the film is a scene where Prien, heeding the admonishments of a priest-friend, surfaces to rescue men from a ship his submarine has sunk. However, the operation is interrupted by British planes. To the music of a "snappy march." Prien's boat dives away, "leaving corpses to rock upon the waves." There's another scene in the film in which Prien sinks a ship with a Jew aboard.

When the Jew realizes he may be picked up by the U-boat, he lets himself drown rather than face a concentration camp. Scripter Bartsch at one time intended to show the pieces of Prien's U-boat drifting on the waters, with the voice of Joseph Goebbels on the soundtrack with the famous quote from his 1943 Sportspalast speech —"Do you want total war?"—and the hysterical thousands shouting their answer: "Yes!" However, the Constantin distribution outfit nixed that scene.

Max E. Youngstein, United Artists vice-president, off today (Wed.) for a month's swing of film production facilities in Russia, Greece and Israel. Possibility of a co-production deal with Soviet interests has been suggested.

homme Richard and the Serapis—at a Rome shipyard.

At that time, the suit charges, Bronston and other defendants—Irwin Margulies (Bronston's attorney). Rudolf M. Littauer, Albert Heit, Albert Margulies, Lois Forsch, Betty Schmitt and film director John Farrow—"conceived the plan and scheme and entered into a conspiracy unlawfully to use the good will, facilities, personnel and assets of the corporation for their own private gain and profit and to the damage and detriment of the corporation and Glassman to appropriate for themselves and convert the assets, profits, business and funds of the corporation, unlawfully to reduce the stock interest and ownership of Glassman in the corporation," to bar him from participation in the affairs of the company, etc.

Furthermore, charged Glassman, the defendants have "caused the corporation's assets to be misappropriated, wasted and dissipated . . . and diverted from the appropriate uses of the corporation." Also, he maintained, the defendants had "illegally, wrongfully and fraudulently" caused stock certificates to be issued without any consideration being paid for them. Furthermore, he held, Bronston had sold participating interests in the film to "persons unknown" and had withheld the money from the corporation.

Various subplots, involving Margulies and Bronston, also are alleged by Glassman, who was an investor in earlier Bronston pictures.

In his reply to the Bronston complaint in Federal Court, Glassman said he was 100% owner of John Paul Jones Productions. Bronston having assigned his 50% of the shares to him on Dec. 19, 1957. He asked that Bronston's application for a temporary injunction be denied, partly because the action was brought in the name of the plaintiff corporation "which is not the real party in interest." Apart from this, Glassman submitted to the Court a point-for-point refutation of the Bronston group's allegations. Court hearing is skedded for Oct. 20.

ALLIED STATES BAITS GOLDWYN AS TO TV

Chicago, Oct. 14.

Allied States Assn. is asking Sam Goldwyn to "fess up" re trade reports the vet producer plans to sell 50 of his pictures, including eight made after 1948, to television. Exhibitor group's board late Sunday (12) wired Goldwyn asking clarification "with as much detailed information as possible," to lay before the Chicago convention prior to the windup tomorrow (Wed.).

Wire cited a VARIETY story (Oct. 8) that James Mulvey, prez of the Goldwyn operation, is negotiating for the selloff. One of the post-'48 pix said included in the deal is "Hans Christian Andersen."

Damis Lights the Fuse

Washington, Oct. 14.

Frank J. Damis, Stanley Warner zone manager for the Philadelphia-Washington zone, held his first meeting with the Washington group of theatres Friday (10) to hypo bigger grosses during the current "Rockets for Records" drive underway in this zone.

The drive was launched Sept. 1 and ends in January. Cash prizes are to be awarded to both monthly winner and grand winners in the drive.

Damis presided at the first meeting here since the merger of the Washington zone with Philadelphia, and speakers from the Philadelphia office included Ellis T. Shipman and Everett Callow. Washington participants were Louis Ribnitzki, Frank Ia Falce, Charles V. Grimes, Rodney Collier, James Root, E. N. Read and Roy Knight.

Inside Stuff—Pictures

Distributors are finding a new source of migraine (actually not "new" but simply being given a latter-day spotlight) in exhibitor resistance to terms for science fiction and other types of exploitation features.

Cause of the woe is that the theatremen are savvy to the production and are becoming increasingly reluctant to playing it on a percentage-split basis. They feel the production costs involved, being at a relatively low level, suggest low-level rentals on a flat basis.

The distrib rebuttal is that the producer should share in grosses on successful pictures just as compensation for the losses he takes on his lemons. And it doesn't matter that the production represents just, perhaps, an investment of $200,000 or less.

There's an added ramification to this. Distribution execs' ad-pub officers are now cautioning producers to refrain from discussing, in public, the amounts they paid for their newest "epics."

"Boasting about low negative costs only hurts our chances of cashing in at the boxoffice," commented an ad-pub officer of a major distribution company this week.

Wall Streeter Arnold Bernhard sees Paramount, within the next three to five years, grossing $135,000,000 and netting $7 per share, this presuming there will be 1,300,000 shares outstanding. The dividend forecast: $4 per share annually, compared with the present yearly payoff of $2.

The word from within Par is that there's no intention at this time to increase the divvy rate, despite the $10,000,000 coming in annually from the backlog sale to the Music Corp. of America tv interests. Company official said he "could see" stepped-up income for stockholders but only if the issue's trading price went up to around $60 per share. It's now at the $44 level.

Likelihood of an eventual liquidation of the Metro studio would be "considerably enhanced" if the Culver City lot is forced to go on its own—that is, independent of M-G subsidiary enterprises. This is the opinion of Arnold Bernhard & Co., investment advisors.

Bernhard thus sides with Loew's president Joseph R. Vogel's argument that the studio, if forced to give up the financial cushion provided by foreign theatres, the music and record companies, etc., would be in too tough a competitive position with other studios which have such properties to fall back upon.

As Bernhard puts it, production is "an extremely risky business" what with that fickle public to contend with.

Dick Walsh Sees Film Row Cuts Running Course

Albany, Oct. 14.

Belief that Film Row cutbacks throughout the country "have about run their course," was coupled with the observation that Warner Brothers' recent expansion of operations in Albany and several other cities (after earlier personnel parings), indicated the expected savings did not materialize. Source of both remarks: Richard F. Walsh, president of International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employes, which charters front-office and backroom workers in film exchanges. He did not mention WB by name.

Walsh, here to speak at a "Safety" conference, also pointed out that "centralization" requires some additional employees in the larger centers. He asserted that present inadequacy of inspecting is creating a problem for the projectionists.

Walsh's main thesis at the conference itself was the history of "safety controls" for film theatres. The industry had been careless in the early period and in localities fear of fire kept unescorted children out of the houses.

Walsh extolled the old asbestos curtain—but that belonged to pre-film days. The system of exit lights and spaced fire escapes did probably grow during past 50 years with the multiplying film houses, later palaces.

Walsh pledged labor's support in efforts to improve occupational health and reduce industrial accidents, the latter now costing three-quarter of a billion dollars annually in New York state.

Ray Smith's New Career

Albany, Oct. 14.

What activities do retired branch managers pursue? Ray Smith, who recently bowed out as Albany manager for Warners, after 28 years service, is starting a buying and booking service. His first account is the Playhouse in Manchester, Vt., which Al Labounty has taken over from Mrs. Helen Hadley.

Labounty worked as a projectionist for Mrs. Hadley, who operated the theatre with for sometime her father, the late Charles Orr. Manchester is served from here.

Smith, who sold for Fox, Universal and RKO before joining WB, expects to add other accounts.

Lee Cheers Craft Unions

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Producer Rowland Lee, who dropped plans to film "The Big Fisherman" in Israel in favor of shooting it here instead, has received a warm thank-you from organized labor, which has been campaigning against so-called "runaway" features shot abroad.

Spokane Central Labor Council wired it would assist him in any way possible, and IATSE camermen's local 659 wired locals throughout the country advising them of Lee's move, and asking them to help him wherever possible.

Music & Camera Oscars As Was

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Academy of Motion Picture Arts & Sciences, which last year reduced balloting on both the music scoring and cinematography awards from two to one, has restored original format, due to protests over skeletonized Oscaring.

For the first time, too, documentary films and short subjects will be eligible to compete for Best Picture of the Year, by vote of Board of Governors.

Oscars this year ,to be presented next April in 31st annual Academy Awards, will now go to both Best Scoring of a Musical Picture and Best Scoring of a Dramatic or Comedy Picture. In cinematography category, awards this year will be given for both black-and-white and color photography.

WASHINGTON'S OWN FILM

Shooting began yesterday (Mon.) at the National Film Studios Inc. here with a cast of some 32 persons in the mystery, "Dead to the World." It is the first Washington company to attempt a feature-length film.

Top roles are played by Reedy Talton, former Marine officer, and Jana Pearce, both from legit.

Talton's new role is his second lead. He has played opposite Diana Barrymore in a road company of "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof," and in "The Rainmaker" with Barbara Britton.

Others in cast are "Casey" Peyson, Leon B. Stevens, Len Doyle, John Dorman, Maggie O'Neill, Philip Kenneally, Pete Jamieson, Ford Rainey, John McLlam, Joel Thomas and Joseph Julian.

Maple Drive-In At Pittsburgh Gets 'Unclean Hands' Nizer Rap

Antitrust suit brought against the distributors by the Maple Drive-In Theatre, near Pittsburgh, appears backfiring. These are the developments:

(1) The case was dismissed in New York Federal Court with prejudice against Maple.

(3) Louis Nizer, counsel for the defendants, advised the court that in the midst of pre-trial examinations lawyers for the plaintiffs said they had been misled as to the facts in the case and as a result would sue their own clients.

(3) An officer of the Maple company told Nizer, latter said, that the theatre agreed with the Blue Dell ozoner, which is a competitor, not to bid against each other for product. This itself is the trust violation, Nizer said.

(4) Judge Thomas F. Murphy permitted Nizer to assert a counterclaim against the plaintiffs.

This represents the first time the distributors have thus struck back against one exhibitor who had sued them in the first place.

Long Closely Scrutinized

Pittsburgh, Oct. 14.

The long-hanging suit of the Maple Drive-In here for $1,845,000 against the major film companies and the Stanley-Warner Corporation which was dismissed last week by Federal District Judge David N. Edelstein in New York had been watched closely all over the country ever since it had been first instituted nearly four years ago.

In an abrupt about-face, three of the four stockholders of the Maple submitted a last-minute statement to the court admitting they had no cause to bring legal action. They also conceded that their own arrangements with another drive-in, the Blue Dell, were in violation of the anti-trust laws.

It was this, brought out in pre-trial testimony, that prompted attorneys for the Maple, Robert Ruskin, a onetime film salesman here, and Alvin Korngold, to state they could not proceed with the case because, they stated, their own clients had misled them. Ruskin and Korngold went even further and told Judge Edelstein that as a result of the agreement between the Maple and the Blue Dell, the distributors could now bring claims against the two drive-ins.

The dismissal is seen as significant on similar cases now pending here because Maple owners conceded that runs and availabilities of films in their area "were arrived at by each of the distributor defendants independently and without conspiracy among themselves or with any exhibitor . . . and were fair and reasonable in view of location and of competing factors." The admission also released Stanley-Warner from responsibility for damages.

Signers of the statement were C. I. Taylor, president of the Maple; Jack Judd, former Columbia exchange manager in Pittsburgh and now head of company's Southwestern sales division, and a Mrs. Klein. The fourth stockholder, Max Arnold, a brother-in-law of Judd who owns 25% of the stock, refused to sign. It was Arnold's admission of a split agreement with the Blue Dell that turned the case upside down. The Maple statement said this agreement is now terminated.

As part of the arrangements for dismissing the suit, the distributing firms agreed not to press claims against the Maple but reserved the right to sue the Blue Dell. They also agreed to pay $13,000 fees to Ruskin and Korngold, the Maple's counsel, providing none of it goes to the stockholders of the drive-in.

Never Know Your Luck

Monahans, Tex., Oct. 14.

Wayne Long, operator of the Corral Drive-In, is trying to fill a 1,000,000 barrel ground tank to provide a swim, boat and fishing playsite. The plan is to fill the tank with water to a 10-foot level, with facilities for boating, swimming, fishing, picnic grounds and concessions around the edge, and an 80x30 floating dock to be used for dancing.

However, Long has run into difficulties with his drilling for water wells. It seems that instead of striking water—he is in danger of striking oil!

Par's Hugh Owen Scotches Idea Of Co.'s 'Liquidation'

Philadelphia, Oct. 14.

The rumor that "Paramount is engaged in or contemplates the practice known as 'liquidation'" was scotched as "baseless and completely absurd," by Hugh Owen, veepee of the film distributing company at a luncheon in the Warwick Hotel (8) for exhibs and trade press.

The meeting was called by prez. Barney Balaban and was one of more than 100 similar confabs Paramount execs are holding in all parts of the world. About 70 circuit execs and indie theatre owners heard Owen list 29 forthcoming big-scale pix for 1959 that are either completed or in various stages of production.

"It is true," he said, "that our company did sell some of its assets. The record will show, however, that Paramount did not dispose of one single item that could have been considered essential to its continuing future as a major producer and distributor of motion pictures.

"Actually, the sale of a limited number of non-essential assets has resulted in a flow of fresh capital into the company-capital which gives us the added financial stability so necessary to back up our program of more multi-million-dollar-plus pictures than ever before.

"The net result is a company with no pressing financial problems; a company that's regarded in Wall St. as the 'management company' and whose securities are selling at the highest price in its history," he declared.

Cooper Foundation Picks Up RKO-Brandeis, Omaha

Omaha, Oct. 14.

Cooper Foundation of Lincoln last week took another foothold in Omaha exhibition by acquiring the RKO-Brandeis Theatre after the RKO chain declined to renew its lease.

The house, once the showplace of Omaha, had been in a rundown state the past several years and biz was strictly on the offish side, with a $2,000 gross average for the 1,100-seater.

The Cooper outfit reopened the Brandeis last Friday night (3) with "Littlest Hobo" (Allied Artists) as the attraction. Gene Cramm will manage the house.

Earlier, the Cooper Foundation had moved into Omaha with the acquisition of the late Ralph D. Goldberg's theatre properties, which include the State, another downtown first run spot.

The properties also include the Town Theatre, which is being remodeled and renamed the Cooper Theatre. It will show Cinerama and Todd-AO features, with the preem of "South Pacific" slated for October 23.

Cooper officials say they will remodel both the State and Dundee theatres in the near future.

The lease on the Brandeis, according to the foundation, is for an "indefinite" period.

CATHOLIC SHEET PANS 'NATURAL BIRTH' DATES

Albany, Oct. 14.

"The managements of the Rialto Theatre, Amsterdam, and of any other theatres in the diocese that offer regular public showings of 'The Case of Dr. Laurent' make themselves 'suspect' of brazen contempt for the general welfare of the community." So The Evangelist, official weekly of the Albany Catholic Diocese, declared in a recent Page 1 story, boxed and captioned "For Select Audience Only."

Theatres showing it are also "calloused in their regard for the sacredness and delicacy that attends the wondrous acts of God's Providential continuation of life," the paper asserted.

Citing the Legion of Decency "Separate Classification" for the French picture, The Evangelist declared it is "a technical and educational film that should be shown only to a limited and discriminatory type of audience."

The Rialto is a Schine Circuit first-run.

Charles Walder Loses Antitruster

Charles Walder, members of his family and corporations which he controlled or in which he had an interest have lost out in their antitrust bout (which was on various counts) with the principal distributors and, mainly, Paramount.

Walder et al., suing for $792,000, had contended that the distribs had deprived the Tivoli Theatre at Miami, of a proper crack at film product. This theatre originally had been equally owned by Walder and Paramount Enterprises.

Complaint further alleged that Walder was improperly compelled to sell out his stock to Par.

Suit was tried in New York where Federal Judge Dimock granted the final of the defendants' dismissal motions.

clear speech. Each picture is set in a different international locale. Three in the first package play against the backgrounds of Switzerland, Gibralter and Africa. Dialog in all cases is English. Plan is to dub suitable foreign children's films. Two German pictures are set for lip syncing now.

Plan is to kick off the series in 15 key cities in the east. Continental will offer not only the pictures themselves, but also promotional material and a guide on how to stage children's shows.

The only other similar attempt, though local in character, are the Children's Cinema shows which Cinema 16 is putting on on a monthly subscription basis at the Beekman Theatre in N. Y. Cinema 16's Amos Vogel also has been thinking of selling the children's programs to other exhibitors.

According to Reade, the need is great for film programs for the young, "which are our future audience." Since the demise of the MPAA's Children's Film Library, very few suitable children's pix are available to exhibitors, the exception always being the Walt Disney product.

Tape Tiff, Unsold Time Major Items as NBC, Affils Prep Meet; Network Junketing 80 TV Editors

It is anticipated that when NBC-TV's affiliates meet in Gotham on Thursday (23) one of the thorny topics certain to be brought up will be the question of who is to pay for the video tape operation necessary to deliver delayed network shows during daylight saving time periods.

CBS-TV recently indicated it would undertake the cost of this service to its affiliates. NBC has taken the position that its affiliates would have to absorb the costs of video tape operation.

Also on the agenda will most likely be a careful reviewing of NBC-TV's programming structure with likelihood of some affiliate beefing regarding the sizable chunk of unsold time on NBC's schedule.

Otherwise, affiliates should have themselves a "peaches and cream" powwow in view of the post season's audience shift to NBC.

More than 200 representatives of NBC's affiliates will be on hand for the meetings. NBC Radio will report to the affiliated station on its progress and plans for the future on Wed. (22) at the Plaza.

Matthew J. Culligan, exec veep of NBC Radio, will be the major speaker. NBC-TV affiliates will hear from Bob Sarnoff, chairman of the board; Bob Kintner, prexy; Bob Lewine, veep of tv network programs; Don Durgin, veep and national sales manager, and others on Thursday (23).

Affiliates will gather in Gotham during NBC's second annual press junket of more than 80 out of town tv editors. Scribes will be hosted from Saturday (18) through Monday (27). Last year NBC took the press to the coast with 73 in the party. It is estimated this year's junket cast will cost NBC in the vicinity of $50,000.

Newsmen will be put up at the New Yorker and the parties for them include an on-stage buffet dinner at the Ziegfeld Theatre after the Perry Como show; a luau at the Hawaiian Room of the Lexington Hotel after the Steve Allen show; a Gillette Party at Leone's; a dinner at the Tavern on the Green as Arthur Murray's guests and cha cha lessons at the Murray Dance Studios; a trip to the David Sarnoff Research Center at Princeton to see new inventions in the miniature electronic field; a reception and dinner at the Plaza for press and affiliates; an NBC-TV program dept. dinner for the boys at the St. Regis Roof and a recuperation period at the Concord Hotel, Sullivan County.

Apart from freeloading, visiting editors will have a chance to interview name performers and workers behind the scenes.

Overall responsibility of the junket rests with Syd Eiges, veep of press and publicity. Working with him are C. K. Sullivan, public relations representative of NBC; Milt Brown, manager of program publicity, and NBC column editors Ethel Kirsner, Mort Hockstein and Andy McCaffrey.

The Whole Idea Smells

There's talk of Cucamonga, Calif., changing its name, and this may cause havoc among Jack Benny's writers. Cucamonga, from time immemorial, has been part of the "Anaheim, Azusa and Cucamonga" gag. Now the town's fathers want to change it to (no foolin') Arpege—the perfume, of course.

"Anaheim, Azusa and Arpege" doesn't have just the right ring, according to Benny's writers.

Deals Near On NBC's Ownership Tieups Abroad

On the assumption that ownership of foreign radio and tv stations can be "as valuable" as ownership of stations here, NBC is actively pursuing ownership or management participation in a number of overseas broadcasting operations. Company expects to close a few deals by the end of 1958, although an NBC spokesman would not specify the countries.

Meantime, CBS is biding its time. A CBS exec said, insofar as foreign management or ownership tieups are concerned, "There is nothing yet, but we're certainly open to all business ventures." He said that CBS hasn't been pressing like NBC."

NBC already has a subsidiary in operation. In Wales, the NBC subsid is supplying management service to local television.

NBC will supply this service, which consists of technical and program assistance, for a fee. Yet in the case of a station which is in biz for profit, the network said that it would naturally expect to share in the profits.

After pointing out that some of these foreign negotiations have been going on for a year and a half, NBC said it expects to make substantial progress by December.

It was implied that there is no promise of a deal in Italy in the immediate future, but three weeks ago NBC made fresh overtures to RAI, the government-subsidized broadcast outfit, in the event RAI ties into a second Italian channel, one that possibly could be licensed by RAI to commercial interests.

CBS-TV's Daytime Coin

Daytime biz surged upward this week at CBS-TV with Mercury cars signing for Friday sponsorship of Richard Hottelet's newscasts.

Armstrong Cork joined the sponsors of the new "Jimmy Dean Show" and Derby Foods signed for sponsorship of three daytimers, "Captain Kangaroo." Heckle & Jeckle" and "Play Your Hunch."

All are alternate week, quarter-hour deals. In another deal, S. C. Johnson signed for alternate week, quarter-hour sponsorship of "Verdict Is Yours."

Quinlan Pulls a Switch, 'Merger' Tome Tribute Not Indictment of Biz

By LES BROWN

Chicago, Oct. 14.

Let it be stated early that Sterling Quinlan's "The Merger" (Doubleday; $3.95), for all its frankness about the double-dealings and power-politicking behind the scenes in the tv industry, is in no way an indictment of the broadcasting biz but rather a tribute to it by a network vicepreZ who has seen both the good days and the troubled ones. The portraits of the industry's tall men are not always pretty, but Quinlan manages to redeem them just when they are the most blood-spattered in the fight for survival and/or greater power.

Quinlan, who for five years has been ABC veep in charge of WBKB in Chicago, has written a novel, his opus one as a man of letters, but he isn't kidding anyone that it's pure fiction. It is closer to truth than to make-believe, for "The Merger" is a slice of video history seen through Quinlan's own temperament. Some industryites may disagree with his viewpoint or question his interpretive eyesight, but the facts of the book are clearly recognizable as those of the merger between ABC and

Revlon Seeks Out On '64G Question'

First casualty of the '58-'59 television might easily be "$64,000 Question" with one of the co-sponsors Revlon said to be unhappy over the ratings. Executives of the cosmetic firm are currently carrying on talks with officials from both CBS and Entertainment Productions Inc., packagers of the show.

Revlon tv execs want one of two things, they want to either change the format of the show to hypo ratings or they want to get off the hook completely by bringing in a new program. The only catch to Revlon's plan is that the company is committed to the show for a full 26 weeks along with the P. Lorillard Co. If the network and packager decide not to play ball, Revlon may have to ride with the fare.

On its last outing, "$64,000 Question" ran a poor second Sunday (12) night at 10 to Loretta Young on NBC-TV. Latter piled up a 32.9 compared to 11 for "Question."

EPI, packagers of "Question," have had their share of troubles this year with "$64,000 Challange" being dropped by sponsor P. Lorillard a few weeks back after a contestant claimed he received an answer in a pregame warmup.

All-Star Brussels Cast Flies to London For Saroyan Repeat on TV

London, Oct. 14.

One of the biggest American drama talent lineups to date will appear in an ABC-TV production of William Saroyan's "The Time of Your Life" next Sunday (19). Cast which stars Franchot Tone, Ann Sheridan, Dan Dailey, Susan Strasberg, Rita Gam and Myron McCormick, is the same that appeared in the play when it was produced as the final drama production from the American Pavilion Theatre at the Brussels expo.

The web has arranged to fly the entire cast of 31 to Britain on Thursday (16). The tv version of the play will be directed by Philip Saville.

Off & Running for Next Season

With the '58-'59 tv season barely under way, agency tv programming executives are already shopping around for '59-'60 season. While the first results for this season are just coming in, executives at McCann-Erickson and Young & Rubicam are doing their shopping early.

Executives at McCann-Erickson are interested in the Mark VII production of Jack Webb's "D.A.'s Man." Liggett & Myers is the prospective client. Not to be caught napping, Young & Rubicam has had preliminary talks with Jack Paar's representatives on behalf of General Foods which is interested in obtaining him for a weekly half-hour show. While neither of these deals may come to pass, the agencies are off and running for the season ahead.

CBS-TV Reaches for New Level Of Writing on Projected Series

A new premium is being placed on the writer in the development of new program properties at CBS-TV. Web, in assigning pilot scripts, is reaching out for a new level of writing, setting deals with top film writers, novelists or tv writers who heretofore have eschewed the half-hour form in favor of the big live show.

As a result, six of the web's upcoming pilots have "class" spelled out in their scripting. Web has signed Claude Binyon, the vet screenwriter-director, for his first tv stint, to pen the pilot of "Young MacDonald," comedy series about a young, up-to-date farmer. J. P. Miller, whose original teleplay, "The Rabbit Trap," is now being filmed by Hecht-Hill-Lancaster, and whose "The Days of Wine and Roses" was done on "Playhouse 90" two weeks ago, has been inked to script the pilot of "The Woman in the Case," the Maureen O'Hara series.

Web is planning "Background Rome," a series to be filmed on location and concerning an FBI man on assignment to the Rome police. Peter Viertel wants to do the pilot and is in negotiation with the web for the assignment. Stan Rubin will produce. Robert Dozier has been set to do a revamped pilot (on tape) of "The World in White," the Sidney Kingsley series based on his "Men in White," with Peter Kortner to produce. Dozier is also doing three scripts for "The Lawyer" series. Rod Serling is penning his own pilot of "Twilight Zone," due to be filmed within the next month, and Budd Schulberg will be active in the writing on "Ross of the Everglades," series he and Stuart Schulberg are producing with CBS-TV.

Overall, inking of top writers, many of whom have never written a series before, represents an effort to "lift the level of writing" on the half-hour plane, according to Coast programming v.p. Bill Dozier, who's been assigning the writing chores on the projects.

This You Don't Fight

London, Oct. 14.

Last Sunday's (12) ABC-TV production of a new play entitled, "I Can Destroy the Sun," prompted ABC drama chief Philip Saville to write to the Royal Greenwich Observatory to find out what effect such an occurrence would have.

The reply stated: "I would point out that the destruction of the sun would presumably result in the complete cessation of all life—human, animal, and vegetable—on earth, and in the collapse of the whole of the solar system. Certainly television would become completely impossible."

You, Too, Can Be A Huge Success (Own a Tint Set)

Color tv set owners are better educated than Joe Doakes, entertain and are entertained more, wield influence, belong to civic or social service organizations, take part in political groups and volunteer work and are excellent prospects for a variety of goods and services. Besides, they are nuts about color tv.

These are some of the findings of the ColorTown, U. S. A. study jointly financed by BBDO and NBC. Release of the report this week by Hugh Beville, veep of NBC Planning and Research, and Ben Gedalecia, veep of research for BBDO, also reveals that 65% of color set owners have incomes over $7,506, while only 17% of the cross-section panel have incomes this high.

Four of 10 set owners have incomes of $10,000 or more, and eight out of 10 own their own homes. Half of those interviewed said they like to try new products as soon as they come on the market. On the other hand, 62% of black and white set owners said they like to wait until others had some experience with the product before they try it.

The ColorTown sample is a panel of 4,000 families surveyed from time to time regarding the influence of color tv. Todate, the studies have been made via the facilities of Advertest Research and will be continued through those of R. H. Bruskin Associates. The report is based on reactions in a typical medium-size city.

ANASTASIA PROGRAM BUMPED BY BBC-TV

London, Oct. 14.

Sir Ian Jacob, director-general of the BBC, has ordered that a BBC-TV program about a woman who claims to be Anastasia, should be scrapped, "so as not to pain relatives of the Grand Duchess." Among those related to the last Czar are the Queen and Prince Philip.

Jeanne Heal, w.k British tv personality, was scheduled to interview the woman, Anna Anderson, who lives in a hut in the Black Forest. Contracts for a 15-minute filmed program were drawn up and a camera crew were set to leave when Sir Ian's order came through.

CBS-TV to Shoot Four New Pilots

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

CBS-TV will shoot two pilot films within the next month, and has set two additional properties for filming at a later date. Going before the cameras will be Rod Serling's "Twilight Zone," which he's converted into a half-hour series, and "The Lawyer," Cameron Mitchell starrer which Julian Claman will produce. No producer on "Twilight," with Serling collaborating with CBS exec producer William Self and programming v.p. Bill Dozier in supervising the pilot.

New properties are "Young MacDonald," which Claude Binyon is writing and Claman producing, and "Background Rome," which Peter Viertel is dickering to script and Stan Rubin will produce. "Rome" will be shot there on location—both pilot and series to be filmed there—and concerns an FBI man on permanent assignment to the Roman police. "MacDonald" is a family comedy about a modern farmer.

Web has dropped two properties it had been developing. One is "The Movie Game," panel-quiz show about the motion picture industry. Other is the Barbara Nichols comedy about a secretary.

Already completed and in New York is the pilot (on tape) of "Peck's Bad Girl," projected as a live situation comedy and starring Patty McCormack.

NBC's $2,500,000 Windfall for AM

Some $2,500,000 in net revenue was obtained by NBC Radio Network Sales in recent weeks with large orders from Pharma-Craft and Hess and Clark as well as Pepsi-Cola, Purolator Products, Buick, and Brown & Williamson Tobacco.

Sponsors bought into such programs as "NBC News-on-the-Hour," "The Red Foley Show," and sports segments and Bob Hope comedy skits in "Monitor."

Other advertisers placing new orders included Aluminum Co. of America, Lever Bros., Lipton's Tea, General Foods, Voice of Temperance, Vitamin Corp. of America, Chrysler, RCA, Reader's Digest, Scholl Manufacturing, Mennen Co., Carter Products, Parker Bros., Bristol-Myers, Studebaker-Packard, P. Lorillard, American Rayon and Ford Motor Co.

CBS-TV'S PAY-AS-YOU-GO STAFF

More Fun With A Trendex

Between "Wagon Train" and Milton Berle, NBC-TV has Wednesday night pretty well locked up on the Trendex returns. Last week's Berle preem knocked off one of the highest ratings for the still-young season, getting a 31.2 as against 16.6 for "Millionaire" and 10.9 for Donna Reed. "Wagon Train" was a breeze, with a whopping 30.5 in its 8 to 8:30 segment against a 9.4 for the Lowell Thomas Adventure film on CBS and a 14.9 for ABC-TV's Lawrence Welk. Despite Berle's big audience, "Bat Masterson" couldn't hold on to it, slipping to 21.3 in the post-Berle segment while CBS' "I've Got A Secret" went out in front with a 25.5

Thursday night is divvied up between ABC (for the early part of the evening) and CBS (for the latter part), thanks to "Playhouse 90's" top draw. Big noise from 8 to 9:30 is ABC's trio of "Zorro," "Real McCoys" and Pat Boone, which slapped down all NBC-CBS competition, (with "McCoy's" 23.6 as the real thing). while "Playhouse 90" slugged Tennessee Ernie and "Rough Riders" in the 9:30 to 10 segment and Groucho Marx 10:30 to 11.

"Hit Parade" on its CBS-TV preem Friday night won over the 7:30 period with a 14.2 as against "Buckskin's" 10.9 and "Rin Tin Tin (11.1). (See separate story for ABC's Friday win on other segments). On Saturday "Perry Mason" went ahead of Perry Como in the 8 to 8:30 period, 25.1 to 24.5, but Como bounced back with a smashing 32.7 in the 8:30 to 9 seg against 17.6 for CBS' "Wanted—Dead Or Alive." "Cimarron City" preem was a disappointment, ratingwise, getting clobbered by "Have Gun," 26.0 to 10.5, and again in the 10 to 10:30 period it was walloped by "Gunsmoke" 29.3 to 12.0.

'Maverick" continued hot stuff on Sunday, sweeping all in its path, including Steve Allen and Ed Sullivan, registering 27.2 for the 8 to 8:30 period as against Allen's 12.4 and Sullivan's 14.0. On the 8 to 9 hour average, Sullivan got 17.0; Allen, 15.5. Dinah Shore topped GE Theatre 16.7 to 13.0 and inched out a win over Alfred Hitchcock, 22.6 to 22.1. Loretta Young at 10 was a Trendex smash—31.6 as against "$64,000 Question's" 12.4.

On Monday (13) NBC-TV's Hallmark Hall of Fame's production of "Johnny Belinda" took the lead over CBS-TV's "Bernadette" (Desilu Playhouse), "Belinda" averaging out 23.3 for the 90 minutes as against "Bernadette's 20.3 for its hour. Danny Thomas, who was way up there the previous week, was whittled down to a 22.8 as "Peter Gunn" in the 9 o'clock segment almost caught up with it with a 21.4. NBC's "Wells Fargo" licked "Father Knows Best," 20.7 to 18.9.

London, Oct. 14.

Total advertising expenditure of $11,316,000 on commercial television during September reflects the success of indie tv in Britain, over the past three years. During that period, according to Television Audience Measurements, the size of the audience has increased by more than 20,000,000 to the current total of 21,000,000. But the Nielsen Television Index, while agreeing that the growth of the audience has been remarkable, estimates the total commercial viewing public at a little under 18,000,000.

Media Records, which compile the amount of ad revenue on tv by assessing the number and lengths of commercials screened, in a breakdown of the month's total expenditure, reports that Associated-Rediffusion, the London outlet accounted for $2,596,400 of the total; Associated TeleVision with its London and Midland outlets, $2,442,700; ABC-TV, $1,892,400; Granada-TV, $2,438,300; Scottish Television, $765,000; Television Wales and the West, $733,200; and Southern TV, $442,500.

Sing It, Man

Theme song of the week, suggested by CBS' switch in Hartford:

"There'll Never Be Another U."

ABC Wins Fri. On 'Disney' & 'Sunset'

ABC-TV had itself a Trendex ball Friday night with its 8 to 9 "Walt Disney Presents" and the 9:30 to 11 feature film preem of "77 Sunset Strip." Disney with an average of 18.2 for the hour topped NBC's "Ellery Queen" and CBS' "Trackdown" and Jackie Gleason, latter getting a 16.6 to Disney's 19.4 for the 8:30 to 9 period.

CBS-TV's Phil Silvers in the 9 to 9:30 period had much the best of it over ABC's "Man With A Camera" (10.4) and NBC's "M Squad" (15.0) but for 9:30 to 11 ABC's "Sunset Strip" averaged out 18.3 over the 90-minute span against CBS-TV's 16.0 and NBC's 11.7. Perhaps most interesting aspect of the competitive race was "Sunsets" 19.8 victory over "Person to Person's" 15.2 for the 10:30-11 segment. At 9:30 to 10 CBS' "Schlitz Playhouse" barely nosed out "Sunset," 18.3 to 17.3.

Du P's Previews For TV Critics Are Put On Ice

Tomorrow night's (Thurs.) Du Pont Show of the Month presentation of "Little Women" on CBS-TV will be without benefit of advance reviews by the critics, as was done on its initial entry of the season, "Harvey." Not that the sponsor is timid about the reception it might get (in fact, du Pont is all for a continuance of the preview policy), but CBS apparently just doesn't think it's worth all the bother and trouble and hopes that for the time being the whole matter of previews will quietly pass into oblivion.

For one thing, out-of-town reviewers beefed to the network about according the preview privilege to New York critics while they were left out in the cold. CBS doesn't want to get involved in the expense of setting up closed-circuit facilities to permit coast-to-coast previews and, anyway, the N.Y. sentiment in favor of the practice has seemed to die down somewhat. CBS hopes it stays that way.

Bakery Bankrolls Ball

Sara Lee Bakeries in its first network television buy has inked to sponsor the one-shot "Imperial Ball" via ABC-TV on Thursday, Dec. 4. Stanza will be televised from N.Y.'s Hotel Astor between 11:30 p.m. and 12:30 a.m.

Guests of honor at the ball, web said, would be Prince Rainier and Princess Grace. Pact was signed through Cunningham & Walsh.

WEB SEZ IT PAYS TO BE CREATIVE

CBS-TV is making out quite a case for itself in its decision to build a strong program department both on an executive and creative personnel level. The network cites chapter and verse (on a variety of sponsorship deals with multi-million billings attributed directly to client respect for network strategy) in its argument that each and every appointment has been more than justified on a pay-as-you-go basis.

Imminent signaturing of Texaco (see separate story) to a $4,000,000 package deal, including eight "Man of the Hour" shows, is laid at the doorstep of the Nat Hiken-Lester Gottlieb within-the-network auspices, even though only a month ago the sponsor was weighing alternatives of a Sunday night ABC-TV series and an MCA anthology series for NBC. CBS persuaded Cunningham & Walsh, agency for Texaco, to withhold a decision until the "Man of the Hour" pilot was ready.

Procter & Gamble fourth-quarter buy-in on "Playhouse 90" (along with the upcoming "Pursuit") for nearly $1,000,000 is traced to P & G being sold on the initial two Fred Coe-produced "Playhouse" entries.

Similarly Mennen's $3,000,000 recent buy on "Pursuit" (with the other webs hot in pursuit of the billings) is laid to Grey agency and client's preference for "Pursuit's" creative production components.

CBS says Pontiac gave the network six of its eight specials for the '58-'59 season primarily because agency MacManus, John & Adams was hot for Bob Banner. (He produces the initial CBS Ginger Rogers offering.)

It's further pointed out that American Tobacco prexy Paul Hahn threw "Hit Parade" CBS' way because it came with up with a new format idea in competition with bidding for a NBC continuance or a move to ABC.

Also, after two years of jockeying by the webs to acquire "Nero Wolfe," Ed Fadiman, who owns the rights, settled for a CBS origination.

NBC's $2,000,000 Armour TV Biz

Gross billings of $2,000,000 for new daytime biz on NBC-TV came through this week when Armour & Co. placed a 52-week order for sponsorship of an alternate-week quarter-hour segment in three Monday-through-Friday programs as well as two alternate segments in a fourth program.

Sponsor bought into "Concentration," "It Could Be You." "Today Is Ours" and "Dough-Re-Mi." N. W. Ayer and Foote, Cone & Belding handled the account.

CBS TRIES AGAIN ON 'WORLD IN WHITE'

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

CBS-TV is making another attempt to whip "The World in White" into shape as a half-hour television series. Property, based on Sidney Kingsley's "Men in White," was done as a pilot last season in New York, with Kingsley as producer, but came acropper.

Now, the network will do a pilot on tape, projecting the show as a live series. Peter Kortner has been set as producer, and Robert Dozier is penning the pilot. Kortner, incidentally, has been given a rotating producer slot on the web's "Pursuit" as well as responsibility for the "White" pilot.

Murrow Appeals to Big Business To Sponsor 'Ideas & Information,' Help Elevate Program Standards

The Rat!

A tiny mouse blacked out the giant British Broadcasting Corp., television transmitter at Sheriff's Mountain here, and also put the streets of Londonderry town into darkness.

It had walked over a high-tension switch.

Big corporations who pay the freight for radio and tv programs were asked to help lift America's culture and heritage in an address by Edward R. Murrow, prepared for delivery today (Wed.) in Chicago at the convention of the Assn. of Radio and TV News Directors.

Filled with candor and pulling few punches because of the absence of a sustained study of the nation on radio and tv, Murrow did not exonerate the heads of networks, but thought that the big sponsors were in an excellent position to improve programming standards.

"Let us have a little competition," Murrow said. "Not only in selling soap, cigarets and automobiles, but in informing a troubled, apprehensive but receptive public. Why should not each of the 20 or 30 big corporations which dominate radio and tv, decide that they will give up one or two of their regularly scheduled programs each year, turn the time over to the networks, and say in effect: 'This is a tiny tithe, just a little bit of our profits. On this particular night we aren't going to try to sell cigarets or automobiles; this is merely a gesture to indicate our belief in the importance of ideas.' The networks should, and I think would, pay for the cost of producing the program. The advertiser, the sponsor, would get name credit, but would have nothing to do with the content of the program. Would this blemish the corporate image? Would the stockholders object? I think not.

"I am not talking here about editorializing, but about straightaway exposition as direct, unadorned and impartial, as fallible as human beings can make it just once in a while let us exalt the importance of ideas and information. Let us dream to the extent of saying that on a given Sunday the time normally occupied by Ed Sullivan is given over to a clinical survey of the state of American education, and a week or two later the time normally used by Steve Allen is devoted to a thoroughgoing study of American policy in the Middle East . . . Would anything happen other than that a few million people would have received a little illumination on subjects that may well determine the future of this country, and therefore the future of the corporations? This method would also provide real competition between the networks as to which could outdo the others in the palatable presentation of information. It would provide an outlet for the young men of skill, and there are some even of dedication, who would like to do something other than devise methods of insulating while selling."

Murrow said that broadcasters today are paying little attention to the pressing problems of the world. "There are, it is true, occasional informative programs presented in that intellectual ghetto on Sunday

$4,000,000 Texaco 'Man of the Hour' Specials-Grid Buy

Deal looked imminent last night (Tues.) for a $4,000,000 Texaco sponsorship package on CBS-TV involving entertainment and football.

The CBS $4,000,000 windfall covers a variety of programming, with Texaco latching on to eight "Man of the Hour" shows (this is the one-a-month live comedy entry produced-directed by Nat Hiken simulating Friars Club roasting of personalities); three other still-to-be-designated specials and a pickup of the New Year's Day Cotton Bowl classic.

CBS appears to have won out over the other webs in some hot competitive bidding for the billings.

A minor hassle developed when Texaco in planning to buy "Man of Hour" nixed the pilot show. CBS, rather than scrap it, may put it on sustaining prior to start of sponsorship.

GE's 'College Quiz' Coin

Also a hefty piece of General Electric change bounced into the CBS-TV coffers this week when the Houseware and Radio Division of GE decided to sponsor the new Sunday afternoon series of programs tagged "College Quiz Bowl" in the 5 to 5:30 p.m. slot starting Jan. 4.

Allan Ludden will emcee the show. Program is a Jack Cleary production in the form of a panel quiz with undergrads of colleges and universities matching their brains for cash prizes which will go to their school's scholarship funds.

Originations will be from colleges represented on the series. Maxon is the agency on the deal.

U.S. Army Also Into Closed-Circuit TV Biz, But Only for Teaching

Washington, Oct. 14.

The Army, with an investment in equipment of more than $100 million involved, has opened a 280-mile closed circuit telecast between its Redstone Arsenal in Huntsville, Ala., and the Army Armor School at Fort Knox, Ky.

It's being used to teach high ranking Army officers about guided missiles.

The Army said that using spectrum space reserved to the military for the closed circuit operation will save "considerable money" because equipment and instructors, both costly, can be used at both bases at the same time for instruction.

Cameras are making pickups from five locations in the Redstone Arsenal academic buildings and technical laboratories for the telecast.

The course is scheduled to run through June. Tests will be made in the meantime to evaluate the effectiveness of the technique for education in the missile field, the Army said.

Crest, a product of Procter & Gamble, has mapped out an estimated $1,000,000 advertising campaign using network television. Both NBC and CBS have picked up a share of the P&G coin. Crest inked for six half-hours on NBC-TV and an almost equal amount at CBS where the buy includes three half hours of "Playhouse 90" alternate weeks and one-third of two episodes of "Pursuit."

At NBC-TV the buy was for two half hoours alternate weeks of "Cimarron City," "Ellery Queen" and "Dragnet."

"The Time of Your Life"

as a sponsor of Playhouse 90

And you still can. There is an alternate-week half hour currently open for sponsorship on this unique and successful dramatic program.

In its first three productions this season it has earned the most unqualified critical acclaim. It has also won the attention of an intensely loyal audience, averaging 20 million viewers for each of its presentations—and outrating the average nighttime program on the other two networks by 32 per cent.

And this is only the beginning of the third season of Playhouse 90—a season that will bring to this weekly hour-and-a-half program, the most brilliant performers in the finest material obtainable.

In the weeks ahead you will see the distinguished actor Edward G. Robinson in "Shadows Tremble"; the noted German star Maria Schell in "Word From A Sealed-Off Box"; Henry James' famous novel "The Wings Of The Dove"; Ernest Hemingway's "The Undefeated"; William Faulkner's "The Wild Palms"; Joseph Conrad's "The Secret Agent"; and a new television play by Rod Serling.

Clearly an exciting season is in store for its viewers.

You will watch Playhouse 90 with even more enjoyment—if you watch it as one of its sponsors on the CBS Television Network.

Importance of Timing in Triggering New Vidpix Skeins for Syndication

Major dilemma of most major syndicators is when to trigger a series into the market.

The contingency order approach has its pitfalls, as many a syndicator, station and sponsor will aver. The "feel 'em out" without contractual obligations approach can be costly. (It's one thing expressing interest and another shelling out the dough.)

Proper answers to the dilemma is worth millions of dollars in the spanking $100,000,000 syndication biz.

Of course, the ideal situation is when the syndicator has a wide roster of advertisers and stations that he's been serving. With that roster as a mainstay, he can come into the market as expirations on a current skein expires. Time and again satisfied clents, be they stations or advertisers, will ride along on a new series from the same house.

Ziv has had a long record of success with the above formula, but even Ziv has been met by defections. Competition is keen and there are all sorts of surprises. For instance, one syndicator which had a successful western going last season, finds that despite good ratings, local stations and sponsors are shying away from oaters, arguing that an over supply of sagebrushes are offered by the three webs. Why duplicate an oater on the local level, too? That thinking has slowed down renewals, forecast as a sure thing.

Pitfalls of the contingency order method are these: If the skein proves to be a hot show, syndicator virtually kills off the possibility of a national sale by committing the show to syndication if enough orders are written. Then, there's also trouble with regionals.

Basis of greenlighting a contingent skein usually comes when about $465,000 in orders are written on a series, somewhat less than half the costs. With those activated contingent orders, the syndicator can go to the bank for financing.

But what happens, as often is the case, if the syndicator in need of that $3,000 to $3,500 from N. Y. and about $2,500 from Los Angeles, finds that the regional sponsor doesn't want to ride on the indie station. CBS and NBC affili-

CARE'S DRESSED-UP PUBSERVICE SPOTS

CARE, international relief agency, and its new film head, Robert Champlain, have come up with a new series of public service tv spots reportedly different from the stock pitches in which a stage or film star stands in front of a fireplace and makes a direct appeal for funds.

New series of CARE public service films employ big names but in every instance a story line is followed and appeal is either indirect or worked into story line. Group consists of a four-and-a-half-minute dance film featuring Bambi Linn and Rod Alexander; five one-minute spots: Victor Borge at the piano; a day with Clementine Paddleford, food editor of N. Y. Herald Trib; an animation; a refugee story, and a Thanksgiving dinner.

Dance film includes music by Canadian Broadcasting Corp. Symphony Orch conducted by Skitch Henderson; Borge's bit features his particular brand of comedy and the Clementine Paddleford spot has her in the Trib's testing kitchen with Isabel McGovern, another Trib food editor.

OF's 'Robin Hood' Sales

Official Films chalked up sales on "Robin Hood" in another five markets.

Deals were inked by WRGP, Chattanooga; WISC, Madison, Wis.; KMJ, Fresno; WFLA, Tampa, and KVIP, Redding, Calif.

In the sales department, Sherlee Barish has rejoined Official as special sales rep. Barney MacKall, formerly the company's representative in the northwestern area, has been made sales manager for the 11 western states. Both will report to Stan Smith, v.p. in charge of sales.

Bundle of Renewals On ABC Films '26 Men'

During the past two weeks, ABC Films has inked renewals on "26 Men," now in second year production, in 15 markets.

Deal includes: WLW-T, Cincinnati; WSFA, Montgomery; WFBC, Greenville; KREM, Spokane; WKJG, Ft. Wayne; KEYT, Santa Barbara; KFRE, Fresno; WEAR, Pensacola; KVAL, Eugene; KGW, Portland; KOMO, Seattle; WLWD, Dayton; WLWI, Indianapolis; and KFVS, Cape Girardeau.

North of the border, ABC subsid set a second-year deal for "The Life and Legend of Wyatt Earp," on the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. Renewals came from Cockfield, Brown & Co., for Campbell Soup, and McCann-Erickson for Christie, Brown Bisquit.

Price Stumbling Block in Goldwyn Sale of Features

Biggest block to the unloading of the Sam Goldwyn features to tv is the price sought.

For the 50 in the group, which includes some post-'48's, Goldwyn has asked as high as $10,000,000, or $200,000 per pic. Combination of deals bandied about precludes buying the negative rights, with negotiations centering about a licensing arrangement of up to seven years.

Even in these days of a dwindling supply of cinematics and upped prices, a $200,000 nut is considered prohibitive. No syndicator is arguing about the relative quality of the Goldwyn pix, but besides the factor of price, there's a lack of quantity in the Goldwyn backlog. Bulk selling keynotes the feature-to-tv operation with resultant price economies when leaders can be grouped with "B's."

Nevertheless, Goldwyn's new move to dump his library into the tv hopper has created a stir. National Telefilm Associates, which distributed the 20th-Fox product and other cinematics, will begin fresh talks with Goldwyn execs shortly. Metro TV also is weighing the possibility of entering straight tv distribution deal with Goldwyn.

Among the eight post-'48's in the Goldwyn package is Danny Kaye's "Hans Christian Andersen." Many in the Goldwyn package though have been made prior to 1939.

Denker's Religioso Film For Council of Churches

Henry Denker planed to the Coast this week to complete plans for the filming of his script "The Power of the Resurrection," for the National Council of Churches. Denker will co-produce the religious drama with Sam Hirsh and Family Films.

Alex Ferguson, director of film of the Broadcasting and Film Commission of the National Council, accompanied Denker to the coast. Hour-long Easter drama will be done in Eastman color and telecast next Easter Sunday.

Denker will choose a director and cast the 25 speaking roles during his stay on the coast.

WPIX, N. Y., one of the most heavily telefilmed stations in the country, is going into the new season with fresh billings of more than $3,000,000. Latter figure puts the Daily News indie 30.2% ahead of October of last year.

As in '57, when the sponsor pattern on the station changed, most of the sponsor coin is riding on participations rather than separate program buys. Of course, that's excepting the Kellogg buy of four shows stripped Monday through Thursday.

Big change this season in programming concept is the grouping of syndicated shows into thematic "Blocknight" programming — one night comedy shows, the next mystery, et al. Sponsors are buying that approach and it may cue moves by other indies across the country to copy WPIX's style. Key to such programming is a wide array of product. Daily News indie has 70 half-hour shows, 20 of them first-runs.

Of the $3,000,000 in fresh billings, about 97% represents national advertisers. Latest advertisers to join the WPIX roster include: Ford, Pontiac, Congoleum, General Foods, Max Factor and Hormel.

Station, which had a click last April with "The Russian Revolution," is prepping another hour-long documentary, "The Private Life of Adolf Hitler." Like the Russian revolution documentary, the Hitler show will be composed mainly of footage from a theatrical release. Other footage sources, too, have been culled for added material. Program is being coproduced by station's film manager Bill Cooper and news director Walter Engels.

"Revolution" documentary, syndicated by the station in most major markets, is being repeated on Nov. 18.

N.Y. Film Producers Expedite Bid For Joint Tape Prod. Facilities

Over 30 New York film producers are attempting to establish joint tape production facilities. Film Producers Assn., which has a reported 36 members, is meeting this week to appoint a committee to develop the plan.

FPA figures it will cost at least $1,000,000 to equip a studio with adequate tape facilities. In broad outline, FPA members will contribute to establishing the plant from which they will rent facilities.

In the past few months, FPA has approached Reeves Sound Studios, but Reeves reportedly rejected the idea of establishing a lavish tape center on the premises because at the time various FPA members were not willing to commit themselves to a fixed volume of tape work. It's understood that one of the FPA associate members, Movielab, came to the group and tried with FPA's cooperation to set up a studio rental setup of its own, but that collaboration also failed.

The committee which is appointed is expected to hold its first meeting next week. Present as observers will be executives of the International Alliance of Theatrical & Stage Employees. The IA, in its FPA contract, gave the organization's members until December, 1959, to experiment in tape and the founding of "competitive rates," so FPA feels the union should be present in any formulative steps the producers' body is taking in tape.

Elliot, Unger & Elliot and Filmways are the only two FPA members which have tape machinery of their own at present. But, as an FPA spokesman said, these companies have not made provisions for largescale tape operation.

This joint step is in line with FPA's recent gripe to Washington that the webs threaten to eliminate the tape competition of the indie producers. Therefore, the FPA members want a facility which they feel will be competitive to anything that CBS, ABC or NBC now have.

Can 'Silents' Be Doctored For TV Sale? Not Considered Practical

Paramount's plan to "doctor" its silent pix for tv distribution was shrugged off as unsound by one vet feature-to-tv distributor.

Whole surge of the video cinematic distribution field is to get fresher pix on the airwaves. Now along comes Paramount resurrecting the silents, aware that the feature pool of pre-'48's is running dry and no post-'48 guild agreement is in sight. Distrib exec, who had handled millions in feature to tv sales, said he could not blame Paramount for the gold gleam in its eye, nor the other majors, if they have similar plans, but it won't work in today's market.

He acknowledged that silents may make for a curio show on tv, similar to Sterling's "Movie Museum," but that's about all.

A brighter tack was taken by one o&o station film buyer. He felt that tv could use the old silent "classics," those starring Rudolph Valentino, Norma Talmadge or Greta Garbo for example. The original "Ben Hur," "Ten Commandments," "Samson and Delilah," and others such as "Big Parade" and "Seventh Heaven" were considered by him as acceptable tv fare.

But getting away from the selective "classics" approach was considered by him of little or no value for telecasting.

Paramount's deal with MCA TV doesn't take in the silents. The company has 1,500 pre-talky pictures and has embarked on an experiment to "doctor" them for tv.

Metro TV also has silents gathering dust in the vaults, but, after some consideration, decided that they weren't economical to market for tv.

Kingsley Designates 7 New Account Execs

Buildup of Independent Television Corp., which acquired Television Programs of America, continues. Prez Walter Kingsley hired seven new account execs and promoted five sales execs to the newly-created post of district manager.

New sales execs include: Scott McKeown, Edward O'Brien, Paul Kempner, Richard Rudolph, Coleman Scott, Larry Stewart and Walter Stovall.

Getting their district manager stripe are Ralph Baron, Lee Cannon, Casper Chouinard, Hugh Simpson and Alton Whitehouse. Baron, Simpson and Whitehouse will be assigned to the eastern division; Cannon, Chouinard to the central division.

SPG Takes 'Moral' Stand in Favor Of Residual Payment

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Long reluctant to take a stand on the issue, the Screen Producers Guild last week reversed its field and backed the "moral right" of telefilm producers to residual payments. Action came at a meeting of the executive board, which endorsed the report of the SPG's Television Committee, headed by Lou Edelman and repping 50 tv members of the guild.

Since SPG is not a union and has no contractual relationships with the studios, the resolution favoring residuals for telefilm producers was a little more than "an expression of policy," according to Edelman. He said that granting of residuals is still a long way off, but now that it's official policy of the SPG, attempts will be made to sit down with telefilm production companies and come to a meeting of the minds.

Next step for the SPG will be the appointment of a committee by prexy Carey Wilson to work on the problem. Committee will probably be directed to draw up a Code of Practice for telefilm companies similar to the one in existence between the SPG and the major studios covering theatrical production, except that the telefilm code would assert the right of producers to residual payments. Such a code would not be binding, but would merely be an expression of understanding between studios and SPG.

The report endorsed by the board stated that "the television film producer has a moral right to rerun or residual payments at least as strong as the writer, director and actor. The situation involving reruns or residual payments to other creative workers, and not to the producer, is both morally unjust and economically unsound.

"We firmly believe that management cannot and will not remain blind to the fact that the tv producer is entitled to such a future income status since the producer is the key figure, the permanent day-to-day creative force to whom the advertising agencies and their clients, as well as the networks and independent stations, look for the welfare of their shows. The writer, director and actor are generally employed on an intermittent basis."

SPG's reluctance in the past to take a stand on the issue stems largely from the fact that a great part of the membership is not involved in television but function solely in the theatrical production field.

SG UPS STATUS OF PIERRE MARQUIS

Pierre Marquis' star has risen still further at Screen Gems, with the director of sales planning also taking over aegis of advertising and promotion. Advertising and promotion were under the direction until now of Henry White.

Marquis began at Screen Gems two years ago as research chief, but as time progressed he got further and further into helping with the blueprinting of sales strategy, hence the sales planning title.

White began at SG in 1955, as ad-promo director, and later became director of program procurement. Last spring, in ostensibly a temporary measure during the telefilm selling season, White got involved in SG network sales, and promo was tentatively put under Marquis' administration. The appointments this week make the shifts permanent.

White keeps program procurement and, in sales, reports to veep John Mitchell. White was responsible, it is said, for a couple of key network deals by Screen Gems, his first dating back to the signing of "Shirley Temple Storybook" for production.

Metro TV Active At NAB Regional Meets

Since the National Assn. of Broadcasters edict barring exhibits of telefilm companies from national conventions, Metro TV has been attending the regional meets, as suggested by NAB.

Various Metro TV execs taking in the regional meets report attendance by other vidfilm and feature sales execs spotty. But as far as Metro TV is concerned, sales manager Richard Harper finds the regionals very helpful in solidifying station relations. There is little, if any, on-the-spot selling, but good relations lead to sales, Harper adds. Metro TV will have a sales exec at the NAB regional Milwaukee meet, now in session (Wed.).

ENVISION AN ALL-TAPE FUTURE

British Vidfilm—All at Sea

London, Oct. 14.

The first of several new style filmed tv shows will go into production aboard the liner Empress of Britain when it sails from Liverpool for Montreal on Friday (17). The program entitled the "Atlantic Show," is being produced by Hughie Green for G. M. Air Interests, an independent production company in which Green is partners with promotion and ideas man John Hayman.

The program will feature a solo spot on board by Duke Ellington, who'll make his contribution before the ship sails. Others taking part are George Formby, David Whitfield, Jacqueline Delman, Shirley Bassey, Alan Bruce, Jackie Rae, Hughie Green, Libby Morris, the Malcolm Mitchell Trio, Lionel and Joyce Blair, and the Steve Race and Jimmy Nair orchs.

The program, which is described as a spectacular type show which incorporates interest and entertainment, will run for 60 minutes and is likely to go on the air, probably via Associated TeleVision, early in January. Script is by Hughie Green and James Coghill.

If the first show works out, it is planned to produce similar programs on board liners en route to the Argentine and Australia.

H'wood TV Film Industry Settles Down to a $155,000,000-a-Year Biz With But Little Fluctuation Expected

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Whatever the fluctuating fortunes of the motion picture business, Hollywood's television film industry has now reached a plateau which it can reasonably be expected to maintain over the next few years. Telefilm, it appears, will settle down over the coming years as a $155,000,000-a-year Hollywood industry, with little deviation from that mark expected, unless it's a hike in the figure due to rising production costs.

Stabilization of the telefilm field stems from two basic factors: (1) the networks have now reached the point where their scheduling has shaken down to approximately 55 to 60% film. That's a total of about 60 film shows per year on all three webs. (2) The syndication business has now reached a level of output of 40 new series a year, and it's expected it will maintain that output indefinitely.

Since these are the only two releasing sources for telefilms, apart from ventures like the NTA Film Network, which is limited in terms of programming, the combination of network and syndication availabilities is the controlling factor over Hollywood telefilm output. It's likely, therefore, that the industry's output will be stabilized at about 100 series of 39 episodes each per year. At going costs, these run in the area of $155,000,000.

This figure, of course, doesn't include pilot films, which run up a considerable production bill over the course of a season, or commercials, a considerable industry of its own. Nor does it include the possibility of expansion of such ventures as the NTA Film Network or a possible upbeat in the syndication business, due to a new demand for programming from those station sources whose feature film backlogs are running dry. These, of course, are just additional plusses.

Roach Buying ABC 50% RABCO Share

Hal Roach Studios is in the process of buying out ABC Films' 50% interest in RABCO.

RABCO was set up about five years ago as a co-venture owned jointly by Hal Roach studios and the ABC syndication subsid. It owns "Passport to Danger," 39 episodes; "Code 3," 39 half-hours; and "Racket Squad," 198 episodes. RABCO also owns a number of pilots, including "Forest Ranger," produced by Ben Fox.

Under the deal, Hal Roach Studios would acquire all rights to the RABCO properties, including distribution rights. Deal would give Roach Studios a backlog of film to

Doris Kenyon Pacted For 'Claudia' Series

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Doris Kenyon has been signed to play the mother role in Rose Franken's "Claudia," with the pilot of the vidseries due to roll Nov. 17 at McCadden Productions. Richard Kinon will direct.

Anne Francis plays the title role. Producers William Meloney and Armand Deutsch said a week before filming tests will be made for an actor to essay the part of David.

AAP Buy Gives UA $28,000,000 In Pix Contracts

When United Artists completes its takeover of Associated Artists Productions it'll be getting $28,000,000 in feature film contracts, which evidently constitute the principal reason for the buyout.

AAP, which becomes part of UA Associated, company formed to affect the buyout, already grossed a reported $20,000,000 on sale of its Warner features for tv. That sum is slightly less than AAP paid for the entire 760-film library.

Besides the prospect of $28,000,000 in eventual station payoffs, UA still has sales potentials in certain markets, plus the longterm residual value of the flicks.

MORE MCA-TV SALES ON PAR FEATURES

MCA-TV clicked off three additional markets this week, all Paramount pix libreary deals.

Stations lining up for the pix were WTOL-TV, Toledo; WBAL-TV, Baltimore; and WJBK, Detroit. Interesting aspect of the three deals is the competitive situation in each of the markets. WTOL is the new Toledo station. Westinghouse's WJZ in Baltimore has a heavy feature backlog, including the Metro pix. CKLW, in the Detroit-Windsor market, also has a heavy cinematic backlog, including the Metro library.

Latest deals put the Par pix in 21 markets.

Peggy Lee Series

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

A dramatic vidseries starring vocalist Peggy Lee is being planned by indie producer Gene Corman and Miss Lee's personal manager James H. Hines.

Pilot is tentatively scheduled to be filmed at the Kling Studios.

SEE DROPPING OF FILM ENTIRELY

By ART WOODSTONE

To see electronic tape playing a "significant part" in television's future no longer is accepted as an adequate description of the circumstances tape is creating. As time passes, experts feel that tape will entirely eliminate film in the making of video's entertainment programs.

Predictions are that within the next two to five years film will become economically, as well as technically impracticable, except in isolated instances such as perhaps the recording of foreign news stories.

Belief is that network television, because of its technical capacity, will capitulate to tape first, even though the great majority of network programs are presently done on film. However, there are economic reasons being put forth as to why tape will eliminate film in tv program syndication. Feeling is producers won't find it at all sound producing film to compete with their own tape shows in the limited syndicated market.

One company, Guild Films, has jettisoned film and has gone in for tape syndication entirely. California National Productions and Screen Gems intend to wet their feet shortly. But the rest of the syndicators intend, for the time, to wait until more tv stations are equipped to transmit tape programs. However, it is felt it is only a matter of time before tape installations saturate the country, at least saturate the top 100 or so markets, which happen to contribute the very largest share of syndication's largesse.

More Costly Than Film

As was noted by VARIETY in recent weeks, tape presently is more costly than film production. The principal reason is that the machinery involved in transcribing on tape is not being used sufficiently to amortize the great initial expenditures. Even at this relatively early stage in the pursuit of tape, it has become axiomatic that tape will not become a money saver until each tape plant is put to maximum use.

It's not likely syndicators will establish their own tape studios for awhile. But as the remaining technical problems of tape are solved, it is expected that all syndicators will be driven to establishing their plants or joining with others in their establishments, if only by competitive cost factors.

Fact that the syndicated market has a limited sales potential coupled with the high cost of installing adequate tape production facilities is enough to squeeze film out, it is held.

Syndicated market has never been able to support more than 20 to 25 shows a year. Stations don't have the time availabilities necessary to support all the programs made for syndication. And since it is assumed by the experts that producers won't want to delay amortizing the cost of tape machinery, they won't, in a sense,

Dominick Dunne Exits CBS to Join Manulis

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Dominick Dunne, former exec assistant to Martin Manulis on "Playhouse 90," is resigning his program post at CBS to join Manulis at 20th as a tv producer. This is the first exec appointment by Manulis since joining studio.

Dunne will function in a supervisory capacity in program development, screening properties, hiring writers, whipping shows into shape. Manulis plans to sign three or four other producers for same status.

It's Now Gross-Krasne-Sillerman With Ex-TPA Exec as New Prexy In Bid for Dominant Prod.-Dist. Status

Michael M. Sillerman, who resigned as exec v.p. of Television Programs of America following TPA's acquisition by Jack Wrather's Independent Television Corp., has entered into a partnership deal with Jack Gross and Phil Krasne, with the G-K operation becoming known as Gross-Krasne-Sillerman. Sillerman is the new president of the company, with Krasne as chairman and Gross as vice chairman. Actually it becomes a four-way partnership combine, with Wall St. coin also tied in to the operation.

With the addition of Sillerman and the Wall St. interests, the expanded Gross-Krasne-Sillerman setup is thus making a bid for a preeminent status in tv film production and distribution. The move further reflects the stepped-up rivalry for giant status in the biz at a time which finds the smaller companies fading from the picture via the merger or sellout route.

G-K-S goes into the fray with an impressive catalog of entries, including four new series in production; it has such facilities as California Studios in Hollywood; a British production affiliate, Gross-Krasne Ltd., now producing two series; an existing sales organization with six sales offices in six major cities (N. Y., L. A., Chi, Frisco, Atlanta and Dallas); and foreign production facilities including Australia and Africa.

New shows in production are "Glencannon" starring Thomas Mitchell (24 episodes have already been made in London; with a 45-West Coast-market sale to Olympia Brewing Co.); "Flying Doctor," also a London-made series starring Dick Denning; "Trader Horn" (pilot is completed) and still untitled anthology series.

Since the teamup of Gross-Krasne in 1949, they have been riding with "Big Town," "O. Henry Playhouse," "Lone Wolf," "African Patrol" and others.

Sillerman's bigtime status in the tv sales arena goes back to the days when, prior to TPA, he was senior sales exec at Ziv and founder of president of Keystone Broadcasting Network and a veepee of Biow agency.

Britain Hikes Repeat Fees on Vidblurbs

London, Oct. 14.

The main feature of a revised agreement for the employment of performers in filmed tv commercials provides increased fees for repeat transmissions and the reclassification of tv stations for this purpose.

The agreement, signed by the Association of Specialized Film Producers, British Actors' Equity Association and the Institute of Practitioners in Advertising, goes into effect Oct. 31. The new act provides for payments to actors based on the relative size of the viewing audience. The studio minimum fee, however, remains unchanged.

Hackett Blames Recession For OF's 180G Loss

Official Films suffered a net loss of $180,095 for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958, according to the company's annual report.

Prez Harold L. Hackett, in a letter to stockholders, blamed the loss on the recession which prevailed when the company embarked on its big syndication expansion last fall, handling three series simultaneously. They were "Decoy," "Sword of Freedom" and "The Big Story," the latter skein now taken over by Flamingo Films.

Hackett at the stockholders meeting acknowledged exploratory merger talks have been held with Guild Films. He also stated that Hal Roach Studios, now owned by Scranton Corp., has broached Official Films for a possible acquisition deal. But he declined any forecast as to the outcome of the preliminary talks.

Hackett also reported that the company has taken a "firm hedge against the receding market," cutting costs, reorganizing the sales force and redistributing sales territories. He added that current sales reports indicate that the domestic markets are showing revived and increased activity.

Distribution commission and gross profit from sales for the fiscal year was put at $1,912,384. Write-down of contract rights was listed at $1,148,617, with selling, promotion and general expenses of $1,178,494, resulting in a gross loss of $414,726. Other income and adjustment of federal income tax lessened that loss to $180,095.

The balance sheet put total current assets at $2,662,783 and total current liabilities at $1,601,399.

Stockholders at the annual meet reelected the present board of directors.

HAL ROACH ON PROWL FOR SYNDICATION ARM

Hal Roach Jr., topper of the Roach studios, is busily engaged looking for a syndication arm.

Before returning to the Coast, he held confabs with three smaller syndication firms, Official Films, Guild Films and Flamingo. Talks at this stage were described as exploratory, with no firm commitments taken.

Hal Roach Studios are now owned by the Scranton Corp., which bought the Mutual network and is seeking to diversify further in the entertainment field.

WTOP'S $2,000,000 Stake in Features

Washington, Oct. 14.

WTOP-TV under prexy Johns Hayes has sunk $2,000,000 in pre-'48 films which will keep the station's various "early" and "late" shows going until 1961. And, Hayes told VARIETY, he intends to keep buying to run the series through 1965.

The result of Hayes' extensive purchases has left Washington's other three stations few upper class motion pictures to acquire for their existing film libraries.

"The only risk we're running," said Hayes, "is that the public will change its taste during the next few years and not want to see movies on tv. But we don't expect that to happen, or we wouldn't be making this sizeable investment."

WTOP-TV now has slightly in excess of 1,200 feature films, of Herbert Bayard Swope Jr. has signed to function as exec producer at TCF-TV, 20th tv subsid, working as top aide to production chief Martin Manulis.

OCT. 1948: 900,000 VIEWERS!

Milton Berle is back. His premiere show last Wednesday was viewed by the greatest audience of any new show this season. It was larger than the combined audiences of competing shows on the other two networks.

Valentine's Exit in McCann-Erickson Shakeup of Com'l Sector Linked To Tinker Vs. Clyne Joust for Control

By JACK BERNSTEIN

McCann-Erickson, one of the three top agencies in air media billings, has completely shaken up its television commercial department and reorganized the sector with department head Chris Valentine resigning from the agency in what is regarded as a battle for power between Terry Clyne, v.p. and director and the radio-tv department and John H. Tinker, senior veepee in charge of creative administration. From the results of the changeover in the department it appears as if Tinker won the battle to have all the creative people at the agency under the same roof and the agency's creative sector (art and copy) wrested control of the blurbs away from Clyne's supervision.

Valentine, regarded as "Clyne's boy" was hired away from the Biow Agency by radio-tv director himself to head up the commercial side of the tv sector. He had been in charge of television commercial production and had an estimated two-dozen employees under his wing. Valentine left the agency approximately three weeks ago with McCann-Erickson making no announcement of the reshuffling of the department.

The changeover of the whole commercial tv setup has been cloaked in secrecy and is regarded as a "sore point" at the agency. The battle for power at the agency, insiders say, was brewing for a long time, but the torch wasn't lit until some Buick commercials appeared which Tinker felt were not satisfactory. Executives at the agency state the change was planned back in June and went into effect in July. The move is described as a "desire on the part of McCann-Erickson to bring all creative people at the agency under the same roof and to eliminate the department status of the tv producers."

Instead of the one department head, the agency has formed a hierarchy under the account system. The 13 television producers of the agency now report to six associate creative directors. The producers are now under the direction of Robert Dall's Acqua, senior tv producer. Under the new chain of command the six associate creative directors report to Donald Calhoun, v.p. and creative director of the agency. Calhoun in turn is directed by John H. Tinker, senior veepee in charge of creative administration. Working alongside Calhoun is Margo Sherman, creative administrative director and chairman of the creative plans board at the agency.

Until now, McCann-Erickson, like many other agencies when shooting commercials on the Coast, would send an executive from the commercial packager to supervise his own production there. Under the new system, with Tinker in the driver's seat, whenever McCann-Erickson decides to lense in Hollywood, one of Tinker's copywriters will go Coastward to act as supervisor of the shooting. The writer will report directly during the job to Charlie Powers, in charge of the agency's Coast office. Insiders say this is unusual since copywriters never have had much of a say in commercial matters.

SHORTS: The decision of where the billings of the multi-million dollar Maxwell ground-coffee account is to be placed is expected to be decided this week. Agency row has been humming since General Foods dropped Benton & Bowles with top contenders appearing to be Ogilvy, Benson & Mather, William Esty and Kenyon & Eckhardt.

Misleading advertising and falsification in price advertising will be under attack by the Federal Trade Commission which will crack down on advertisers in an intensified enforcement policy.

BBDO has installed the first private teletypewriter system in the advertising field. The agency's headquarters on Madison Ave. are linked with eight of its branch offices by the system. Up-to-the-minute media availabilities, quick changes in newspaper, magazine and television copy, and general administration are handled by the new teletypewriter system.

Weiss & Geller, which instituted a breach of contract suit against Bon Ami for $115,144 for breach of contract for services rendered, expects the case to be settled out of court this week. An executive of the agency stated that "Bon Ami knows they don't have a leg to stand on and want to settle." Meetings between lawyers of both contending parties are planned throughout the week. Bon Ami signed a contract with the agency in February and later repudiated the contract and appointed Cole, Fischer & Rogow to handle the account.

Lestoil, handled by a house agency, Jackson, in Holyoke, is reported to have increased its ad budget from $9,000,000 to $14,000,000 and the firm is laying plans to conquer the midwest.

The Eastern annual conference of the AAAA, the largest yearly meeting of agency people, will be held this year on Oct. 27-28 at the Biltmore in N. Y.

SWITCHES: Everard W. Meade has been appointed veepee of Ogilvy, Benson & Mather for television and radio commercial development. He was formerly v.p. and director of the radio-tv sector of Young & Rubicam.

Frank Sharpe, administrative supervisor of Reach, McClinton, also has been named manager of the tv traffic department. James W. Gale and Sylvan Blake have joined the sector.

London Agencies

By BARRY BARNETT

London, Oct. 14.

The comparatively new Cow and Gate's food line, canned creamed rice milk pudding, is the subject of a concentrated advertising campaign being handled by the Clifford Bloxham & Partners agency. A feature of this promotion is the gift offer of six polythene food mags free to anyone who sends in the labels from two cans of the product. The campaign involves 160 four-column or two-column ads in 17 provincial papers in southern and eastern England, as well as frequent seven-second and 15-second spots on tv in the London, Midland and Welsh stations.

The W. S. Crawford agency is handling a big tv campaign for Smith's Potato Crisps which is scheduled to run from this month through next March. Drive will use seven-second spots on all indie tv stations, plus support by space taken in the food, catering and licensed trade journals and ads in northeast England newspapers.

TV demonstration on how the Hoover steam or dry iron can make life easier for the housewife are the subject of a series of filmed adverts made by Television Advertising for the Clifford Bloxham & Partners agency. The series of tv commercial is attuned to the different day-to-day reactions of housewives to their weekly laundering chores. Each spot is linked to a different day of the week. The spots will be of 30, 45 and 60-seconds duration.

John Cunningham (& Walsh) Sings Happier TV Tune

John Cunningham, prexy of Cunningham & Walsh, during the '57-'58 tv season aroused the ire of his fellow agencymen and had them smarting over his remarks about the "low level of television programming" and the fact that he felt tv was getting strangled by the "boredom factor and imitation." Cunningham now states that tv is the most powerful medium put into the hands of advertisers and feels the evils of the tool will cure itself.

"At one time, agencymen with small accounts in the house were afraid that large accounts would monopolize the airwaves tieing up the best time periods so that accounts without millions to spend wouldn't be able to use television at all. The cost of tv has solved this problem and advertisers with huge billings to spend still can't tie up the medium, and on the other hand, small advertisers can buy participations, spots and even specials if their budgets will allow.

"One of the things I sounded off about last year was the imitation of tv programming. Even this problem will cure itself. We had a rash of quiz shows, westerns, and singers last season but you'll notice only the best survived. When you get too much of any one type of programming, it's only natural that weak shows will fall by the wayside."

Cunningham states that tv is important from an advertising viewpoint because if the public is bored then the sets in use will fall off and the ad industry will be losing its mass audiences. If the programming is weak then the accompanying commercials will be downgraded and the medium will lose its power as an advertising tool.

Houston — Frank Stewart has been named manager of KPRC, according to Jack Harris, veepee and general manager. Jack McGrew will continue as head of KPRC-TV and as assistant general manager of the entire operation.

THE WINNING OF THE WEST

The Hartford Story

CBS' decision to drop its UHF o & o operation in Hartford in favor of negotiating an affiliation with Travelers' Insurance WTIC-TV (a VHF) in the same city, could well be a case of Columbia anticipating a similar move by NBC and jumping the gun on its rival. It would have come as much less of a surprise to the industry (and in fact such a move was expected) had NBC negotiated the same deal with the Paul Morency-helmed WTIC-TV by dropping its own UHF'er serving the Greater Connecticut Valley —WNBC-TV in New Britain. The Morency-WTIC tie with NBC goes back almost to the beginning of broadcasting. Morency's radio arm is still an NBC affiliate and will continue as such.

Thus with CBS shedding its U in Hartford, both networks are left with one U, NBC having disposed of its Buffalo U (WBUF) a few months back in affiliating with a Buff V. CBS' other U stake is in Milwaukee, where, says the network, it intends to stand pat with WXIX. In fact, the Columbia station suggests it will "seek another UHF investment" to return to maximum two-stations U ownership, but elsewhere the comment's been raised: "Remind CBS of that statement a year from today."

CBS move is considered quite a break for WTIC-TV, a latecomer in the V sweepstakes which, bereft of any network affiliation, was, from all accounts, finding it rough going. It was expected that eventually Morency would maneuver a network tie.

Big question now is: should NBC decide to drop its New Britain U, where can it turn for a V serving the Hartford area? Network, it appears, is at the break-even point on WNBC-TV, with CBS' o & o at about the same status, but the network suggested that a continuance would have "placed the network at a grave risk of a serious competitive disadvantage for the indefinite future," possibly envisioning NBC beating it to the punch in grabbing off the V affiliation.

There's no question that the CBS action (as with NBC in Buffalo) hurts the whole UHF cause (as well as pinkslipping a flock of employees, variously estimated at about 60). In view of the fact that network practices are under attack from D. C. sleuths, there was some feeling that the webs would move with caution in getting off the U hook, but CBS probably figured "If NBC could do it in Buffalo, why can't we do it in Hartford?"

'Pursuit' Pre-Taping Demonstrates New Era of Network TV Flexibility

By the time it hits the air next Wednesday (22), CBS-TV's new "Pursuit" will have three shows "on the reel"—the videotape equivalent of telefilms' "in the can," and the network hopes to maintain at least that large a margin of safety throughout the season. Therein lies one of the first case studies of a pre-taped television series, of which there are bound to be several more this season and in the future.

In all respects but the advance videotaping, "Pursuit" is being done exactly like a live show, according to CBS-TV Coast programming v.p. Bill Dozier. Even the rehearsal schedules are written with the "dress rehearsal" and "on air" annotations, except that the on-the-air cue is dated Sundays at 5:30 p.m., instead of Wednesdays at 5, when the show would ordinarily be done as a live origination on the eastbound feed. Rehearsal schedules and entire production setup is the same as a live entry.

Why tape, then, and why Sunday production? As for the timing, Dozier states Sunday's the best day, insofar as the juggling of crews and facilities at Television City are concerned. It's a slack period, and there's some small savings in studio overhead involved.

Despite these savings, however, the shows can run to slightly higher costs than live programming,

ABC, 13 Pressagents Deadlocked on Talks In New Pay Demands

Thirteen ABC pressagents based in N. Y. called for rates and working conditions similar to those for NBC's Coast flack shop. NBC now pays its planters on the Coast $140 to start, with the weekly take working up to over $180 a week after five years.

Last week, ABC and the spokesman for the 13 men, newly formed into a National Assn. of Broadcast Employees shop, came to a deadlock on wage talks. However, the network disclosed that new meetings are scheduled for this week.

NBC on the Coast is also repped by NABET. Since NABET controls ABC's technicians and engineers, failure to reach an agreement with the Gotham planters could result in a company-wide strike.

Martin Stone Buys Another AM Station

Radio Westchester Inc. is buying Radio New Rochelle Inc. outlets WNRC-AM and WNRC-FM in New Rochelle, N. Y. Radio Westchester is owned by Martin Stone, radio-tv package producer and co-owner of WVIP, 1,000-watt daytimer in Mt. Kisco, N.Y.

Stone is reportedly paying $225,000 for the New Rochelle outlet and will "network" certain programs over WVIP and WNRC in an effort to combine both upper and lower Westchester for full Westchester coverage.

Application for FCC approval was filed last Friday (10).

High Court Agrees To Tackle B'cast Politico Libel Case

Washington, Oct. 14.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in its first regular business day of the new season, agreed Monday (13) to tackle the question of whether broadcasters are liable for defamatory remarks made by politicos granted equal time.

The equal time case—Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union vs. WDAY—was up on appeal from the North Dakota Supreme Court, which held that stations could not be sued for libelous statements made by a candidate given equal air time.

WDAY, Fargo, N.D., had allowed A. C. Townley, Independent candidate during the 1956 senatorial race, to go on the air with a statement alleging that the Farmers' organization was bent on Communist objectives. WDAY claims its hands were tied because the Federal Communications Act required it to give Townley equal time and barred it from censoring his remarks.

The North Dakota Division of the Farmers Union, in appealing for the review, declared that if the North Dakota Court's decision is allowed to stand "the door will be open to shocking possibilities in future political campaigns."

BURBANK RULES NBC 'LIVE' ROOST

When Steve Allen moves his Sunday night 8 to 9 show to the Coast in '58, it will leave NBC TV with only one live nighttime variety entry originating out of New York—the Perry Como Show.

Only a few years back the N.Y. "live" scorecard read: Milton Berle, Martha Raye, Imogene Coca, Sid Caesar, Hit Parade, "All-Star Revue," and even Martin & Lewis (then a team) would frequently come in to originate many of their shows from NBC studios in N.Y. Those were the days when NBC was lend-leasing, not trying to dispose of theatres.

But as far as NBC is concerned, things have altered drastically. For a while it was generally agreed at the network that "film shows will come out of the Coast; N.Y. will still be headquarters for variety shows." But that, too, has changed. True, quiz-panel shows along with some daytime entries and the fringe "Tonight" show carry a "Manhattan originating" tagline, but otherwise the big live noise will emanate from Burbank.

CBS-TV has managed to achieve more of a balanced east-west program schedule, with such bigleague variety entries as Ed Sullivan, the Garry Moore Show, Arthur Godfrey, Hit Parade and Jackie Gleason berthed east of the Hudson (as well as the N.Y.-filmed Phil Silvers Show).

There's even been a diminution of N.Y.-originating NBC specials in contrast to the days when Max Liebman and "Producers Showcase" were keeping things alive at the web's Brooklyn color studios. There will still be some Gothamberthed specials, such as Hallmark Hall of the Fame, but the Burbank ascendancy even in this area becomes more and more pronounced.

For some time now NBC has been trying to shed itself of some of its theatre facilities commitments; has been dickering to dispose of the no-longer-needed Century Theatre to the Shuberts.

NBC-WBC Station Swap To Invite High Court's 'Schizophrenia' Ruling

Washington, Oct. 14.

A prime case of governmental "schizophrenia" will be undergoing U.S. Supreme Court analysis soon.

Simply stated, the question is whether Federal Communications Commission approval of a broadcasting transaction shuts the door on anti-trust proceedings by the Justice Department.

After lengthy hearings, FCC sanctioned a trade of radio-tv stations between NBC and Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. NBC acquired Westinghouse's Philadelphia radio and tv outlets in exchange for its own facilities in Cleveland and $3,000,000.

But after the FCC decision, rendered late in 1955, the Justice Department saw an anti-trust violation involved. NBC claims Justice had a right to take part in the FCC proceedings and, failing to do so, had no business to step in after the final verdict. It was an innocent victim, says NBC, of "governmental schizophrenia."

Justice contends, however, that although FCC has a right to turn down applications because of an anti-trust angle, its approval of a transaction is not any determination that none is present and certainly doesn't forestall Government litigation challenging such a deal.

The Supreme Court has agreed to pass on the case.

Poser for Today: Can Desilu Bring In Winner & Not Get Provocative?

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Can an hourlong telefilm series register the kind of dramatic impression that live shows like "Playhouse 90" have achieved without the use of "provocative" themes? That's the avowed goal of the ambitious 47-show slate of the hourlong "Desilu Playhouse" series, which preemed this week on CBS-TV.

Desilu is attempting to incorporate the key virtues of live production into its telefilms, yet is determined to stand off from such "hot" topics as adultery, alcoholism, politics, religion, excessive violence, integration. Reason is not a matter of sponsor or network control, but the refusal of the studio to place the personal stamp of Desi Arnaz and Lucille Ball on this type of programming. They feel they've been identified with "family entertainment" over the years, and don't want to move into the non-family and non-entertainment areas implicit in controversial themes.

In all other respects, according to Bert Granet, exec producer of the series, Desilu is attempting to embrace the major virtues of live dramatic programming. From the top, that means writers such as Rod Serling, Paul Monash, Adrian Spies, Ludi Clare and Ernest Kinoy, who've worked primarily in the live medium and have been reluctant, for the most part, to approach telefilms. And on the premise that the script can attract stars, show's managed to line up such non-telefilm personalities as Susan Strasberg, Pier Angeli, Eli Wallach, Aldo Ray and Earl Holliman.

In an attempt to match the spontaneity of live dramatics, Arnaz and Granet have called for longer-playing scenes, where the interplay and conflicts between the leading characters is sustained over a longer period than is usual with telefilm. This in turn is backed by longer rehearsal periods, four or five days instead of the customary single-day rehearsal.

In shooting techniques too, emphasis will be on the "individual, not the background," according to Granet, to avoid the pitfalls of previous hour filmed series. Desilu is even experimenting with wide-angle lenses and other lighting effects to create the illusion of depth that electronic cameras impart, in contrast to the flatness inherent in the film technique.

But in the long run, it goes back to the script, Granet states, and while refusing to detail the figures, he points out that "Desilu" has established a ceiling on script prices that matches that of "Playhouse 90." Latter has gone up to $10,000 on occasion. The properties, writers and stars already lined up include "My Father the Fool," another Adrian Spies script dealing with the Puerto Ricans

Kermit Bloomgarden Pacted For NBC Specs

Broadway producer Kermit Bloomgarden has been signed by NBC-TV to produce a pair of specs, one this season and the second next semester.

Productions will be packaged by Ziegler, Hellman & Ross. Jerome Hellman of the N.Y. office of that agency set the deal. Properties have not yet been selected.

TvB Gets a New 'Format,' Based On Tailor-Made Pitch

Function of Television Bureau of Advertising has changed since the departure of Ollie Treyz as its boss. In nearly two years under the aegis of Norman (Pete) Cash, the bureau has virtually eliminated the "mass" pitches which gave Treyz and Cellomatic presentations their initial fame.

These days, TvB is going in almost exclusively for tailor-made pitches, and with this alternation much of the industry-wide attention once focused on the org has disappeared. But, as one TvB exec stated the other day, the shift in attack is due largely to change in television advertising since Treyz's days.

He pointed out that there are very few non-tv sponsors left in national advertising. Hence, TvB is concentrating on the individualized approach, with an eye to building or merely holding the billings of current tv advertisers. (Bureau recently completed an analysis for Buick, which, when added to analyses done by McCann-Erickson for the automotive account, caused a shift of coin from newspapers to television.)

Further concentration is in the area of local retail sales. The TvB spokesman said that the outfit has prepared a number of tailor-made pitches for local accounts.

He added that TvB is producing three times the work it was a year ago.

There also have been structural changes at TvB. Three key execs left the company in the last month, each for a different reason. Halsey Barrett, national sales chief, didn't see eye to eye with TvB's board of directors. Bill Colvin left as head of station relations for a promotional post with WBZ-TV, Boston. Gordon Hellman, director of sales promotion, left with the express intention of going into biz for himself.

Joining the company were Pete Krug and John Sheehan. TvB says that in making individualized pitches men were needed who knew the intracacies of tv as well as the men they were to approach. In this vein, it was pointed out that Krug was former radio-tv boss for Calkins & Holden and Sheehan performed similarly for Cunningham & Walsh.

CBS Pubservice Films Sold to A-R in Britain

Associated Rediffusion in England has made a deal with CBS Film Sales for six hours of public service film programming. Delivery of the six hours from CBS Films will be effected during the last quarter of '58.

Domestically, the CBS subsid is continuing actively in the pub-affairs field, with new segments of "20th Century" and "Conquest" slated for syndication following their network run. First "20th Century" episode "The Red Sell" will be fed to the market-to-market route shortly after CBS-TV airing.

Chayefsky Walks Out On Psychiatric Series In Hassle Over Control

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Paddy Chayefsky's contemplated vidpix series about the American Psychiatric Assn. is kaput, the result of a fight over creative control.

Chayefsky, here for casting of his Columbia film, "Middle of the Night," revealed that there was a good deal of interest in the series both by CBS-TV and ABC-TV, particularly the latter.

But, says the writer: "We couldn't agree on who would control the show. The network wanted control. Once they got such control, it would be so dehydrated it wouldn't be worth doing. They would try to make the subject matter more palatable, and it can't be done that way; it can only be done as art."

Plan was to have it as a monthly hour or 90-minute filmed series.

Daytime TV Gets Competitive Spurt As ABC's 'Operation Daybreak' Bows

By ART WOODSTONE

Premiere of "Operation Daybreak" was a major achievement for television. ABC-TV entered the field of daytime video on Monday (13) with product equal, and sometimes superior, to the veteran vidcasts by NBC and CBS. There is room to quarrel with one of the six shows launched, but seldom has there been achieved the simplicity and precision of these new cross-the-boarders.

The six programs, in order of appearance between 11 a.m. and 3:30 p.m., are: "Day In Court," "Peter Lind Hayes Show," "Mother's Day," "Liberace Show," "Chance for Romance" and "Beat the Clock." Five of them function under a master plan, which is based apparently on the reasoning that nothing enduring is achieved by gimmicks and nothing worthwhile by getting maudlin.

Whether "Day In Court" can lick Arthur Godfrey or "Price Is Right" or Peter Lind Hayes can out-attract "Top Dollar," "Tic Tac Dough" and "Love of Life" is less important than the fact that ABC is in daytime to stay, and with material of such quality that it must, in some of its segments, eventually achieve audience triumphs. An unlikely prospect is that all the shows will drop rating bombs, and if that is to be the case, daytime program veep Jerry Chester and his second-in-command Armand Grant, in just another instance of their disciplined professionalism, made painstakingly sure that they got a batch of frontmen who not only have a grasp of entertainment values but who can sell merchandise. Hayes, Dick Van Dyke, Liberace in tandem with Steve Dunne and Bud Collyer made their spiels as effective as any ever seen.

In the course of three-and-a-half hours, there naturally were some mistakes. Take, for instance, the kickoff "Day In Court," containing brief "dramatic recreations" of civil and criminal actions. This KABC-TV stanza began with a reformed drunk going on a toot once again because he thought his frau had run out on him. By the time he'd give his rendition to the judge and his wife showed up in court to plead for him, it almost certainly appeared as though Chester & Co. were about to fling themselves headlong into yards of chintz. But the show quickly found its footing with a series of brief cases which were interesting and frequently humorous. The humor may have been crude but it wasn't forced. Casting was good and the cases clear, as in the hearing of a man who ran a spade through a neighbor's waterpipe as he looked for his wristwatch in the mud, in the cases of an underage stripper run in for indecent exposure and the three surly football fans who got into a fistfight over a wayward pigskin. Edgar Allan Jones Jr., enacting the judge, flavored the half-hour with the authority and compassion of a man who might actually have spent years on the bench. Of course, if this show fails to catch on there'll have to be a change, since it's the only one of six which doesn't lend itself to the reserve power of a personal pitchman.

When Peter Lind Hayes began the next show with an uncommendably long drunk routine, a viewer's mind immediately halted and thought back to what the skeptics were predicting before the show, that as nice and intelligent a guy as Hayes is he couldn't hold down his own tv show for long. Yet seconds later, the variety program got into the groove. The succession of adlib comments by him and others of the cast flowed agreeably. The music was good, and there was an atmosphere ultimately created that the homescreener was participating in this fascinating fun. It was the repetition of an intra-trade situation that cropped up when Jack Paar started "Tonight" on NBC-TV. Lotsa folks said he wouldn't make it either. He has, and it's not too surprising that the Hayes' daytimer has many of the more engaging qualities of Paar's late-night stanza.

Mary Healy, Don Cherry and Anita Bryant, the Four Voices, John Bubbles, Roland Winters are charming people. Careful selection of Hayes' support is another sign of the master plan; they possessed the same air of "cleanness," simple and unassuming talent as the supporting casts on the programs which followed. That goes for the amateur panelists of "Mother's Day," the guests on "Chance for Romance" and, in some measure, for "Beat the Clock" contestants, as well as for the pros with Liberace.

aways in memory to provide something decently instructive. Attractive women on the panel, egged on by the clean-cut Van Dyke, had to work for their prizes. Questions weren't hard, but it was fairly clear that the woman best informed in domestic matters would come off the winner. They had to figure out such things as how many slices of ham they could cut to make a half pound, or what was lower in calories, half a broiled chicken or six-ounces of lean beef? The participants were sedate yet appealing and so was the whole format. Free plugs were kept to a minimum.

As for Liberace at 1 p.m., he too seemed to be under the control of some outside force. He began by talking a couple of octaves lower than he is famous for. There's

There must have been others, besides this reviewer, who were mystified as to what this had to do with the three perfect specimens picked by the panel to date a young widow. Even though John Cameron Swayze, a newscaster by reputation and experience, was stuffy and unsure in this hotbed of romance, show did kinda pick up steam when the men were paraded before the gal. The participants were alert, likeable people whom some lonely person at home might also like to know and date.

For those who like to spread the rumor that "B" pictures are dead, the 90-minute opening gun on "77 Sunset Strip" is a timely reminder that not only are studios still turning out the Bs, but—in this instance—Warner Bros. made it and television's got it. "Girl on the Run" set the tone on ABC-TV last week (10) for the "Sunset Strip" series which hereafter will span only an hour, still revolving around tv's newest sleuth, Efrem Zimbalist Jr.

Zimbalist is something of an innovation among tv detectives. Here's a private eye with a smooth approach who looks and sounds as if he'd recently graduated from Harvard. He's a slightly superior type that figures things out before he acts, a glib talker who nevertheless doesn't mind getting into a good scrap.

If Warner Bros., which turns out the "Sunset" series, means to release "Girl on the Run" to theatres it didn't do itself much of a favor via this tv exposure. Series opener, produced by Roy Huggins and directed leisurely by Richard Bare, had its moments, though on the whole it tended to drag. Best thing about it was Erin O'Brien, an attractive and pretty a girl as ever graced a tv screen. She also exhibited considerable acting talent in a part that, admittedly, wasn't very demanding.

Story, scripted by Marion Hargrove, had private eye Zimbalist trying to establish the identity of Miss O'Brien, a nightclub singer hiding out from a hired assassin. It turned out in the long run that the man who hired Zimbalist was the master criminal, being also the District Attorney. Finale: Zimbalist and Miss O'Brien head for the altar.

Sandwiched in between the dialog were a couple of tense scenes and some imaginative ideas, like having radio-equipped trucks tracking Miss O'Brien's car and sorting out the killer who's following her. Edward Byrnes played the young murderer with considerable skill and conviction; Shepperd Strudwick was the crooked D.A., Ray Teal played the police lieutenant and Barton MacLane appeared in a smaller part as the head of the tracking outfiit.

Considering the lightweight material that went into this mystery-thriller, it seemed a shame to take up a full 90 minutes with it. The story could easily have been told in an hour, and possibly even better so since it would have had to be tightened up. There's no question that Zimbalist creates a rather intriguing personality along offbeat lines and that could be the clue to a successful series.

Photography on the opener was surprisingly uneven, with the camera lingering on some shots and details that had absolutely no bearing on the storyline. "Girl on the Run" barely kept viewers on their toes. Maybe the shorter versions will do the trick. Hift.

the guests get seamy, as they often do in a "friendship club," the show will become even further embarrassing, and neither the dignity of three psychologists nor the prestige of a love-predicting Univac are going to stop it from pandering to lowly tastes.

Lastly, it was "Beat the Clock" time. Probably because it's been around so long, it was more recalcitrant than the others in sticking to the niceties Chester and Grant meant to impart. Or perhaps these executions figured this veteran didn't need any help and could go it pretty much alone, although that seems doubtful since this audience participationer had more tightness and zip than is usual for it. What was wrong was the jaded lavishness of the free plugs. A solid production in all departments of a well-known work got the new Hallmark series off to a strong start on NBC-TV Monday night (13). Elmer Harris' play, "Johnny Belinda," as adapted by Theodore Apstein, is fundamentally a sentimental tear-jerker, but this expertly handled tv treatment was both persuasive and moving.

Julie Harris and Christopher Plummer, who scored together on Hallmark's "Little Moon of Alban" offering last March, underpinned this drama with their performances, Miss Harris as the deaf-mute girl and Plummer as the doctor who is her teacher. All of the inherent poignancy involved in a deaf-mute's struggle for knowledge and expression was exploited to the hilt in the interplay between the two stars. Victor Jory also contributed a rugged and sympathetic portrait as the girl's father.

The melodramatic context of the story, in which the town villain first rapes the deaf-mute, then kills her father and finally attempts to clutch the baby from its mother, doesn't permit much subtlety of characterization in the supporting cast. Rip Torn was a competent heavy assisted in his villainy by Betty Lou Holland, as his wife, and Beulah Garrick and Catherine Proctor, as a couple of conventional town gossips. The little island off the coast of Maine, where this play is localled, seemed to have an unusual concentration of provincial heels.

The performances were part of a perfectly fluid live production. Director George Schaefer moved the story flawlessly through numerous set changes and, in general, gave the play the smoothness of a filmed production, but without the "canned" quality. The fact that the shotgun blast which killed the heavy was somewhat of a dud was just one of those things. Herm.

SCIENCE CALLING

With John K. M. McCaffery, host; guests

Director: Jay Miller
30 Mins., Sun., 12 Noon
WRCA-TV, N.Y. (tape)

With science currently getting top billing over the humanities in classrooms and with lunar rocketry fragmenting iambic pentameter, NBC skillfully orbitted in with a "Science Calling" series, a concentrated six-week drive to whip up greater interest among high school students in various branches of science. The 13 NBC-owned stations (radio & tv), facing up to their responsibilities, are cooperating with local school heads in this worthwhile endeavor. This series, in a measure, is designed as a companion piece to the recently launched "Continental Classroom," the course in modern physics NBC-TV is transmitting during the early hours for college credit.

NBC's flagship stations, WRCA-TV and WRCA Radio preemed their contributions on Sunday (12) with engrossing introductions. The video outlet's series is titled "They Speak for Themselves" and is presented in conjunction with the Thomas Alva Edison Foundation. Initial program with George Schwartz, Forest Hill H.S. teacher, as one of three host scientists (John K. M. McCaffery is the overall crisp emcee) presented two ideal high school science students in demonstrations of their fascinating experiments. Karen Frank and Ray Feerick were the student attractions, the former showing the visible effects of tranquillizer drugs on rodents, while the latter revealed what he was doing with protozoa collected from Bronx ponds. These clean-cut, articulate youngsters undoubtedly made a handsome impression on viewers and, without question, convinced the younger set that science was far from stuffy. Program closed with Dr. Fred Phillips of the Sloan-Kettering Institute, McCaffery and the two students in a powwow. "They Speak for Themselves" was exhilirating to watch because it offered excellent examples of inquisitive youth seeking the deeper answers to man's physical problems. Rans.

"Small World," the new Ed Murrow-Fred Friendly half-hour package, is fascinating television. As CBS-TV's new Sunday at 6 entry, it's a global variant on "Person to Person," "See It Now," "Wide Wide World" and, stripped to its fundamentals, nothing more than a four-way intercontinental spontaneous conversation (with Murrow anchored in N.Y.) as the tv cameras are simultaneously trained on the principals. Thus it's nothing precisely new in tv's electronic progression, but as was evident on last Sunday's (12) premiere stanza, when India's Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, British novelist Aldoux Huxley and ex-Gov. Thomas E. Dewey matched knowledge and beliefs, it's the participants themselves and what they have to say that gives "Small World" a conversation lustre all its own.

One can imagine in future installments A Tallulah Bankhead in a give-&-take with Chancellor Adeauer or a Sean O'Casey having a go with Casey Stengel (for it's in this juxtapositional area where "Small World" will frequently roam). Not that there was anything wrong with the "casting" of the initial program, for Nehru (from his residence in New Delhi); Huxley (from Turin, Italy) and Dewey (from Portland, Me.) brought off their conversation piece—with no time out for frivolities or small talk—as though face-to-face, so expert was the synchronization in filming and sound recording.

As benefitting such a triumvurate, the subject matter was on a high, statesmanship level. Diversity was introduced by the contrast in the three personalities—Huxley the objective intellecutal never quite personally involved; Nehru as a leader who lives what he preaches, clear in his ideals, able and realistic in his compromises for the desired ultimate; Dewey as the shrewd politician positive in his analysis of the positions and moves of the opposite ideology and powers.

Naturally the main issues under discussion were nuclear weapons and their control, and the Formosa situation, which led inevitably to a discussion on totalitariamism vs. freedom. Nehru, as demonstrated so frequently in the past, was a vibrant, gifted and persuasive speaker; so much so that he dominated the 30 minutes. In contrast there was a suggestion of smugness in ex-Gov. Dewey's espousal of the cause of the U.S. and capitalism, even though he was always clear and able in his few queries and answers. Huxley in his quiet English demeanor unfortunately did not have a great deal to contribute.

This series, returning for its second year, is an excellent show for sports fans. Each stanza presents, on film, a 18-hole match between top pros who are competing for a $2,000 prize, chance to continue playing and some handsome bonuses for holes-in-one and eagles. It could be considered a "21" with golf clubs, with all of the fascination of man-to-man competition for the jackpot prize.

On this season's opener, there was a good match in Miami Beach between Billy Casper, a Californian pro who won consistently on this show last year, and Peter Thomson, four-time British Open champ. The latter won by three strokes with a four-under-par score.

The action in the match is shown in tightly edited form. The play on some of the holes is shown in full, while on others it is only presented diagrammatically. Diagrams are liberally used to good effect throughout to show the layout of each hole and the position of the ball with respect to the pin. The camerawork is competently straightforward with no attempt to inject an artificial excitement.

The stroke-by-stroke spiel by Dick Danehe is helpful in describing the distance of each shot and the lay of the ball. Danehe whispers into the mike, as if not to disturb the players, and in general, tends to create the illusion that the viewer is seeing a live, rather than a canned match. Herm.

(SSC&B)

This zany outline, written first for the stage by Zoe Aikins, Dale Eunson and Katherine Albert and then adapted to motion pictures by Nunnally Johnson, is foolproof light entertainment. Adapted for television by Charles R. Marion, "How To Marry a Millionaire" was the most successful launching NTA Film Network had all week.

Three attractive females, trying to hold down a lavish apartment they can hardly afford in a badly disguised hunt for three Daddy Warbucks-type, are the heroines of this half-hour. Some of the lines were sophisticated but most of the way they were just corny. Still, plotting took a back seat to the sight of these cockeyed lechers slithering to an assignation with the next rube.

Outstanding in the first half-hour was Barbara Eden. She is not only extremely curvaceous, she showed much thespianic knowhow in enacting the dimwitted, dim-sighted Loco Jones. Lori Nelson and Merry Anders were able as her conniving partners. Robert Rockwell and Steve Dunne were the victims who finally got wise and went home.

Good cast, frivolous story and the niftily paced direction conspired to hold the audience and who can say that "How To Marry a Millionaire" won't become as popular with men as Friday night boxing. Women shouldn't mind it either. Art.

HIGH ADVENTURE WITH LOWELL THOMAS

Writers: Lowell Thomas Jr., Prosper Buranelli
60 Mins., Wed. (8), 8 p.m.

Used to be that Lowell Thomas always spoiled a splendid travelog with too many personal intrusions into the picture. But that's all changed now. These days it's his son, Lowell Jr., who does the intruding, upstaging the landscapes and wildlife.

No question about it, Thomas sure knows how to get fascinating footage and colorful data when he goes out on a camera expedition. The films he has made for television are a credit to the medium, being at once educational and entertaining. But just as the viewer finds himself carried away in vicarious video travel, up pops Thomas or Thomas Jr. on the picture screen to remind us that it is they, not we, who are having the adventure.

The first installment of this season's irregular series was a timely opus on Alaska, pegged on the question, "Is it a land of opportunity for young Americans?" The answer of course turns out to be yes, but not emphatically, as Thomas intelligently points out that the opportunity is only for the hardy who can endure the discomforts and can work like true pioneers.

Over the span of an hour, the theme is lost sight of on several occasions while the camera digresses to shots of Lowell Jr. and his family spinning around in their plane or having a picnic. The younger Thomas, by the way, ought to be spared any dialog because he recites it poorly.

Except for the unnecessary, and even obnoxious, personal touch — and for the diffuseness resulting from a whirlwind itinerary, which never settled long at any single part of the new state—there was much in the film to reward the patient set-watcher: the birth of an iceberg, a walrus hunt, the salmon falls—these were particularly pleasant. Thomas' narration, which per usual was done in excellent voice, was dotted with such enlightening marginalia as that our 49th state is second only to Africa for big game and that the Arctic was named for the bears that inhabit it, after the constellation Arcturus.

Not only did the show answer the topic question in the affirmative, it must certainly have whet the dormant pioneer spirit of many Americans and in this way performed a real service to the new state.

Mike Murphy's photography was first class.

Delco-Remy got its money's worth, but in the future how about more high adventure and less Lowell Thomas? Les.

BAT MASTERSON
With Gene Barry, Robert Middleton, Jean Willes, Elisha Cook, Adele Mara, King Donovan, Shorty Keenan, others

NATIONAL DAIRY PRODUCTS
NBC-TV (film)
(J. Walter Thompson, N. W. Ayer)

National Dairy Products is backing up its new Milton Berle "Kraft Music Hall" entry, with a new western opus, "Bat Masterson." The two shows provide an hour of diversified entertainment that should appeal to a large segment of viewers who like their comedians funny and their western heroes brave.

Masterson on its own is a good western. It comes off well because of Gene Barry's quiet portrayal of the dandified Masterson who is equally adept with cane and short-barrelled Colt, and the scripting of producers Pittman and White which didn't try for the extraordinary but played it straight for believable results.

Preem (8), "Dounble Showdown," had Masterson arriving in a small town in answer to a saloon-keeping friend's request for help. Seems that the rival boniface (Robert Middleton) is trying to corner the saloon business and wants Masterson's friend out. Rest of the story deals with Masterson's attempts to aid his friend and finally culminates in one hand of showdown poker with the loser leaving town.

Standout feature of show is the use of a double ending. After the poker hand is won by Masterson and the heavy leaves town, Barry came on to explain that while Masterson was a real life character available biographical information differs about the result of the poker hand so another version is presented. This time Masterson engages in a shoot out with the heavy and two of his accomplices. Gimmick is interesting and different (and that's something for a western nowadays) and puts the whole story on a more factual basis.

Robert Middleton as the heavy "Big Keel" turned in his usual polished performance and Jean Willes as Masterson's ex lady friend was competent. Other supporting roles were handled well.

Director Walter Doniger managed to keep the proceedings rolling nicely with straight forward camera work that was in tune with the nature of the story. Technical credits were generally good, although there seems to be a striking similiarity between the background music in some of the recent Ziv entries (this is one) and "Sea Hunt," filmery's No. 1 syndicated series.

Following its network exposure, Masterson is a good bet for the syndicated trail where, judging by today's standards, it should have a good life expectancy.

Commercials for Kraft and Sealtest divisions of National Dairies featured the usual hands preparing various dishes that are especially effective for the food products involved. Syd.

Written around a news photographer, "Man With a Camera" may seem a natural for General Electric's Photo Lamp Dept. to sponsor but the story's somewhat out of focus. Initial episode, a tale of derring-do entitled "Second Avenue Assassin" and authored by William Fay, had Charles Bronson virtually cast as Superman.

For in holding down the title role, Bronson not only took on the gloves with middleweight contender Tom Laughlin in an impromptu match but later collared a ring of toughs who were attempting to force Laughlin to throw his upcoming bout with the champ. Even an average viewer would have to stretch his imagination on this one, particularly when Laughlin is depicted as a "camera-shy" pug. Whoever heard of a boxer averse to publicity?

Performances in this potboiler out of the Warren Lewis-Don W. Sharpe production stable do little to make the far-fetched proceedings credible, Bronson, who resembles the late John Garfield, plays the lead with lotsa slap and dash. However, his animation is defeated by the pedestrian script. Portraying stereotyped roles are Laughlin as the contender, Ruta Lee as the latter's loyal girl friend and Theodore Marcuse as a crooked fight promoter. Direction of Gerald Mayer is routine as is the work of supporting players headed by Leonard Bell as Laughlin's manager. Gilb.

CBS-TV's altered version of "Your Hit Parade" has replaced bookkeeping with entertainment. For the past couple of years on NBC-TV, the series was fighting a losing battle in trying to make a program and/or sense of the rock 'n' roll tunes that usually dominated the top seven positions in a survey of bestsellers. Even a "new faces" format didn't help the cause because it seemed that the show was doomed as long as it stuck to the system of a numerical countdown and an individual showcasing of each "top" song started back in 1935 on radio.

In the moveover from 30 Rockefeller Center to 485 Madison Ave., the format was overhauled with an eye and ear to the needs and demands of tv. The top tuners are still there but are now held down to the opening and closing segments and presented in such a way that only the top three tunes (in the closing segment) get the importance and emphasis previously given to seven. That's as it should be because the teenage disk buyers prefer their fave platters done by the original etchers and the adults wouldn't know the Elegants from the Olympics even if they heard 'em.

By minimizing the rock 'n' roll load, show now has time for the musical pleasantries that in recent years came only with the "Hit Parade Extra." There's now time for a recap of oldies in a segment billed as the "All Time Hit Parade" and time for a portion devoted to bestselling albums to make it a well-rounded musical variety show.

Bulk of the vocal assignment are in the hands of show's regulars Dorothy Collins and Johnny Desmond. Miss Collins is an old "Hit Parade" hand with a new coif. She knows her way around the pop areas and can handle the rhythm and ballads with assurance and style. And Desmond displayed the same aptitude in his first affair with the "Hit Parade" proceedings. Harry Sosnik batons expertly throughout.

They opened the show with a brisk rundown of three of tunes from the top 12 and closed soloing separately on the top two. In between there was a pleasasnt hark-back to 1935 with Desmond handling "It's Easy To Remember," Miss Collins' warbling "Soon" and both in tandem on "Isle of Capri" and "Lullabye of Broadway."

The section devoted to bestselling albums also opens up an avenue for substantial musical fodder. For the preem, the original cast package of "Music Man" came into the spotlight and Barbara Cook gave a warm interpretation of "Till There Was You" and Eddie Hodges whipped out an enjoyable "76 Trombones" although it's Robert Preston's number in the tuner.

Show also is made visually appealing through some fresh choreographic staging by Peter Gennaro and producer Perry Lafferty and director Norman Jewison have wisely kept the action within the limits of a tv homescreen by not going overboard with massive sets and crowded chorus lines.

One point the show hasn't quite licked satisfactorily is the showcasing of the top tunes that aren't performed. On the preem the tune's title and position in the survey were flashed on the screen accompanied by some introductory rhyming patter. They tried to get through it quickly but it stuck out like a warped record.

In the past the American Tobacco Co. (for Lucky Strike and now Hit Parade cigs) conducted its own survey of disk, jukebox and sheet music sales to get its top tunes. Its agency often got a lot of squawks from music bizites fighting for a plug on the show. The tunes are now selected from a survey by The Billboard so the Tin Pan Alley boys can now shift their beefs if they feel they've been done wrong in the listings. Gros.

CIMARRON CITY
With George Montgomery, Fred Mac Murray, Audrey Totter, John Smith, others
Executive Producer: Rachard Lewis
Producer: Felix Jackson
Writer: Gene L. Coon
Director: Jules Bricken
60 Mins., Sat., 9:30 p.m.
RCA
NBC-TV (color film)
(Kenyon & Eckhart)

"Cimarron City" is a deluxe adult western that rode into a Saturday night ambush of fast-drawing hotshots, "Gunsmoke" and "Have Gun, Will Travel," and will have to put up quite an exhibition of fancy shooting to survive it. Sponsor reluctance to duel the big boys is dramatized by the fact that "Cimarron" nearly went on unsold until NBC's parent, RCA, came through at the wire with a short term buy.

Danger doesn't figure to be any slighter this Saturday (18) when the new show gets delayed half an hour to accommodate the Jerry Lewis spec. It will then miss a shooting war with "Have Gun" but instead will meet "Gunsmoke" head on.

Too bad it has such formidable competition, because "Cimarron City" is a darned good show, as western go. It is made of finer cloth than most of video's cowboy shows, although the thematic thread is stock: the peace-loving hero is on constant call to clean up corruption and the disruption of law and order in the unsettled old West.

The series' protagonist, for a change, is not a man but a growing town in Oklahoma territory after the pioneering. George Montgomery, as Matt Rockford, is Cimarron City's top citizen, the son of its founder, a quiet living rancher who several times has turned down an offer to become CC's first mayor. In the inaugurer (11) gueststar Fred MacMurray gets a hero's reception by the townspeople as a newcomer who has helped to exterminate some bandits. Having won the town's confidence, MacMurray opens a bank, quickly makes a name for himself and gets elected mayor, bringing in his own sheriff and deputies.

Immediately the town becomes a honky tonk, and MacMurray's power grows as he forecloses on mortgages his bank has made. Everyone who stands in his way gets knocked off by the sheriff's boys until the big showdown scene in a saloon, when Montgomery and the townsfolk shoot it out with MacMurray and his boys and kill them all. The town is cleaned up, and now Montgomery accepts the mayorship.

Regulars in the series include Audrey Totter, as a widow who runs a rooming house, and John Smith, as a moody but righteous youth. Both turned in classy performances in the initialer in secondary roles. MacMurray was convincing as the half-sympathetic gambler from St. Louis who moved in on the new town, and Montgomery brings certain civilized qualities to the role of the western here.

Guest star policy may help to pierce the "Gunsmoke" barrier, although it will raise the show's already high nut. Dan Duryea, Dorothy Malone, June Lockhart and Gary Merrill are on tap for future episodes. Previews of upcoming shows, by the way, are a good idea here.

RCA's commercials were excellent, especially those selling color, and they were more handsomely produced than most variety shows are. Les.

Seven-Up and AC Sparkplugs are riding a swashbuckling winner into its second year, and there's good reason to suppose, with the way "Zorro" caught on last year, that the mask-and-cape heroics will grow on the fancy of the juve trade now that the series is established. Spanish western hasn't a single feature that is really unique, but it's so well done that it is standout among the garden variety costume actioners. To coin a phrase, if it's Disney it's got to be good.

Opening chapter (9) of the new season lays the foundation of an intrigue that will take several episodes to be resolved, but unlike the old cliffhangers a smaller adventure is completely contained in each installment while the greater story is advanced. Design is to foster repeat business on Thursday evenings in case the devoted viewer might be tempted just once to try the competition.

In his mufti guise as Don Diego de la Vega, Zorro rides into Monterey, Calif., to transact a business deal and learns that previous investors, like himself, have been easy pickin's for bandits. It seems that someone has been tipping off the bandits in advance, and Zorro is forced to suspect his father's old friend, Verdugo. Well, Verdugo has a lovely daughter who doesn't like Zorro's, that is Diego's, intimations about her padre, and these are the seeds of the major story.

In the initialer's subplot, Zorro's deaf-mute manservant gets kidnapped for ransom, and this is when Don Diego dons his mask and cape for the rescue. It's all standard adventure stuff, told many times before and easy to predict, but it moves swiftly, and Disney has made it pleasant to watch.

Guy Williams, in the title role, has the same dashing good looks and derring-do he had last year, and Gene Sheldon, renegade pantomimic of the nitery circuit, deals some comedy business as the mute manservant. Rest of the cast is fine, including Jolene Brand, a dark beauty who will be the love interest throughout the current serial. Les.

Milton Berle, who was king of them all through the years of tv's growth, has joined the ranks of returning comedians this season (Jackie Gleason, Ed Wynn, et al). Since tv is sadly lacking in new faces and new humors, perhaps it's understandable that the medium would welcome back one of its greats, though it must be admitted at the outset that to reembrace Berle means accepting the Berle of old. True much of the old brashness is gone; if there's such a thing as a conservative Berle, such was evident on the preem of his half-hour "Kraft Music Hall" on NBC-TV last Wed. night (8).

But equally as evident was the fact that this was the old familiar Berle, with the same standup routine for the topical one-liners; the continued reliance on vaudeo "standards" (last week it was the Dunhills, who also go way back to "early Berle" and early "Toast of the Town"; next week harmonica player Stan Fisher, who got his tv feet wet long back as a Berle stooge.)

There's a gesture of genuflecting toward the "new" with Berle dedicating himself to untapped talent (last week he brought on vocalist Tony Roberts for a not particularly distinctive rendition of "You Make Me Feel So Young") and the show itself is set within a more intimate framework utilizing a small on-camera studio audience of celebs. Also there was a brief and somewhat pointless takeoff on the Soviet Moiseyev dancers, but here was an attempt to move in a "different" direction.

The material as a whole was poor, all the more surprising in the face of some formidable production credits, including Hal Kanter as producer and chief of a quartet of pro writers. As repayment of a brief Bob Hope intro (in dellivering to Berle the keys of "Kraft Music Hall" after being shuttered, 12 years, when Bing Crosby terminated a 17-year radio tenancy), Berle rang in a Buick commercial. His intro of ringsider Jerry Wald inevitably invited a plug for his 20th-Fox "Mardi Gras" feature in "return" for a Gary Crosby guest shot next week; and since Berle and "Bat Masterson" are divvying up the Wed. 9 to 10 hour for Kraft and Sealtest (both National Dairies) it occasioned a walkon of Gene Barry, who plays Masterson. Thus nothing's changed in the plug department.

Like Gleason, Berle as a weekly entry still perpetuating the tricks of old, could find it rough going over the season's span. It's a tough grind, week in week out, for the stock-in-trade standup comics. It's the old old story of "reformatting" for a new era. Danny Thomas is one of the few who made the transition (switching into situation comedy) in hurdling the changing times—and Thomas is hotter today than he ever was. A once-a-month or occasional Berle, like Hope, would be something else again. But that weekly exposure (garbed in the comicalities of yesterday's tv) could be murder. Rose.

Dear Gordon:

I know you must feel as elated as I do since reading the reviews of your latest project "TIME OF YOUR LIFE". Our boy Gleason really came through for us.

I want to thank you and your director, Tom Donovan, who did such a magnificent job in making others realize what I have always felt about Jackie's versatility.

Sincerely,

George Durgom

P.S. The cast and your crew were superb.

SAID ABOUT my boy GLEASON:

JOHN CROSBY, New York Herald Tribune

"I saw 3 Joes in 'TIME OF YOUR LIFE' — Eddie Dowling — Franchot Tone — Gleason — Gleason is more warmly human of the three. Gleason has simply created an elaborately well-heeled drunk. I am not quite sure this is what Saroyan had in mind but the character Gleason presents is pleasantly and evenly more palatable of the three."

JACK GOULD, New York Times

"Jackie Gleason, in quite possibly his most winning appearance on TV, gave a surprisingly touching and compassionate performance — his underplaying certainly carried the show."

BEN GROSS, New York Daily News

"He gave an affectionate moving performance, worthy of anyone's respect — Jackie dominated the play — Gleason displayed a gentle restraint, a delicacy and a golden whimsy that gave birth to a memorable character."

HARRIET VAN HORN, New York World-Telegram & Sun

"Jackie Gleason gave an intelligent, wryly humorous performance."

SID BAKAL, New York Herald Tribune

"A positive character to rate applause for an interesting performance— Gleason at his best."

LEO MISHKIN, The Morning Telegraph

"—And here once again Jackie Gleason brought to television a figure of engaging compassion and charm, in a performance of integrity, spirit and immense talent and skill—there's no getting away from the fact that the guy is a first rate, sensitive and more than ordinarily fascinating actor—"

RADIO-TV DAILY

"—to Jackie Gleason: We can't think of enough adjectives to express our praise for your superb performance in 'Time of Your Life' on 'Playhouse 90' Thursday night. We are indebted to great talents such as yours who continue to make outstanding performance contributions to our medium of television. Let's have more of Jackie in the dramatic."

DAILY VARIETY

"Jackie Gleason . . . as the difficult-to-enact central figure of Joe . . . managed to penetrate to the very roots of the character he was portraying . . . his characterization took on added stature."

SWISS FAMILY ROBINSON

Ingenious sets and expert use of taped clips proved insufficient to keep "Swiss Family Robinson" from foundering in its hour excursion on NBC-TV Sunday (12) evening.

At fault was the teleplay by M. L. Davenport, based on the oldtime book fave by Johann Wyss. The Davenport teleplay gave Walter Pidgeon, as head of the marooned family, too much to cope with. That the play did have some captivating moments can be credited more to Pidgeon's thespian talents than the script.

Laraine Day, as his wife, blossomed in one scene, when she went native on the occasion of her husband's birthday. But up to that point, she hardly created a credible character, one who had her drawing room habitat drawn from under her in a shipwreck. Verbally, she protested against the change, but she projected little feeling. As the children, Dennis Kohler and Patty Duke came off best. Dennis Hopper, as the third child, portraying a young man, also failed to light that inward glow in the portrayed personality, without which lines become a mere reading.

Theme remained interesting; the tale of a cililized family of another century who become shipwrecked on a tropical island and how they learn to fend for themselves. Pidgeon, when he was not fed rhetorical lines, came closest to capturing the heart of the drama. It was really he who sustained the outing.

The sets designed by art director Duane McKinney added a reality to the proceedings. With the use of taped clips, the jungle environment came alive, with the exception of only one scene, that if Miss Day and her daughter at their fire rescue post. That scene appeared an artificiality. McKinney was the man on the sets of the memorable "Night to Remember" tv excursion.

Director William Graham did a good job in switching from scene to scene. He could have covered some of the flaws in the script by quickening the pace. Horo.

PAUL WINCHELL SHOW

HARTZ MT. PRODUCTS, GENERAL MILLS
ABC-TV, from New York
(Geo. H. Hartman; D-F-S)

Ventriloquist Paul Winchell, back as a Sunday afternoon entry on the ABC-TV net, continues to registers amiably with a show that's geared primarily for the juve set. The ease with which he handles the proceedings and the slickness with which he manipulates his dummies, Jerry Mahoney and Knucklehead Smith, are definite plus factors.

The opener last Sunday (12) had its corny moments, but the show's overall friendly flavor is likely to please family audiences. Winchell's exchanges with the two dummies follow a familiar pattern, particularly in the cracks delivered by the brash Mahoney.

Giving the getaway program an added lift was the appearance of the Bil & Cora Baird Marionettes. The fanciful puppets were showcased with charm and a rock 'n' roll number in which two danced exceptionally well. Also guesting on the show and contributing some humorous antics was the canine act, Goudschmidt's Dogs.

The commercials for the Hartz Mountain Products pet foods and General Mills' Cocoa Puffs were routine. Jess.

LEAVE IT TO THE GIRLS
With Nancy Connors, moderator; Walter Kiernan; panelists Peggy Cass, Mary Sinclair, Vivian Farrar; Bob Brown, announcer
Producer: Martha Rountree
30 Mins.; Tues., 8:30 p.m.
WNTA-TV, Newark

"Leave it to the Girls," the show that blazed the trail for all beauty-with-brains panels, is off and running on WNTA-TV's Tuesday night's lineup. And, allowing for opening night jitters, it shapes as a promising entry to the new season.

Format remains pretty much the same as in the days of Maggi McNellis, Arlene Francis, Dorothy Kilgallen, et al. But the faces are new, and it is in the latter department that Martha Rountree faces her greatest challenge in bringing her brainchild back into the big-time.

Miss Rountree has come up with a potential block buster in her moderator, Nancy Connors. Articulate and eye filling, Miss Connors brings class and authority to her femme roles. Well known for her behind-the-scenes skill as Nancy Hanschman, CBS news and public affairs producer in Washington, gal is a refreshing newcomer to the tv screen. There were a few fluffs on show's preem, but, with the assist of guest Walter Kiernan, Miss Connors recovered nicely and even managed to turn at least one boner into an advantagee.

Tapping Kiernan as initial guest was another canny choice. A vet of many q & a shows, including "Girls," Kiernan helped bail out the novices on the panel, and paced show from his opening gag.

Miss Rountree and associate producer Tony Faillace wisely plan to experiment with various combos of girls before settling on a permanent—or even rotating—panel. They get A for effort on their initial try, and at least one starter rates regular status. Peggy Cass, the Agnes Gooch of Broadway's and Hollywood's "Auntie Mame," and a regular on the Jack Paar show, brought a quick Irish wit, original and fast retorts, and a down-to-earth personality to the show. The other three girls supplied the required glamor and generally managed to keep the conversational ball rolling. Helen Downey, youngest panelist (21), has a special sparkle which, given time and practice, could become effective.

For those who like their corn sparked by pretty femmes, by the cultured charm of Nancy Connors, and by the know-how and bon mot of such male guests as Walter Kiernan, this distaff skull session should have appeal.

NTA is syndicating this on videotape. Despite some formidable competition in its time slot ("To Tell the Truth," for one), this has a better than even chance for making the grade. Flor.

THIS IS ALICE
With Patty Ann Gerrity, Tommy Farrell, Phyllis Coates, Stephen Wootton, others; Charles Coburn, guest
Producer-Director: Sidney Salkow
Writers: Si Rose, Seaman Jacobs
30 Mins.
GREAT ATLANTIC & PACIFIC TEA, PERMA STARCH, VICK CHEMICAL, WHITE KING SOAP
NTA Film Network
(Paris & Peart, Gordon Best, Morse International, BBDO, Erwin Wasey, R&R)

Of the three half-hour programs being supplied to the 115 stations of the NTA Film Network, "This Is Alice" is the poorest. Using a child as the focal point in a situation comedy is tricky business and star Patty Ann Gerrity wasn't up to delivering the first rate performance needed to salvage the faulty script by Si Rose and Seaman Jacobs. ("Alice," "Man Without a Gun" and "How to Marry a Millionaire" were viewed Tuesday (7) on WNTA-TV, Newark.)

NTA and Sidney Salkow, the producer and director of this program, conceived of a stanza deriving its humor from the sugar-coated machinations of a bright and winningly aggressive little girl. As insurance—and perhaps to make it clear that NTA was not stooping to a program of syndicated calibre—they decided to inject a different guest star each episode to act as Miss Gerrity's foil. Though Miss Gerrity is pretty and has a crude childish energy, she was not up to remaining the legitimate center of attraction, and since the script didn't allow the more professional actors of the cast to carry on diversionary tactics, the flimsy story fell apart early.

Charles Coburn, guesting as a runaway millionaire who is mistaken for a tramp by Alice and her family, was not relaxed in his role. Tommy Farrell, as Alice's bumbling but understanding father, suggested a fair degree of comedic but the Rose-Jacobs script didn't give him sufficient opportunity to capitalize on his elastic mugg and skill in delivery. Phyllis Coates was attractive as the mother of the irritating social prodigy.

Perhaps as time goes on in this series, Miss Gerrity will be taught restraint, although the feat requires the aid of the writers. In particular, if she can be shown how to control her overactive body and subdue her precious lisp, and more room is given the other players to show their stuff, the program (with the help of w.k. guest stars) might yet get a reasonable share of the audience. Art.

Foreign TV Reviews

ARMS AND THE MAN
With Stanley Baker, Alan MacNaughton, Susan Maryett, Geoffrey Keen, Joanna Dunham, Ian Wallace, Ina de la Haye, Carl Duering
Writer: George Bernard Shaw
Producer: Alan Bromly
85 Mins., Sun., 8:45 p.m.
BBC-TV, from London

Of all the George Bernard Shaw plays, few have probably dated quite as badly as "Arms and the Man" and that was very much reflected in the BBC-TV presentation. The play was staged under license of the Public Trustee and Alan Bromly's production tried hard, but not always successfully, to make it a stimulating and controversial entry. It was not the sort of piece to hurt the opposition channel in the battle for ratings.

There was, inevitably, something worth listening to in the original dialog and Shaw was always a master at creating a piquant situation. In "Arms and the Man" the piquancy derived from the chance meeting between Captain Bluntschli, the "chocolate cream soldier," compelled to hide out in a girl's bedroom after his army had been routed in battle. And he just happened to choose the boudoir of Raina Petkoff, whose fiance (Major Sergius Saranoff) had led the victorious charge.

Apart from its outmoded style, the production also suffered from indifferent casting, although the individual players were good enough in themselves. Stanley Baker, a Rank contract star, rarely appeared to be at ease as the gallant major; nor was there much conviction in his wooing of a domestic. Alan MacNaughton was more believable as Bluntschli and Susan Maryott provided a quota of charm as the girl. Ian Wallace had limited opportunities as her father, and Ina de la Haye disappointed as her mother. Geoffrey Keen and Joanna Dunham, as contrasting servants, rounded off the cast. Myro.

RIVERSIDE ONE
With Margaret Lockwood, Trevor Howard, Kay Thompson, Sari Barahas, Jimmy Logan, Marilly Gray, The Royal Choral Society, Eric Robinson orch
Producer: Francis Essex
50 Mins., Wed., 7:30 p.m.
BBC-TV, from London

"Riverside One" appears to be BBC-TV's reply to Granada-TV's "Chelsea At Nine" series. Its basic formula of mixing both serious and light entertainment bears some resemblance to the commercial web's offering, but that's as far as the comparison goes. One of the major faults which contributed to the program's lack of success on its first airing, was that it badly needed an audience. This was clearly illustrated during a nine-minute comedy mime sketch where the silence became overpowering.

Francis Essex, one of BBC-TV's top producers, who handled this program, showed flashes of his ability from time to time, but they were too rare, and a lack of tempo and general shapelessness was the result.

The central character of the show, which will be aired fortnightly, is Margaret Lockwood. She emcees the program and the continuity of the offering rests largely upon her shoulders. On her first stint, Miss Lockwood endeavored to establish an air of informality, but in the process became too gabby. She made the mistake of overdoing the introductions and her buildups were often naive and difficult to substantiate.

The mixture of talent, which

Tele Follow-Up Comment

Desilu Playhouse

Desi Arnaz is in with the first of his 60-minute filmed dramas in the "Desilu Playhouse" series for Westinghouse with a good production of "Bernadette." Adapted by Ludi Claire (who also transferred the impressive "Bridge of San Luis Rey" to tv last season) from the Margaret Gray Blanton biog, "The Miracle of Bernadette," it suffers severely by comparison with the feature film of some years ago starring Jennifer Jones in the title role.

In Monday's (13) treatment over CBS-TV, the hour was reduced to hardly more than a fat synopsis from the point of the view of the important transition sequences. Everything moved much too fast, inveighing against getting at least one viewer wrapped up in Bernadette's vision of the Virgin Mary and in the curative waters of the grotto at Lourdes. Worst of all, Westinghouse compounded the injury vs. time by dividing the play into four—count 'em—four acts to sell its Laundromat.

Considering the dedicated treatment by directors Ralph Alswang and Claudio Guzman to Quinn Martin's production, and especially the radiant portrayal of the 14-year-old Bernadette by Pier Angeli, Westinghouse erred in the decision to throw in an extra stanza for its peddling stint. This is the "hard sell" that clearly runs counter to this moving Catholic play, and particularly in a week when Pope Pius XII is being mourned; not to mention that this year is the centennial of Bernadette's Vision.

Miss Angeli, in her tv debut, brings a beautiful simplicity to the role, enhanced by first-rate lensing that illumines her as she looks into the never-seen face of the Virgin Mary. There is splendid support by Marian Seldes, Bruce Gordon, Jacques Aubuchon, Abraham Sofaer, James O'Rear and Ron Soble in the principal parts. Miss Claire, in addition to adapting, had a small role as the wife of the mayor. Trau.

Playhouse 90

There's an inspiring, if sometimes deceptive, charm about "The Time of Your Life" that "Playhouse 90" was more than equal to in the televersion on CBS last week (9). And crackerjack players led by Jackie Gleason made it a hep and happy night for the William Saroyan Pulitzer Prizewinner. A taped job, it could have passed for "live" in anybody's livingroom, possibly excepting the few brief flashes outside the Frisco-located ginmill where the quality had less fidelity (maybe it was simulated fog on the S.F. waterfront). A. J. Russell's adaptation was painstaking in its adherence to the original stage play, Gordon Duff came through with an excellent production, and Tom Donovan's direction was ditto and even masterly in the subtle details, the movement and pace, and in the development of characterization. Robert Markell's saloon setting was perfection itself.

But most of all this seemed to be an acting romp, not only for Gleason but for the entire cast, inclusive of the bit players, behind some of the best and most homely philosophical lines Saroyan has delivered in his career as an offbeat, super-clever dramatist.

Gleason, who's shown in the past that when he's away from his straight comedy groove he can be a lulu of a thesper (pipe that timing of his which he didn't learn from The Method!), was a loveable and loving Joe, free spending inebriate with that heart of gold; Betsy Palmer was touching as the bogus burlesque stripper Kitty Duval who's real work is as a prostie; Dick York was sensitive as Tom, protege of Joe; Jack Klugman's kindly bartender was a gem, reflecting his ever growing stature as an intelligent performer; Bobby Van had a few bright moments as young Harry, the hammy but wonderful vaude hoofer; and James Barton's weather-beaten, braggart Kit Carson was, at times, in his characteristic mumbo-jumbo enhanced by downing three or four steins of beer (reminiscent of Sam Mann's trick glass with its easy-does-it froth, according to expertise from VARIETY's Lester Jacob). Add also Dina Merrill's long wistful exchange with Gleason and Bert Freed's vicious policeman.

In the other roles, Ray McHugh stood out as the "Irish" tenor newsboy with the Greek lineage, Steve Franken with a vigorous, enthusiastic bit in the jackpotting pinball sequence; Carlos Montalban as a gloomy Arab; Billy M. Greene as a lush and Terry Carter as Wesley. Even the succession of commercials peculiar to "Playhouse 90" couldn't hurt this tragicomical mood piece. (P.S.: the music was composed and conducted by Jackie Gleason.) Trau.

Camera Three

John McGiffert, who scripted CBS-TV's "Camera Three" during the 1956-57 period, returned Sunday (12) as new producer of the experimental sustainer. It was an affectionate 25-minute curtsy to James Thurber, gifted satirist, who has been described "as a mixture of laughing gas and deadly nightshade."

Program was titled "Thanks to Thurber" and with the loving assistance of Elliott Nugent as narrator, Bil and Cora Baird puppets and Hiram Sherman and Paula Trueman, the Sunday valentine to Thurber proved fresh and beguiling. Richard Lukin's direction also was in fine taste.

Nugent, friend of Thurber since their Ohio State college days, read passages from various Thurber tomes. His most effective bit came during the presentation of "The Last Flower," Thurber's eloquent parable of how earth man was wiped out during World War XIII leaving nothing but one man, one woman and one flower. With the assistance of the Baird puppets, the program also offered "The Critic and the Wren," an unusually fine analysis of flattery. Miss Trueman and Sherman had themselves a romp in "The Macbeth Murder Mystery," still another of Thurber's delightful sketches.

Nugent recalled there is no plaque on the house in Columbus where Thurber was born. Once, Thurber's mother walked past the house with an old lady from Fostoria, O., who was hard of hearing and Mrs. Thurber said proudly: "My son was born in that house." The old lady replied: "Why, on the Tuesday morning train, unless my sister is worse."

Maybe, they'll place a tablet on the house, now that "Camera Three" threw such an endearing bouquet at Thurber's feet. Rans.

U.S. Steel Hour

This was a 60-minute bore the Theatre Guild handed Barbara Bel Geddes and Jackie Cooper, two highly capable individuals in the theatre. "Mid-Summer" was a Broadway vehicle by Vina Delmar converted into a tv offering by Arthur Heineman but certainly not worth the effort on CBS-TV (8). Plot concerned itself with a young school teacher of talent who gave up his profession for the highly precarious career of vaude entertaining.

Action took place in a seedy theatrical hotel with virtually all performers portraying stock characters, the one saving grace being the light and airy performance turned in by Marilyn Segal as the daughter of the young teacher who preferred greasepaint to blackboard chalk. The youngster was particularly striking in the scene where she did the Matthew Arnold readings and answered the minister's questions regarding God, but unfortunately other characterizations were hollow and failed utterly to materialize in this dusty tribute to the call of show biz.

TV version of Miss Delmar's play was directed by her offspring, Grey Delmar. This was his first big directorial assignment but unfortunately it didn't come off.

U.S. Steel's institutional pitch on the woman's angle among its workers was effective. This was public relations selling that made good sense. Rans.

WAMP SWAMPED IN SERIES SHUTOUT

Pittsburgh, Oct. 14.

The radio account of the fifth game of the World Series between the Yanks and the Braves from Yankee Stadium was blacked out in this area last week when an earth-moving machine cut the WAMP-AM-FM cables from its transmitter to the studio. The station was swamped with calls and the switchboard took an awful beating until service was restored.

The break took place in the middle of the game, and telephone company repairmen had the circuit back in operation three innings later. The accident also interrupted the series broadcast on six other outlets being fed by WAMP, the NBC-o&o station here.

British TV, Both Com'l and BBC, Goes On a Bigtime Science Kick

London, Oct. 14.

The serious and informative side of British television is being cultivated by both BBC-TV and commercial tv. In an age in which the population lives side by side with scientific achievement and science regularly makes newspaper headlines, the webs are playing their parts in keeping the viewer informed by explaining, teaching and demonstrating.

The BBC, for example, has screened complete and delicate operations in a series it ran a while back entitled "Your Life In Their Hands," and is now running a weekly 30-minute program, "Eye On Research," which shows how and why research into all manner of subjects is done.

Commercial tv, too, is making considerable contributions in this field with several programs, one of which, "New Horizon," has, by its considerable following, made Dr. J. Bronowski into one of commercial tv's most talked about and popular personalities.

A new fortnightly BBC-TV series, "Science Is News," will make its bow on Thursday (16). During the program's 30 minutes it will set out to bring to the viewer the latest scientific developments in physics, medicine and industry. On the same evening another program series entitled "You Take Over," will make its initial appearance. This show will deal with different occupations as seen through the eyes of the worker. The first will show an air traffic controller's job with the camera as his eyes.

Nature study is another sphere in which the BBC has devoted quite a lot of attention. In several past series it has set out to show animal life in different parts of the globe, and at the moment BBC staffer David Attenborough, brother of actor Richard Attenborough, is on a jaunt complete with camera crew, to film a new series in the "Travellers Tales" skein. In the field of hard data, the state web is also represented with a program entitled "Facts and Figures," which is aired irregularly but seldom misses the chance at least once a month to present, via graphs and charts, information on a varied assortment of topics.

During its normal run of programming each week, the BBC presents a smattering of science in several other offerings, such as "Panorama," which recently spotlighted the rocket to the moon attempts. Its five days a week 45-minute magazine offering, "Tonight," is also often a vehicle for scientific investigation and reporting.

Over on the other channel scientific activity is given plenty of air time. Dr. Bronowski's weekly 30-minute program, originating from Associated-Rediffusion, sets out to explain some of the wonders of science and living. This program has probably done more to bring science to the masses than any other offering despite its 10:15 p.m. slot. In his current series Dr. Bronowski is setting out to suggest new ways of understanding the world in which we live.

Another show which demonstrates the effectiveness of certain branches of science is Associated TeleVision's "I Hear: I See," which made its first appearance some months back as an experiment and has now returned to the schedules in a regular slot because of the interest it created. This program has a panel of experts deciding the physical appearance, age and occupation by listening to the voice of a concealed person.

In a 5 p.m. slot is Granada-TV's Canadian import, "The Living Sea," in which Dr. Ian McTaggart Cowan explores the ocean bed, while A-R's weekly "People In Trouble" has recently been spotlighting afflictions such as stuttering, and poliomyelitis and their cures and treatment. On Sunday afternoons ATV is airing "It Can Happen Tomorrow," which sets out to forecast the progress of science within the next 20 years.

The BBC has long fostered the policy of presenting science to the peoples under many and various guises and also as outright scientific programs. One of the former which dealt with archaeology entitled "Animal, Vegetable and Mineral," became a top rating BBC offering, which demonstrated that there was a large percentage of the viewing public who wanted to know how things worked, what they were and how they came about. Commercial tv has chipped in with its contributions in this field and is also doing notable work and at the same time pulling in the audiences. It, too, is presenting the facts in many ways. One example is the popularity of the long running "Emergency—Ward 10" series which deals with life in a British hospital and combines romance with medical science.

HOWARD COLEMAN SHIFTS TO LANSING

Chicago, Oct. 14.

Howard Coleman, former WMAQ program manager who got caught in the NBC cutbacks locally, joins WJIM-WJIM-TV in Lansing, Mich., on Nov. 1 as administrative assistant to general manager Harold Gross. Gross is prez of Gross Telecasting Corp., whose only properties to date are the Lansing stations.

WJIM-TV is a CBS-TV basic affiliate which also carries some NBC and ABC programming. The radio outlet is an NBC affil.

For nearly two months, after his departure from WMAQ, Coleman had been working on a special short-term project at the J. Walter Thompson agency here.

Kortner, Claman Added As 'Pursuit' Producers

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

CBS-TV has added two more producers to the hourlong Wednesday night "Pursuit" stanza, with Peter Kortner and Julian Claman joining Alfred Russell and Eva Wolas as rotating producers under exec producer Norman Felton.

Russell is doing the first four and Miss Wolas the following quartet, but the rotating pattern has not been set beyond that, nor have the number each will do.

WJAR-TV's Commie Series

Providence, Oct. 14.

A history-making tv presentation is underway by WJAR-TV of a series of telecasts, filmed and live of "The Philosophy of Communism" starting Oct. 20 under the direction of Father John F. Reid, O. P., asst. prof. of philosophy in the School of Adult Education of Providence College. Series will continue through Nov. 23 and, for the first time, is an accredited college course.

Father Reid will deliver the lecture and will present interviews, some on film, with such varied personalities as Boris Krylov, Minister of Cultural Affairs of the Russian Embassy; Marion B. Folsom, former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare; Josip de Franceski of the Jugo-Slavian Embassy and chairman John C. Doerfer of the FCC, among others.

Other Webs Rally To CBS Cause As Reds Shut Bureau

Aftermath of "Playhouse 90's" production of "The Plot to Kill Stalin" on CBS-TV was the Soviet Government's order to CBS to expulsion of correspondent Paul Niven.

In the past, such behaviour on the part of foreign governments toward American broadcasters usually brought forth little if no sympathy from rival webs. In this instance, there were unanimous blasts from opposition networks to the USSR's action in blacking out CBS News' coverage in Moscow.

The CBS news bureau was opened in Moscow in 1955 by Daniel Schorr. Schorr was unable to return some months ago, when the Russians refused him a reentry permit. After "The Plot to Kill Stalin" was presented in which Khrushchev was shown preventing a USSR official from giving medical aid to Stalin near death, the Foreign Ministry's Press Dept. ordered the shutdown of the CBS office. Moscow made no specific complaint against Niven but recalled his accreditation.

Sig Mickelson, veep of CBS Inc. and general manager of CBS News, protested the expelling of Niven and said the USSR had again violated the principles of mutual understanding. "The injury to CBS News is less than the injury to the American Public because this action destroys one more channel in the flow of first-hand information from the USSR," he said.

William R. McAndrew, veep of NBC News, also urged the State Dept. to protest the Soviet's closing of the CBS News Bureau. Chet Huntley, NBC-TV commentator, took the Soviet government to task. "To punish a tv news dept.

Nabisco's 'Uncle Al'

Nabisco inked for a third sponsorship of a new daytime Saturday telecast by ABC-TV. "Uncle Al," a kid stanza fed by WCPO, Cincinnati, premieres in the web's 11-to-noon slot on the 18th, with Nabisco beginning its bankrolling as of Nov. 1.

A daytime Saturday deal to air Soupy Sales, a comedian who works out of WXYZ, ABC's Detroit owned & operated station, fell through just prior to the Nabisco deal on "Uncle Al." Sales was set for the noon-to-1 anchorage, but ABC gave no reason for squelching the deal.

'Absentee Landlords' Hit by Chi Mayor as Live Program Sluff Becomes a Political Football

By LES BROWN

Chicago, Oct. 14.

The fuse is afire on the charges the Chicago AFTRA chapter hurled at the networks a week ago for their alleged discriminatory practices at the Windy City's three o&o stations. Just when the local trade made up its mind that the local outpost of the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists had sent the FCC a dud, they found out that it was an old fashioned time-bomb loaded with high explosives.

For, after all, this is an election year, and the politicos of this state and municipality have proven most willing to carry the ammunition all the way, if it doesn't get there by itself. For them it's a natural, a clear cut issue as the AFTRA complaint depicts it: outside interests, namely the networks in New York, are on the make for Chicago's money—it being the nation's second largest market; and, in milking their own stations for the gold, are robbing the town of a broadcast culture of its own.

So today, the preservation of live local programming is Topic One in the toddlin' town trade—anything to keep the Federals from the door.

The developments, in a week, have been headspinning:

ITEM: Following Illinois Senator Paul Douglas' irascible telegram to Gen. David Sarnoff last week, demanding expression of the midwest point of view on the airwaves, Congressman Sidney R. Yates got into the act with a pointed wire to the FCC requesting public hearings on the question of WNBQ's license renewal. Yates accused the station of failing to fulfill its obligation of community service and asked for an opportunity to testify.

(WNBQ and NBC come in for the lion's share of the harassment because of a recent mopup of live programs at the o&o, following a shakeup of command.)

'Absentee Landlords'

ITEM: Richard J. Daley, Mayor of Chicago, surprised a Broadcast Advertising Club gathering last Tuesday by digressing from one of his standard sugary peptalks about the glories of the Windy City to slam the "absentee landlords" of the Chicago stations. After praising Chi's radio and tv contributions of the past, Daley snapped the local trade panjandrums to awakedness with the remark, "It is the responsibility of the radio and tv industry to give opportunity to the technicians and to give voice and expression to the talent, culture and dreams of these Americans, without whose support and purchases in the local community the networks would fade from the American scene like vaudeville and the nickelodeon."

Daley said he too had wired the chairman of the FCC to investigate the facts re the elimination of local programming. Daley's speech was broadcast on WCFL and rebroadcast this past weekend on WGN.

ITEM: All the noise, especially that made by the local press, has set the stations to boasting about their live programming, reflected in the boilerplate released by the press departments. WBKB, for one, added three nightly weathercasts this week and formally apologized to the press for bringing up a meteorologist from Dallas to do the programs. "If we could have found a Chicagoan to interpret weather on radar," the station chieftain said, "we'd have used him."

ITEM: Lloyd Yoder, new veepee in charge of the NBC o&o's, finally broke his silence after taking three weeks of abuse for his purge of live programs on WNBQ. Said Yoder: "The changes were made with only one thought in mind: to offer programs of more appeal to more members of the Chicago viewing audience. I have come to Chicago with the firm intention of making the city my home. There will be no 'absentee' management at WNBQ." Yoder reiterated his early explanation that the sloughed programs had virtually no audience compared with competing shows, indicating that they were not of great interest to Chicago audiences.

ITEM: News analyst Clifton Utley, who won this year's Peabody Award and whose five minute strip got dumped on WNBQ to make room for more Jack Paar, eloquently supported the management viewpoint on his swan song last week. Said he: "If other types of programs command bigger audiences than this, as they unquestionably do, then it is extremely difficult to insist that the proprietor of a tv station be content with less than the maximum audience he can command. For on that depends his income."

ITEM: Utley, over the weekend, got a new berth on WNBQ, his nightly stint expanded to 10 minutes. He replaces newscaster Len O'Connor, who remains on staff and for whom, the station indicated, it would try to pry open a new slot. Probably this will be in Clint Youle's adjacent period. Youle's six-figure contract expires early in 1959 and is a cinch not to be renewed. Incidentally, WNBQ promised to find a new spot for Utley when his old stanza was booted, so it was not bowing to recent public protest in reinstating him at night.

Remains to be seen now what the o&o stations will be doing to head the FCC off at the pass and to quell the uprising of politician outrage. Or maybe they are waiting for the fire to get hotter.

Like political platforms before elections, the early promises of a station seeking a license sometimes comes back to haunt them. F'rinstance, it's recalled in many circles how elaborately WBBM-TV, the CBS station, appealed for its right to Channel 2 back in 1953. Jack Van Volkenburg, then prez of the Columbia network, assured the FCC of "as many as 12 hours of week of network programs in Chicago."

H. Leslie Atlass, veepee in charge of the station, said that if WBBM-TV had a license and good studio facilities it would maintain a stock company of 30 or 40 actors all working on the beltline of originations for CBS-TV.

Around three years ago, WBBM-TV created and moved into the best studio facilities in town. Last year it lost the last of its network shows. Never did get up to 12 hours a week.

B'cast Engineers Union Again Slapped Down In CBS Lighting Dispute

Washington, Oct. 14.

The Radio and Television Broadcast Engineers Union has again been slapped down in its dispute with CBS over operation of lights for remote television pickups.

The National Labor Relations Board ordered the union to stop inducing CBS employes to strike because of the web's assignment of the lighting work to members of the Theatrical Stage Employes local.

The jurisdictional wrangle arose out of the scheduled telecasting of the Antionette Perry Awards at the Waldorf Astoria in New York April, 1957. CBS gave the lighting assignments to the stage hands, and the technicians thereupon refused to do the show.

The NLRB later that year found that CBS was not obliged under its contracts to give either the stage hands or the technicians exclusive rights to perform the remote lighting dutiees. Furthermore, by inducing the Perry Award walkout, the Broadcast Engineers had violated Taft-Hartley's prohibition of jurisdictional strikes, the Board held.

The Engineers denied any unfair labor practices and contended it had been unable to develop its case fully at the NLRB hearings. As a result, the NLRB General Counsel issued a new complaint alleging that the Engineers local had refused to comply with the Board's findings.

"The CBS Television Network commands 6% larger average nighttime audiences than last year; 27% larger than the second network; 29% larger than the third*... reaches the largest audiences 5 out of 7 nights a week*... broadcasts 6 of the top 10 nighttime programs*... delivered 7 of the 10 biggest audiences for new program premieres..."

*Trendex, Oct. 1-7
Trendex, Sept. 6-Oct. 7

(Multi-City Arbitron in general agrees with Trendex, but credits the CBS Television Network with bigger audiences, bigger leads over other networks, and 7 of the top 10)

You can draw any number of conclusions from the earliest reports on the new season, and each of them would make a delightful success story about the CBS Television Network.

You could say the audiences for the Network's programs are larger this year because the total television audience has grown.

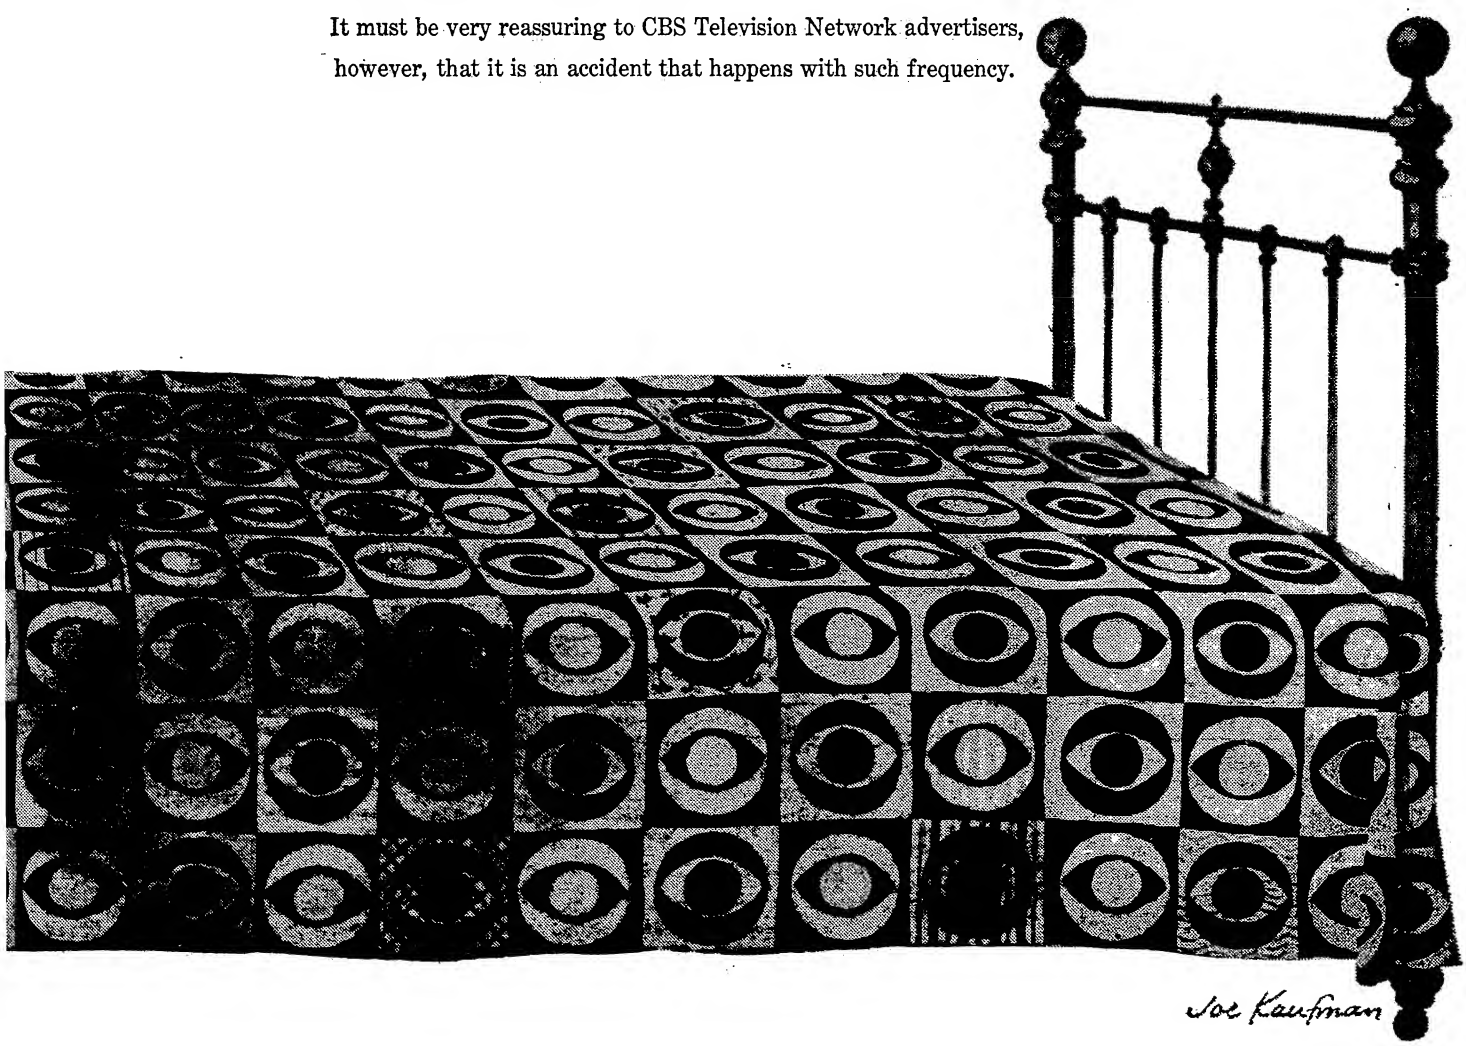
You could say the reports are the result of sound program planning coupled with an unprecedented drive to make the audience aware of the Network's program schedule.

You could say the Network is merely reaping the rewards of a long-established reputation for creative program leadership and that the audience tunes first to its programs out of sheer habit.

You could also say it is far too early in an intensely competitive season to spot a decisive trend in network leadership.

Or you can call it all a happy accident.

It must be very reassuring to CBS Television Network advertisers, however, that it is an accident that happens with such frequency.



VARIETY-TELEPULSE CITY-BY-CITY PROGRAM CHART.

VARIETY's weekly chart is based on the 22 major markets regularly reported by Telepulse each month, in addition to 133 other Telepulse tabulated U.S. markets, covered over the course of a year. Cities will be rotated weekly. The VARIETY chart is a compilation of data on syndicated films, as well as network and live programs, in each market. Under the top 10 multi-weekly heading, the (†) stands for local programming and the (*) for network shows.

afternoons," he said "But during the daily peak of viewing hours, tv in the main insulates us from the realities of the world in which we live. If this state of affairs continues, we may alter an advertising slogan to read: 'Look Now, Pay Later.' For surely we shall pay for using this most powerful instrument of communication to insulate the citizenry from the hard and demanding realities which must be faced if we are to survive. I mean the word—survive-literally."

Controversial subjects, presented fairly and calmly, should not be feared, Murrow said, citing such aired discussions as Egypt and Israel, cigaret smoking and lung cancer, radio-active fallout as features that proved satisfactory to both sides. Timidity in these and other areas, is not warranted by the evidence, he declared.

Murrow also looked at the alleged war of the newspaper critics against tv and radio. "It is a fact that the newspapers and magazines are the only instruments of mass communication which remain free from sustained and regular critical comment," he said. "If the network spokesmen are so anguished about what appears in print, let them come forth and engage in a little sustained and regular comment regarding newspapers and magazines. It is an ancient and sad fact that most people in network tv and radio have an exaggerataed regard for what appears in print. And there have been cases where executives have refused to make even private comment on a program for which they were responsible, until they had read the reviews in print. This is hardly an exhibition of confidence."

Murrow pooh-poohed the argument advanced by some broadcasters that the industry is young and therefore not as experienced as older media. Yielding to Washington or other political pressure creates precedent and tradition, he said. He also lamented the lack of detailed news shows. "In this kind of complex and confusing world you can't tell very much about the why of the news in broadcasts where only three minutes is available for news," he said. "The only man who could do that was Elmer Davis, and his kind aren't about any more. If radio news is to be regarded as a commodity, only acceptable when saleable, and only when packaged to fit the advertising appropriation of a sponsor, then I don't care what you call it—I say it isn't news."

He also recalled the time when the fear of a reduction in biz did not result in a cutback in bodies in the news and public affairs department at a time when network profits had just reached an alltime high. "We would agree, I think, that whether on a station or a network, the stapling machine is a poor substitute for a news room typewriter," he said.

He took to task the networks that did not come to CBS' defense when the White House criticized the former's interview with Nikita Khrushchev and also cited the industry for protesting John Foster Dulles' banning of American journalists from Communist China. Furthermore, he criticized both CBS and NBC for carrying delayed broadcasts of a Presidential address dealing with the possibility of war between the U.S., the USSR and Communist China.

Closer inspection and punitive action by the FCC upon broadcast licensees who have welched on their promises as to what they will do in terms of program content might be a remedy, he said. "The money making machine somehow blunts their memories," he added. "But in the view of many this would come perilously close to supervision of program content by a Federal agency."

Murrow said he wasn't advocating that tv turn into a 27-inch wailing wall "where longhairs constantly moan about the state of our culture and our defense." But he did hope that it would reflect occasionally on "the hard, unyielding realities of the world in which we live. I would like to see it done inside the existing framework and I would like to see the doing of it redound to the credit of those who finance and program it. Measure the results by Nielsen, Trendex or Silex—it doesn't matter, the main thing is to try."

Responsibility, according to Murrow, "rests on big business, and on big television, and it rests on top."

Roach Studios, since its acquisition by Scranton Corp., has been shopping around for a syndication arm. Scranton Corp. is a subsidiary of F. L. Jacobs, which is listed on the N. Y. Stock Exchange. Scranton recently bought the Mutual network.

Roach recently put in an unsuccessful bid to buy Flamingo Telefilm Sales. Parties could not agree on price.

Also on the slate is Walter Newman's adaptation of Kay Boyle's "The Crazy Hunter," and a Lucille Ball solo starrer, a comedy titled "Pardon My Gloves," scripted by the regular "Lucy" writers, Madelyn Martin and Bob Carroll, and starring Aldo Ray and Bill Lundigan.

On the musical side, Johnny Green will produce a Christmas Show, for which he's dickering Van Cliburn, the Los Angeles Symphony and the Roger Wagner Chorale, and will handle two or three other musicals later on. Studio is finding it difficult to come up with good musical properties, and has held off finalizing any of those it's been considering to date. As for producers other than Green, Desilu has brought in Don Sharpe & Warren Lewis for a few, Monash, Jerry Stagg and Quinn Martin.

which about 550 have not yet been shown here. Although the library is the biggest locally for feature films, a few other stations elsewhere which have attempted to corner the movie market have more. WCBS-TV in New York, for instance, reportedly has about 2,200.

The WTOP-TV plan under Hayes and tv v.p. George F. Hartford calls for running no picture more than six times in four and one-half years. Also, no movie will be shown more than three times on the same show; that is, "Late," "Late, Late," etc.

Latest WTOP-TV purchases were 360 Paramount and 120 MGM feature films during August. Earlier the station had bought from MGM, 20th-Fox, Warner Bros., United Artists and Columbia, plus a package from Screen Gems.

Inside Stuff—Radio-TV

Charges by Charles Calame, business manager of 1212, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, were denied by Paul G. Hale, in a letter sent by the latter to the local's periodic news bulletin. The bulletin last month printed a letter from Calame, alleging that Hale was guilty of dereliction as a union member during a CBS strike.

It was Hale who headed a committee that recently investigated Calame and others in the 1212 administration. This "evaluation committee" drew up a report which lambasted the administration, and afterwards Calame wrote the letter implying that Hale was anti-administration because his "uncle" was once biz manager for IATSE, now a rival to IBEW in tv. He also said Hale had a cousin expelled from 1212 for "treason."

Hale has released a copy of his own letter to the news bulletin denying the charges. It is intended for the next bulletin to be issued. In it, Hale denied that he had either an uncle in IA or a cousin expelled from IBEW for treason. He said Calame "had to go back 20 years to find a foundation for his attack," and that the biz manager was "creating a fictitious relationship."

Hale "categorically" denied a charge by Calame of dereliction regarding the strike last April.

NBC-TV tends to minimize the financial applications of the recent overseas deal it made with American Federation of Television & Radio Artists insofar as it presently concerns tape. Union achieved a contract addition whereby its members can earn up to 45% of initial acting fees via the foreign sale of tape or kinescope of programs produced live in the U. S.

It was pointed out that tape can ultimately become the source of lucre abroad that AFTRA expects it to be, but for now none of the European or Far Eastern countries can transmit tape made in the U.S. In England, it was pointed out, the tape cycle differs from ours, plus that there is still the difference in homescreen lineage, which in someway affects the electronic transmission of tape.

This being the case, the networks are restricted in the sale of their programs to kinescope recordings.

Gotham's mayor, Robert F. Wagner, is setting aside Sunday, Oct. 26 as Omnibus Day in New York City. Hizonner will kudo Bob Saudek, the producer on Tuesday, Oct. 21, in the usual City Hall ceremony for helping to raise programming standards.

Seventh season of "Omnibus" starts Sunday (26) with Boston barrister Joseph N. Welch as top attraction in a fullscale inspection of capital punishment.

The Veterans Hospital Radio Guild, a non-profit organization which trains hospitalized veterans to produce their own shows for broadcast over hospital networks, has changed its name to the Veterans Hospital Radio & Television Guild. Membership of the VHRTG comprises actors, writers, producers, musicians and technicians who tour the various veterans' centers. Alex Kramer, ASCAP board member, is prexy.

As part of its expansion program, TWW, the commercial tv station which serves South Wales and the West of England, has appointed Mark Lawton as head of production. Before joining TWW, Lawton was a features director with Granada-TV and a producer-director with TV Advertising.

Everybody's familiar with tv warmups but Garry Moore is reversing the procedure. In turf lingo, he's cooling his "hots."

When his CBS-TV show is over at 11 p.m., the comic pulls up a tall stool and sounds off for 15 minutes with those of his studio audience who don't have to catch a train. Then there's a q&a period.

CBS-TV has released approximately 2,000 prints of 23 different programs to the Armed Forces TV service for rebroadcast thus far this year. Web made an average of 11 prints per episode available for viewing by overseas troops. More than 1,000 prints were released from N.Y. and more than 750 from Hollywood. Practically all top network shows are included in the distribution by web's Film Services Dept.

VARIETY-PULSE FEATURE CHART

Variety's weekly chart, based on ratings furnished by Pulse's latest reports on feature films and their competition covers 155 markets. Each week, two different markets will be listed, with the 10 top-rated features tabulated.

Factors which would assist distributors, agencies, stations and advertisers in determining the effectiveness of a feature show in a specific market have been included in this Variety chart. Listed below is such pertinent information regarding features as their stars, release year, original production company and the present distributor included wherever possible along with the title. Attention should be paid to such factors as the time and day, the high and low ratings for the measured feature period and share of audience, since these factors reflect the effectiveness of the feature and audience composition, i.e., a late show at 11:15 p.m. would hardly have any children viewers, but its share of audience may reflect dominance in that time period. In the cities where stations sell their feature programming on a multi stripped basis utilizing the same theatrical throughout the week a total rating for the total number of showings for the week is given, the total rating not taking into account the duplicated homes factor. Barring unscheduled switches in titles the listed features for the particularly rated theatrical filmed show are as accurate as could be ascertained. Under Time Slot, S. O. stands for Sign-Off.

SCIENCE CALLING
(Go Science, Young Man)
With Ben Grauer, host; guests
Producer: Steve White
25 Mins., Sun., 2:05 p.m.
WRCA Radio, N.Y.

WRCA Radio got under way Sunday (12) a series tagged "Go Science, Young Man," in cooperation with Gotham's public high schools. It is part of the NBC owned outlet's desire to stimulate interest in science. Here listeners get a first-hand account from the high school science labs. Ben Grauer is moderating with his accustomed informality and has no trouble making participants project. First program originated at Bronx High School of Science where students were engrossed in a lab discussion of Newton's laws. During the program one of the teachers expressed hope that the schools would be the recipients of more tv and radio programs featuring the greats in science. Demand for scientists is endless, a physics prof said, adding that they don't all have to be Albert Einsteins. Unfortunately, more such programs as "Go Science, Young Man" could easily turn English and History into neglected minor subjects. However, one of the nice things about the current emphasis on science in the schools is that "Silas Marner" could easily be supplanted by, say, silicon transistors. "Go Science, Young Man" should make many converts to science. Rans.

JAZZ IS MY BEAT
With Jim Lowe, Elliot Lawrence Band, guests
Producer-director: Dick Teela
Writers: Marianna Norris, Dick Ellison
25 Mins., Mon.-thru-Fri., 8:35 p.m.
CBS-Radio, from New York

"Live from New York" has almost become an obsolete phrase in "radioland" but there are still some AM-ers around who know how to put together a highly listenable musical series without the crutch of disk company output.

Such an affair is "Jazz Is My Beat" which Jim Lowe hosts in an easy, affable manner with music assists from Elliot Lawrence's crew and a pair of guests a night. There are no pitfalls here of "meanings of jazz" or "whither jazz?" that so many jazz shows can't seem to avoid and which makes this a series for the squares as well as the hipsters. Producer-director Dick Teela and his alternating writers Marianna Norris and Dick Ellison accent the musical values and keep the palaver at a minimum and Lowe steers it through an effortless and entertaining 25 minutes.

On show caught last Wednesday (8), crooner Austin Cromer and flutist Sam Most spelled Lawrence's crew. The crooner came over pleasantly with "A Foggy Day" and "This Love Of Mine" while Most whipped up a neat flute sound on "Cherokee." Lawrence and his sidemen hit on cool, free-wheeling stride with "Idaho," "Shortnin' Bread" and "Fascinatin' Rhythm." It was "studio" music at its best.

Before the Wednesday show began, Robert Q. Lewis closed his preceding program with "It's time to say goodnight to the thousands of people who are not listening." It's a sad commentary especially when there are shows like "Jazz Is My Beat" around. Gros.

WTPS' 200G Sale

Rounsaville. Sale is subject to Federal Communications Commission approval. Price is $200,000.

Rounsaville owns radio stations in Atlanta, where he lives, Cincinnati, Louisville, Nashville, Tampa and Miami.

SCRIPTER LOU DERMAN'S FUNNY 'MAILMAN' BOOK

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

TV-radio scripter Lou Derman's "You Can't Mail An Elephant" (Exposition; $3) lights up its 163 pages with delightful persiflage and hilarious hossplay but it's not all fluff stuff. At times he turns serious to recall his days as a mail clerk and related jobs for Uncle Sam. But it's the gags that make the book a gay literary romp.

To give an idea of the contents, here are a few of the chapter titles: "Sexual Behavior in American Mails," "Confessions of a Virgin," "Give a Boss a Clerk He Can Ride," "Mutiny of the Stomach" and "Only Dopes Keep Diaries," which makes Derman a dope as the tome is subtitled "The Diary of a Postal Clerk."

There's enough meat in the volume for a comedy show (with a built-in audience of thousands of mail-carriers and kindred souls). Should Parke Levy need a Christmas show for "December Bride," of which Derman is head writer, he will find it in "Elephant." Who's more popular at Yuletime that the guy who carries the mail?

"Elephant" is purely a laughing matter. It's no gag, it's a very funny book. Helm.

United Paramount Theatres in February 1953.

The focus is on Chicago, which was indeed the key city in the AB-PT merger, where two stations as well as two big corporations were melding. What the book goes on to dramatize is how power factions are created by the union of companies; how each scrambles to every disreputable device to dispose of the other; how individuals involved and their families are made to suffer in the press for control; and how at last the growing pains end and an augmented giant gets back on its feet through teamwork.

Per usual (in this case in the dedication, placed eccentrically at the end of the book), the author enters the disclaimer that his characters are impurely fictional, sans living prototypes, but even a neophyte in the business back when the merger took place is able to pinpoint most of the true-life counterparts, who, by the way, are still around, if occupied in other businesses. Matching the real person with the "created" one is part of the fun of reading the book, and this should make it quite a conversation piece in the trade.

Thomas Wolfe wrote once of the trials of a fiction writer who couldn't go home again after he had written an openly honest novel about the people who had surrounded his childhood. Red Quinlan is certainly no Tom Wolfe in terms of the written word, but his first venture in the literary form is in another sense, more daring than Wolfe's. Quinlan has never left home. He still has to live with the people who will recognize themselves in his story.

For a non-pro, Quinlan writes in a lucid but unpolished prose that has occasional flashes of being the real thing. He has a fine sense of the colorful anecdote, knows how to build dramatic situations, and has documented some poignant and heartening truths about a business he is not only familiar with but loves. For all the gore of the industry bloodbaths and for all his deploring the injustices and the hurt, Quinlan betrays not a note of bitterness nor of disenchantment.

It is quite obvious he had one eye fixed on Hollywood all the while he was undertaking this 331-page chore, and it might not be a bad idea now if Hollywood returned the look.

'TOP DOLLAR' CUES 250G COAST SUIT

Los Angeles, Oct. 14.

Charging that ideas he submitted to CBS in 1954 for a tv series tagged "Money Talks" had been incorporated in net's show, "Top Dollar," writer Eugene Borden is asking $250,000 damages in Superior Court suit.

Action also was brought, in addition to CBS, against Ted Bates & Co., Brown and Williamson Tobacco Corp., Colgate Palmolive Co., and Entertainment Productions.

ates in the respective top markets have few slots for syndicated product and in N. Y., WCBS-TV and WRCA-TV prefer syndicated entries with built-in sponsors. If the show is already sold on a contingent basis to the indies, it's not available to the regional seeking a flagship berth.

Utilized to a greater extent by the major syndicators is the "feel 'em out" approach. Field force, acting as intelligence agents, reports to the N. Y. office on the potential for a series. When that potential is considered hot enough, the go ahead signal is given. Conditions are such in today's lively market that a few major syndicators can release at the rate of about one every two months.

If any network or sponsor cares to break my streak, please call my agents, GAC.

In the meantime, I guess I'll just have to go on killing them in night clubs, supermarkets, bar mitzvah s, and of course, my occasional appearances on the Jack Paar show, for which I am grateful.

ranged from opera to cabaret singing, didn't come over smoothly. Kay Thompson, wearing a skin tight gown and some fancy headgear, died a couple of beat numbers, "I Love A Violin," and "Just One Of Those Things," with plenty of gusto, but the entries jarred within the sedate atmosphere of the program. In another spot she read from her book "Eloise," while sketches of the child were screened.

Trevor Howard contributed some poetry reading in the lighter style after warning viewers that poetry could be fun, while opera singer Sari Barabas voiced an aria from "The Merry Wives Of Windsor," and came back for the finale to sing the "Easter Hymn" from Cavalleria Rusticana with the Royal Choral Society and the Eric Robinson orch. The mime spot was supplied by Scottish comedian Jimmy Logan aided by Marilly Gray, who portrayed an aged couple attending church. The humor content of the piece was completely lost in the embarrassing silence.

"Riverside One" will have to brighten up considerably if it wants to attract any sizable audience and offer competition to the commercial web. Bary.

PANORAMA
With Richard Dimbleby, Christopher Chataway, George Scott, Robert Kee, John Freeman, others Producer: Rex Moorfoot
Editor: Rex Moorfoot
Associate Producers: David Wheeler, Kenneth Lamb
45 Mins., Mon., 9 p.m.
BBC-TV, from London

In "Panorama," the BBC has one of the weightiest contributions to intelligent television aired by either web. It is the daddy of all tv news magazine programs and has achieved stature for its work in probing world affairs with a candid and unbiased outlook. It is now back in BBC's schedules with an unaltered formula of presentation and as keen a nose for news as ever. Since its inception the program has been introduced by w.k. British tv personality Richard Dimbleby. He's back in the chair once more doing a neat job and lends authority to the offering. The interviewing team, too, is on the ball, and includes ex-Olympic runner Christopher Chataway, who's as good in his new job as he was on the track.

Among the topics which came under the "Panorama" eye in the program caught were reports from Cape Canaveral on how the once desolate spot had turned into a boom town. There was a filmed report from Hong Kong about life in this spot surrounded by Red China; a look at the plight of folk who stood to be evicted from their homes because of a new Government Rent Act; and an amazing display of magic by teenager Dill Russell, who worked out a Houdini trick of escaping from a coffin of ice in four minutes. Bary.

OPEN-AIR BARBECUE
With Michael Medwin, Glen Mason, Marion Keene, Rita Street, Guy Taylor, Gerry Grant, The Norman Whitehead orch., The Norman Whitehead Singers, Norman Rossington
Director: Jeff Inman
30 Mins., Mon., 11 p.m.
TWW, from Cardiff

This show had the cards stacked against it before it went on the air. It was beamed from TWW's open air studio at Pontcanna, Cardiff, where rain was falling steadily, and while the artists got wetter and wetter and sang between mouthfulls of hamburgers and hot dogs the production got increasingly bogged down. Hardly anything went right. Show was supposed to capture the atmosphere of an outdoor barbecue with lots of happy, smiling faces and a carefree air. It got so carefree that cues were missed and the only fun appeared to be private gags in which the viewer could not join.

Program was mainly devoted to songs which were pre-recorded and to which the artist mimed. There were times when the renderings almost made amends for the production, but these were rare. Bary.

Foreign TV Followup

Sunday Night at the Palladium

"Sunday Night at the Palladium" has become so habit forming that viewers are likely to accept it without much demur. But the show caught (5) again provided convincing proof that there is difficulty in finding enough star acts to make the show a topper. Brian Tesler's direction and staging were slick enough but there was a general atmosphere of "this-has-all-been-seen-before" about the show.

Heading the bill were The Platters, an amiable singing group on disks, but far from exciting visually. They sang "Twilight Time," "My Serenade" and "Don't Let Go" in a manner so relaxed as to make no real impact. Heftier singing came from Luigi Infantino with a couple of songs, "This is the Place of The Sun Shining" and "Milano," his own composition. Robust, but again not highly visual.

Best item was the immaculate venting of Senor Wences, a popular act with U.K. audiences. His routine came up as fresh as crisp salad, with witty patter and perfect technique. The Three Monarchs weighed in with their now overfamiliar comedy harmonica act and Rudy Cardenas, a Mexican juggler, did his stint very well but, frankly, offered nothing that did not appear to have been seen on similar bills a hundred times.

Bruce Forsyth emceed with eagerness and obvious desire to please. Apart from a few gags he did a fair skit on a girl crooner and handled "Beat the Clock" as well as this rock-bottom feature can possibly be done. The jackpot stood at $1,120 and the contestants never remotely looked like winning the loot.

Dance routines and orchestral backing were fully up to scratch, as usual. Rich.

hour in this NTA Film Network series, that the star Rex Reason is given a chance to use his brains at least as much as his brawn.

A little wooden, perhaps, but an actor of matinee idol potential, Reason enacted the intellectual, warm-hearted editor of a small-town western newspaper, who unwittingly takes on a baby faced killer as poet-printer's devil. The kid gang leader, whom actor Richard Jaeckel makes likeable, is in town with his whole mob for only one reason-revenge. As he gets to know the editor and the townsfolk, especially the banker he's bent on killing, he softens. However, Jaeckel's killed when his mob forces him to go through with a robbery.

With all those muscles, it's hard for Reason to be consistently effective as the brainy type, but he seems to get by a good part of the time. Mort Mills, as the deadpan town marshal, and others of the cast were okay in support. Art.

MUSIC MAKERS
With Jack Kane Orch, Sylvia Murphy, Stan Kenton and June Christy, guestars
Producer: Norman Sedawie
Writers: Frank Peppiat, Frank Iacci
30 Mins.; Thurs., 8 p.m.
PONDS COLD CREAM
CBC-TV, from Toronto
(J. Walter Thompson)

Back from his eight-weeks' summer replacement on the Steve Allen Show, during which he was musical director and arranger for the Eydie Gorme and Steve Lawrence songs, Jack Kane is on again for 40 weeks over the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.'s 40-station network, again sponsored by Ponds and Sunbeam. It's the first time a band group has been carried over for a second season by the CBC and the same underwriting sponsors.

With supreme confidence and know-how on the teeoff, Kane and his band whammed into their "South Ramport Street Parade" for a jazz and well-disciplined opening number, with stepout solos by Kane on clarinet, Murray Ginsberg on trombone, and Gordie Braund on trumpet, with trio coming in on the finish. It proved a hot, exciting opening.

Maintaining the tempo was June Christy, a blond in bangs, for her "Let There Be Love," the four trumpet players of Kane's orch for their imitations of band styles, this a novelty; plus lots of camera closeups, together with speed. For a tempo change, Miss Christy was excellent in her ballad of "The Willow" but a highlight in the program was Stan Kenton's "borrowing" of the Kane band in telling the history of the Kenton combo.

Latter illustrated the Kenton orch's development over the past decade, with Kenton presenting a tight story of progressive jazz and his interpolated expressionism, illustrated by Kane's orch and the swift lecture talks of Kenton in his innovation of more modern music seguing into popular timing. Such tempo changes were illustrated by Sylvia Murphy and June Christy on vocals of "Tampico" and "Mechito," with Kenton at the piano plugging his "experimental music."

season-start vantage point, it looks like the "return of the comics" has developed into a big bust with Jackie Gleason in particular (after a disappointing opening show) getting his nose rubbed in Trendex sand as ABC's Disney program left him trailing on his second time out. Milton Berle, although hitting the jackpot on his initial rating, proved, like Gleason, he's back with an old format and old standups and Ed Wynn's Thursday entry is already shaky as option time nears on his shorterm sponsor pickup. George Burns (sans Gracie Allen) is still to come up.

Equally as intrigung is the fact that television's "western" omelet is turning into a big fried egg. Strange situation has cropped up since the start of the new season, with result that the western stars and their tv packagers are lamenting: "the funniest thing happened to us on our way to the tv corral." In a nutshell, the westerns seem destined to kill off one another in the Top 10 popularity picture.

"Restless Gun" was NBC-TV's hot Monday night Top 10 entry and along comes CBS this season, throws in "The Texan" as its 8 to 8:30 competition, with result that both shows have rubbed each other out of Top 10 contention. But much more drastic is the situation in reverse, this time CBS-TV's "Gunsmoke" taking the rap as last Saturday night, NBC launched its 9:30 to 10:30 "Cimarron City" western. The NBC strategy had just the desired effect. "Cimarron" didn't get a too hefty rating but nevertheless managed to topple "Gunsmoke" from its lofty No. 1 Trendex perch where it had rested all last season, even as CBS' "Texan" has diminished the pulling power of NBC's "Restless Gun." (Only the week before "Cimarron's" preem, "Gunsmoke" was way out in front with a big fat 35.0).

Based on the initial qualitative aspects of "Cimarron City", it's more than likely that the NBC entry will also inflict the same Top 10 damage on CBS' "Have Gun Will Travel." Latter show and its companion "Gunsmoke" played it 1-2 on the Top 10 most of last season.

Wednesday's Different

NBC's "Wednesday night "Wagon Train" and ABC's Tuesday night "Wyatt Earp" are somewhat more fortunate, not faced with a competitive shoot-it-out situation, with result that their respective No. 7 and 8 Trendex berths are in no great danger. ABC's Sunday "Maverick" is still a very hot item, but there will probably enough Ed Sullivan-Steve Allen fans to keep it out of Top 10 contention.

Crazy-mixed up season? Last week Danny Thomas was going right to the top of the ladder, secondly only to "Gunsmoke," inviting speculation that when "Gunsmoke" is whittled down the comedian would reign supreme this season (and thus cueing in a rash of new situation comedies). Then comes last Monday (13) and Thomas barely noses out a victory over its NBC rival, "Peter Gunn"—proving again that nobody yet knows from nothing, and despite all the premature network yammering, it's those more authoritative Nielsen ratings a few weeks hence that will tell the story.

And then there's the Loretta Young story, too (once more reflecting the "who's-your-competition" angle). Because her rival, CBS' "$64,000 Question" is fading away on the rating charts (Revlon wants out), the NBC "Loretta Young Show" last Sunday zoomed to its highest rating (32.0). And if Miss Young is "it" for this season, look for a rash of new anthologies.

Another significant aspect of the new season: Dinah Shore, after two sock entries, hitting it big and going ahead of "GE Theatre" and the Hitchcock series. And they—the competition—said ✱ couldn't be done.

All-Tape Future

risk competing with themselves by continuing to make fresh film. To continue making film would only mean that the tape plant is not being used to its fullest capacity.

As for seeing the day when all tv stations can utilize tape programming by means of their own facilities and not those of a network transmission center, it is considered near at hand. Even if Guild Films is unsuccessful in its attempt to set up a low cost tape equipment rental-sale service to stations, though Guild is still busy with such plans, the lock of new feature films for tv is considered a key circumstance in bringing stations around to tape. One producer has already started preserving all his live dramas on tape, a reason being he sees a sales potential in the next several months among the stations that are running out of fresh feature exposures. Tape will make specials, hour and 90-minute dramas, even though there are only a few presently being done, accessible to outlets for local repeats.

Another factor in anticipated station acceptance is the cost of a tape program. When produced under optimum conditions, certain producers say, a half-hour taped program will cost far less than a similar film show, also produced in a plant that is working fulltime. Tape can be in the price range of a live show, and the savings can be transmitted to the stations.

first because of the added expense of videotape facilities charges and the cost of tape itself; second because the network has and will continue to order "retakes" on some scenes if they don't come off the first time. On the second of the three "Pursuits" already completed, there was mechanical difficulty in one scene. If the show were on the air, it would have gone through as is. With videotape, however, the web did the entire scene over, running some 20 minutes extra, and interpolated the retake into the tape.

Consequently, there's the advantage of the safety factor of a backlog, along with elimination of some of the bugs and fluffs that can pop up in live production and transmission. Still another factor, states Dozier, is an edge in getting actors who normally are afraid to do live tv, or at least are uncomfortable or self-conscious about doing it.

There's many a top performer, states Dozier, who loses confidence or tends to freeze up during a live performance, just knowing that there's an audience watching him, even if he can's see it. Such a performer sometimes won't do live tv for that reason. With tape, this fear is eliminated simply by the knowledge of the performer that he can do it over; he's not playing directly to an audience. In the case of actors who won't do live tv, tape woos 'em over; for those who will do it, but with misgivings, it ensures a more relaxed performance.

Dozier doesn't know to what extent all future live programming will be taped in advance, but on most series, at least some episodes will be taped. On "Playhouse 90," for example, he doesn't anticipate every show being taped in advance, but expects to do some shows on tape first. Next week's (23) Edward G. Robinson starrer will be pretaped, an act at a time, but for the reason of easing the physical strain on Robinson.

Thereafter, "Playhouse 90" will have two preemption dates, but the show will be done as usual and taped for future use. First of these dates is Dec. 18, for a "Du Pont Show of the Month," and "Playhouse 90" will be produced as usual, on tape, for purposes of building a backlog. Property to be done on that date hasn't been selected yet.

for something said in a dramatic show is a kind of justice which would occur only to the Kremlin which tries to make certain that Soviet musicians, painters, poets, dramatists and journalists all sound alike," Huntley said.

Although ABC did not file any official protest, John Daly, veep of the network, declared that the Soviet government "still has to learn that there is something besides controlled information."

The closing down of the CBS news bureau leaves NBC the only tv-radio network represented in Moscow by a fulltime observer, in this instance, Irving R. Levine.

The State Dept. also injected itself in the Moscow banning of CBS by having its press officer, Lincoln White, express strong disapproval. White said it constituted "indirect censorship" and "a form of intimidation."

Veep Richard M. Nixon speaking on CBS Radio's "World Tonight" last Thursday (9) said the Moscow Bureau of CBS News was ordered closed because "the leaders of the Soviet Union fear the truth."

State Dept. on Sidelines

Washington, Oct. 14.

The State Department's present plan is to watch CBS' fight with Russia from the sidelines.

State Department spoke to newsmen here Wed. (8) through Lincoln White, who said the U. S. "regrets" the get-going order to Niven. White said the Russian government's action "constitutes indirect censorship" and amounts to a "form of intimidation."

But later, in an interview with VARIETY, White said the U. S. plans no official protest to the Russian government. Neither, he said, is any other action planned beyond his statement to the press.

This doesn't mean, however, that the American Embassy in Moscow will be prevented from attempting quiet talks with Soviet officials aimed at getting CBS back into the Soviet capital. But it does mean there will be nothing on a Washington-to-Moscow highlevel basis.

Chi WBKB Talks About Weather And Does Something About It

Chicago, Oct. 14.

WBKB has found a way finally to do something about the weather. The ABC-TV anchor here has invested over $30,000 in radar, $12,000 for the basic unit and the balance in installation and hush-hush experimentation over the past month. In addition, it has pirated weathercaster Warren Culbertson, a bonafide meteorologist, from WFAA-TV in Dallas, Texas, where he had presented the first weather-by-radar telecasts.

WBKB is the second station in the country to attempt it and the first in a major city. Problem in the large cities is that "ground-clutter" is so great that the radarscope becomes muddied, but WBKB engineers in the past month have managed to eliminate the interference. Sterling (Red) Quinlan, ABC veep in charge of the station predicts a fast spread of weathercasting with radar in the bigger markets, guessing that 30 stations will be using it in a matter of months.

Quinlan has slotted five-minute "Weather by Radar" shows on WBKB thrice nightly, starting this week, and plans to increase the load in morning periods and weekends before long. Shows will use the official forecasts of the U.S. Weather Bureau, but the radar will enable the viewer to "see" the weather in radiuses of 120, 50 and 20 miles around the city. Possible, too, to do some weather prognosticating with radar, according to Culbertson, who had worked with the equipment as an Army Air Force meteorologist during World War II.

Reason WBKB hadn't said much about the weather on the air till now is that it has to buck a pair of well-established weather shows on competing stations, P. J. Hoff on WBBM-TV and Clint Youle on WNBQ. For years, these two shows had pretty well dominated the weather audiences on local channels.

So confident is Quinlan now in the power of radar that he intends to build an identity for his station as the foremost weather station in the U.S. Quinlan says he is going to build a complete weather laboratory on the 12th floor of the local ABC billet, and he plans to enlist the assistance of the U. of Chicago's highly regarded meteorology department.

ONLY PULSE DELIVERS THE 100% WHOLE SAMPLE

Of the three major television services, Pulse alone delivers the complete sample contracted for —a pre-determined sample of high accuracy.

Unlike mail-diary, meter, or telephone methods that miss millions—the educationally handicapped millions unable to cooperate in paper work; the indifferent millions who refuse the chore of record keeping; the millions who lack telephones—Pulse alone uses direct, face-to-face interviewing right in the home.

Since 1941 Pulse has developed accredited techniques of sampling, a tremendous operation, the largest known to the broadcast industry—in fact, the largest sampling outside the U. S. Census.

Looking at a typical example: you have a nighttime Television Network program? Pulse's sample "Base 6,000" for your show means that Pulse interviewers actually talk with 6,000 different families about your show. This sample of identical size —but different families—is repeated next month, and the next, and the next, a staggering cumulative total. No panel bias, no inertia.

In an interesting new slide presentation, we have compressed the essential Pulse pluses. See it. Let your own judgment, not hearsay, decide whether or not your firm can use this vital assist, profitably. We reported 222 different U. S. markets last year, more this year. Please write. NEW YORK CONFIDENTIAL
('The New Citizen')
With Lee Tracy, Gene Castle, Jimmy Oster, Dan Ocko, Amelia Romano, Tom Clancy Producer: Leon Fromkess
Director: Steve Sekely
Writer: Elwood Ullman
30 Mins.; Tues., 9 p.m.
KTTV, Los Angeles (film)

"New York Confidential," first a book by the late Jack Lait and Lee Mortimer, now emerges as vidseries, produced by TPA and filmed in Gotham. "The New Citizen," the teeoff stanza, is a good one, a tear-jerker with particular appeal for the distaffers.

You can't go too far wrong in a vidfilm if the central figure is a kid. In this instance, writer Elwood Ullman has his moppet also an orphan immigrant from Italy all alone in the big city, an ideal situation for a weeper. The kid, facing deportation because his sponsor died while he was enroute to the U.S., makes a getaway from Immigration Authorities. Columnist Lee Cochran (Lee Tracy) befriends him, and writes a human-interest yarn about the boy's plight. By the time it's in print, however, the moppet has raced away again. He gets involved with some juve toughies, is befriended by one who is a softy at heart. It all adds up to a happy ending, as the new friend's family adopts the kid after he's taken the rap for a petty theft committed by his buddy.

Tracy is, as always, good in the role of a newsman, although the lines given him make him appear a bit pompous and self-important at times. Gene Castle, as the immigrant kid, makes the best of a fat script opportunity, with a warm, pathos-filled portrayal. Jimmy Oster, Dan Ocko and Amelia Romano are okay in lesser parts. Direction of Steve Sekely is good. Daku.

MACKENZIE'S RAIDERS
With Richard Carlson, Louis Jean Heydt, Morris Ankrum, Brett King, Jim Bridges, Charles Boaz, Kenneth Alton
Director: Walter Doniger
Writer: Barney Slater
Distribtuor: Ziv
30 Mins.; Fri.; 8 p.m.
KTTV, Los Angeles

This is a horse opera, the real thing. Not a western in its accepted sense but a documented drama of the Fourth Cavalry back in the '70's when marauding Mexicans crossed the border to sack and burn homes of neighboring Texans. It points up more vividly the exploits of Col. Ranald Mackenzie, who led his little band of horsemen to wipe out the scourge of renegades. For hard-riding action and teeming suspense, this Ziv entry could build in popularity because of the growing trend of historical subjects inspired by the coming centennial of the Civil War.

As the commanding officer of the raiders, Richard Carlson projects an heroic figure torn between two choices. His secret order was to risk disgrace by flouting War Department orders or death at the hands of the Mexican bandits. He must not involve the U.S. in a diplomatic incident. Stung by the taunts of the marauders on the other bank of the Rio Grande, he takes his chances and leads the attack. His main objective is to rescue one of his charges held prisoner by the enemy. The bandits are put to flight after hand-to-hand encounter with sabres and the prisoner rescued.

Carlson is an inspiring figure as the commander after long service in other Ziv telepix and moves his men with disciplined precision. Supporting players are equally adept at their assignments. Walter Doniger directed with all the excitement of horse soldiers on a rampage. Kellogg and Pontiac (with Victor Borge) took the tab on KTTV. Helm.

A mildly diverting half-hour is served up in this CBS Films entry, the only first-run made for syndication comedy series offered for the fall season.

Initialer had some amusing moments and Alan Mowbray as the aging elegant con man was perfect in his role. But he and the proceedings were hobbled by a script that telegraphed each and every turn of the plot. That hardly triggers the laugh meter for a sustained good time.

Series, based on SatEvePost stories by Everett Rhodes Castle, had its first exposure some years back on the DuMont network as a live show. The CBS syndication subsid clicked off sufficient contingent orders this season to give the greenlight on production. It's an entry which surely expands the variety of syndication product, confined mainly to the action-adventure format. Opener, in production values and technical know-how, compares favorably with network entries. But "Colonel Flack" doesn't have the style, scripting and hilarious madcap pace for it to be touted as syndication's answer to a Phil Silvers, for example.

Preem show concerned Mowbray's (Col. Flack) unmasking of a phony, bluebeard murdering "countess." His sidekick was Frank Jenks, who mugged effectively and proved a good foil. (Mowbray and Jenks will be the running characters). Good assists were offered by Hillary Brooke as the alluring femme fatale and Phyllis Avery and Mark Roberts, of the worried publishing firm.

When Mowbray is given some good lines, as fed to him in the car sale situation, he can be quite amusing. The vet performer has timing, skill and a winning roguish manner. But he needs scripts worthy of his talents to lift the show out of the "mildly amusing" niche.

With Robert Beatty, Duncan Lamont, William Hartnell, Sydney Tafler, Peter Reynolds, Ronald Adams, others Producer: Harry Alan Towers
Director: Alvin Rakoff
Writer: Ted Willis
30 Mins., Tues.; 9:30 p.m.
KTTV, Los Angeles (film)

That string of 9's in the title is what Londoners call when trouble brews. In this opening incident it brought Scotland Yard into full cry to run down a band of racketers after a knifing in the street. It rocked with action through the streets of London to raise a high pitch of excitement. It's a strong entry for the late airing and should do as well rating-wise as the indie's other syndicated programs.

Filmed in London, the meller wisely avoided actors with thick accents although there was an occasional spray of blimey talk by one of the shakedown mobsters. When the Yard wasn't involved with the knifing mob the viewers were given a tour of London's high spots. But when the action caught fire there was no letdown until the culprits were collared and put away.

Story dealt with a Canadian mountie assigned to the Yard to study detection methods, a rugged sleuth who loves to cuff around toughies. When the protection racket gets out of hand, the Yard's rookie and star of the series, Robert Beatty, goes into action and knives flash. The British conception of gangster methods are woven into the narrative and aside from the use of knives instead of guns, the blimeys operate pretty much like our own underworld. The chase through the London streets provided an exiting finale.

Beatty, built like a bull, charged with all rage of a cornered beast into the lair of the hoods. He's a good actor, too. Yardman dick, Duncan Lamont, proved an able partner and the rest of the cast came through under the strong direction of Alvin Rakoff. Unique touch was the use of a harmonica for background mood. Helm.

HUCKLEBERRY HOUND
Producers-Directors: William Hanna, Joseph Barbera
Story Sketches: Dan Gordon
30 Mins.; Thurs.; 6:30 p.m.
KELLOGG
WPIX, N. Y. (film)
(Leo Burnett)

Moppet set should get some fun out of this half-hour animated series turned out by the talented duo William Hanna and Joseph Barbera.

Distributed by Screen Gems and bought by Kellogg for a national spot spread, it represents one of the few made-for-tv animated shorts. Judging from the opener, Huck Hound and his animal friends, should carve a niche in the viewing habits of the small fry.

Team of Hanna and Barbera did the "Tom and Jerry" theatrical cartoon series. Yap, there's a cat and mouse episode in "Huck Hound." But for the televersion, the producers have used the semi-animation method made famous by UPA. It was effective in spots, but in other sequences the abbreviated animation detracted.

Characterizations were funny for the most part and the musical score enlivened the proceedings. One sequence about the bear and the small duck was marred by a difficult to understand voice for the duck. Story line in all the sequences was amusing and the whole thing was done so that it also has some appeal for adult viewing.

Huck Hound, besides being the hero in some sequences, acted as the emcee. The Kellogg commercials were well integrated and easy to take. Horo.

RESCUE 8
('The Ferris Wheel')
With Jim Davis, Lang Jeffries, Nancy Rennick, Mary K. Cleary, Rand Brooks, Sydney Smith, Jeanne Bates, Gina Gillespie
Producer: Herbert B. Leonard
Director: Robert G. Walker
Writers: Gene L. Coon, Loren Dayle
30 Mins.; Tues., 7 p.m.
KRCA, Los Angeles (film)

That "based on the files of" description won't be a tiresome one so long as they come up with a series like "Rescue 8." This Herbert B. Leonard-produced series, syndicated by Screen Gems, is loaded with excitement and thrills a-plenty. It recounts in dramatic fashion the work of the L.A. County Fire Department's rescue squad, in yarns based on actual cases.

Opening episode shows the rescue team first save the life of a workman trapped by falling lumber during the razing of Gilmore Field. Second, and even more spectacular, is the rescue of a deranged femme and her child from atop a ferris wheel at an oceanside amusement park. The ferris wheel rescue is a genuine thriller, replete with suspense. Interwoven into these rescues is a human-interest story concerning the wife of one of the rescue squad, who wants her spouse to quit risking his life all the time. It dovetails neatly between the action scenes, and the half-hour adds up to a worthy, entertaining seg.

Series was created by Paul Frees and George Draine, and is made with the cooperation of the L.A. County Fire Dept. Gene L. Coon-Loren Dayle teleplay bristles with action, and it's well directed by Robert G. Walker. Jim Davis as the head of the rescue squad, and Lang Jeffries as his ace assistant, turn in satisfactory performances. There is good support from Nancy Rennick, Mary K. Cleary, Jeanne Bates and Gina Gillespie. Daku.

Syndication Follow-Up

Highway Patrol

Beginning its fourth season, Ziv's "Highway Patrol" series is off to a sizzling start with an action-packed story by Lee Berg, given excellent direction by Eddie Davis. Yarn hits a fast pace from the opening, and there's never a letup. This series has been a real moneymaker for Ziv, and judging from this first picture of the new season, should continue to rate high in the Ziv stable.

Broderick Crawford, one of the chief reasons for the success of this show, fits perfectly into the role of the highway patrol chief. He plays it with sincerity and realism, registering solidly all the way.

Yarn opens with a cafe holdup, with a honeymooning couple witnesses as the bandit murders the proprietor. Their lives are saved only because someone is approaching the restaurant, but before he leaves the bandit tells them he'll kill them if they talk. Highway patrol is called in but it is stymied, the clues on hand being too meager to nab the baddie. Frightened honeymooners give an anonymous tip on the phone, and the patrol picks up the heavy. With his g.f. and brother, he's arranged an alibi, however, there's a suspenseful chase as the brother goes out to erase the witnesses, but cop Crawford nails the villain and solves the case.

Manner in which this is done lifts it above the average cops-and-robbers stuff. Those involved creatively see to it there's no slackening in the action, and that what happens is believable. Crawford receives home fine support from Les Hellman and Ray Hastings (the heavies), Mary-Robin Redd and Lou Colvin (the witnesses), William Boyet and Oween Cameron. Daku.

DISK CLUBS: HEAVY TO HERO

Telecast Shaping For Disk Industry's First 'Oscars'; Dickering A Sponsor

The awarding of the first recording industry "Oscars" may get a network telecasting. The National Academy of Recording Arts & Sciences is now negotiating for a sponsor to put the prize-giving ceremonies on tv in March or April of next year.

It's not yet been decided, however, how the winners will be selected. Blueprint, thus far, calls for prizes to performing artists, musicians, engineers, artists, and various other categories associated with the production of a record. Thinking in some corners is that the voting should come from the NARAS membership which now is close to 1,000, but the plan hasn't been ironed out as yet.

The org now has a working chapter in Hollywood and in New York. Paul Weston heads the Coast branch while Guy Lombardo runs the N.Y. division. Plans to set up another chapter in Nashville is now in the works.

NARAS was launched last year by James B. Conkling before he took over the prexyship of the new Warner Bros. label.

Singles for Jukes, RCA Stereo Hypo

With the jukebox manufacturers now climbing on the stereophonic bandwagon, RCA Victor has come up with a sales promotion angle designed to facilitate getting locations for the stereo machines. Victor is selling the juke manufacturers a set of 25 stereo EP packages, and a dozen 45 stereo singles, including some current releases. The manufacturers, in turn, are using the disk package as a sales lure for the machines.

At the present time, the stereo jukeboxes are limited by a lack of stereo singles. Victor is the only company to date to issue any stereo singles, but if the jukes create a demand in this direction, the rest of the industry will also be in this market soon. Victor is now taping all of its singles on stereo, but is only making special sides available in this form.

Stereo's inroads on the single field, in general, is expected to be much slower than in the packaged market. For one thing, the kids who buy the singles are not so interested in the sound technique of a platter as much as they are in the emotional "sound" of a vocalist or a band. That explains why so many badly recorded sides, from a purely technical point of view, have managed to become hits in recent years.

Lyric Opera Opens With An Easier-to-Sing Version Of 'Star Spangled Banner'

Chicago, Oct. 14.

Lyric Opera launched its seven-week season (10) with "Falstaff" and a musically doctored version of the "Star Spangled Banner."

At the point in the anthem where two F's come at the end of the phrase " . . . and the rockets red glare . . . " firstnighters took it a full tone lower.

Chicago baritone and realtor Louis Sudler, sponsor of the more singable arrangement, hopes to make it official per legislation (H. R. 10542) now before Congress. New version was cleffed by M/Sgt. Floyd E. Werle of the Air Force band. Its "adoption" by the Lyric Opera prompted Daily News music critic Don Henahan to venture:

"Lyric officials may have good reasons for wanting an easier version sung . . . A lot of screeching on opening night is no way to launch an opera season."

Which Hildegarde?

London, Oct. 14.

Hildegarde Neff, here to film "Subway in the Sky," recorded the theme song of her pic, "The Girl From Hamburg," in Paris. Its click is such that she has now recorded an LP with Phillips-Fontana. They are songs with a jazz beat written by Georges Villon.

But there is doubt whether the platter can be issued under the suggested title. It is "Hildegarde Sings. . . ."

Manuti Figured Cinch to Grab 3d Term at 802

Al Manuti, prexy of Local 802, N.Y. wing of the American Federation of Musicians, is due to walk in for his third two-year term in the balloting that takes place early in December. At the present time, there is no organized opposition to Manuti, although it's likely that there will be contests for lesser posts in the local's administration.

Although the Musicians Guild of America, the recently formed Coast union in opposition to the AFM, is known to have numerous supporters in N.Y., this group has no plans to challenge Manuti's leadership at this time. By successfully negotiating pacts on a local level, Manuti has emerged as a unique figure in the history of Local 802 insofar as he has virtually put an end to all organized factionalism within the union.

The Orchestra Leaders of N.Y., representing some of the top contractors and bookers in Local 802, passed a resolution last week asking for all candidates to reply to questions on their platforms. The Orchestra Leaders have been active in Local 802, as a non-partisan group, in combatting the AFM's regulation that makes bandleaders employees for purposes of taxes. The Federal and state governments, on the other hand, regard them as employers and that has been a consistent source of friction over the years.

MORT SAHL SUING FANTASY ON ALBUM

Chicago, Oct. 14.

Comedian Mort Sahl is suing Fantasy Records over alleged "unauthorized" release of its new "Mort Sahl at Sunset" album, taped in 1955 at Carmel, Calif., during a Dave Brubeck gig. Performer is asking for an injunction to halt sales of the disk, and punitive damages.

Sahl, who records for Norman Granz's Verve label, claims in the suit, filed in L.A. by attorney Richard Mark, that he never gave Fantasy permission for the album. Almost as an afterthought, claims Sahl, the diskery offered him a contract last June, which he pronto declined. He was pacted by Granz last January. Initial release under the deal was "Mort Sahl Iconoclast." His second Verve album will be edited from tapes which were made most of last week during performances at Mister Kelly's here.

Ideal Adds Lines

The Design, Cricket and Stereo Spectrum lines have been taken over by Ideal Record Products for exclusive distribution in the New Jersey area.

Ideal of N. J. is a subsid of Al Levine's Ideal operation in N. Y. The Newark branch is under the direction of Jack Kosloff, formerly Decca's N. J. sales representative.

UP FROM A 'BUM' TO BOON STATUS

The disk club operation, now firmly established as an important merchandising channel, has turned out to be an across-the-board boon to the music business.

Fears by retailers that the disk clubs would cut into their sales have now been completely allayed. In fact, the contrary has proved to be true since it's been noted that retailer sales have been stimulated by the club promotion of specific disks. RCA Victor's seven-LP package of the nine Beethoven symphonies, conducted by Arturo Toscanini, enjoyed a new wave of retail sales after the Book-of-the-Month Club began using the set as a giveaway in promoting its club, the RCA Victor Society of Great Music. Parallel experiences on the retail level have been noted with other disks that have received heavy advertising as club choices.

In the pop field, the selection of an album as a choice by any of the major clubs now means an added sale of at least 50,000 copies. For the publishers, that means considerably more royalties on the tunes included in the LPs.

According to an agreement between the disk clubs and the Harry Fox office, which collects on mechanicals for the publishers, the royalties on tunes used in club LP choices are figured on a reduced price rate. Since the clubs usually give one free disk away with every two LPs bought, the publishers figure the royalties on a two-thirds price ratio in which 12 tunes would earn 16c per album rather than the statutory 2c per tune.

Columbia Records, which pioneered the entry of the major labels into the club market, originally predicted that this operation would open up new horizons for the artists as well. Before the advent of the clubs, LP sales running over 100,000 were virtually unknown, particularly in the long-hair field. Nowadays, the monthly selections hit that regularly with the artist's royalty take so much the more enhanced.

'Mardi Gras' Picking Up Plenty Covers Despite Pat Boone's Dot Disk

Pic tunes are now getting wide coverage from the disk makers even where there is a top platter name associated with the film production. The title of the 20th Century-Fox film, "Mardi Gras," has now lined up a half-dozen versions despite the fact that Pat Boone, who is the pic's star, is doing the "Mardi Gras March" on the Dot label.

Other versions of the tune have been sliced by Louis Armstrong for Decca, Art Mooney for MGM, Sid Ramon for RCA Victor and Sy Oliver on Jubilee. The picture company is spotlighting all the versions of the tune in its disk jockey promotion. Pic, which also stars Tommy Sands and Gary Crosby, is being sold to the deejays as 20th-Fox's "answer to juvenile delinquency" with "the right teenage idols."

See ASCAPers' Suit Vs. BMI & Webs In Long Delay Cued by Legalistics

Continued legal sparring in the suit of the 33 ASCAP songsmiths against Broadcast Music Inc. and the major networks portends a further long delay before this case ever comes to bat.

On a call to put the case on the calendar in N.Y. Federal Court last week, the suit was not certified as ready by former Judge Harold M. Kennedy, the special master who is presiding over the pre-trial examinations. The plaintiffs' attorney, John Schulman, requested Judge John Cashin to put the case on the calendar if and when Federal Judge Edward Weinfeld rules against the defendants' motion to dismiss the case. Judge Cashin said that Schulman could make another application to put the case on the calendar after the Weinfeld decision. When the suit is certified to be ready, it will, of course, go on the bottom of the calendar.

The BMI motion to dismiss the ASCAPers' suit is also far from decision. Rebuttal briefs by both sides, following the hearings before Judge Weinfeld over three weeks ago, are due to be filed this week. Then, it's not expected that Weinfeld will hand down a decision on this matter before the end of the year.

Pre-trial examination of witnesses, meantime, has been suspended temporarily. The defendants have asked Kennedy to rule on the question whether or not the examinations should wait until Judge Weinfeld's decision is due to take place Oct. 30.

Gene Austin & HST

Vet songster Gene Austin, on a swing through the mid-west, got a meeting with former President Harry S. Truman and also earned a police badge.

The Truman-Austin meet was negotiated in Dayton by Speaker of the House Sam Rayburn who told Austin that there was a "friend" upstairs in the Deshler Hilton Hotel who might give him a piano lesson.

The police badge came from Flint, Mich., where Austin was, made a police lieutenant by chief of police George Paul.

E. B. Marks Wins Howard Songs In High Court Ruling

Edward B. Marks Music won a final decision in its long-pending suit against Charles K. Harris Music over ownership of the copyrights to 154 songs by Joseph E. Howard when the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeals.

The high court's action gives Marks undisputable rights to the Howard songs, which include such numbers as "I Wonder Who's Kissing Her Now," "What's The Use of Dreaming," "The Time, The Place and The Girl," among other standards. Marks, through attorney Julian T. Abeles, will now renew his application for minimum statutory damages of $250 on each of the 154 tunes, claiming that Harris has infringed on its copyrights.

Case revolved around a dispute over who held the renewal assignments of the Howard tunes. Harris had the original assignment from Howard, who conveyed the renewal assignment to Marks in 1933. Harris' contention that the original contract also included the renewal assignment was rejected in the lower courts since the renewals were not specifically mentioned.

The N.Y. District Court originally held that Marks owned the copyrights, but did not allow the plaintiff to collect any damages. Both parties brought the case to the higher court, Harris appealing on the grounds that it was denied ownership of the copyrights and Marks appealing on the grounds that it was denied damages. The Court of Appeals held for Marks on both counts last spring and the U.S. Supreme Court's denial of a hearing finalized that decision.

EMI Net Profit At Record $15,182,000

London, Oct. 14.

Group trading profit for Electrical & Musical Industries has risen from $13,250,000 to a record $15,182,000 for the year ended last June 30. The dividend remains unchanged at 15%, but it is to be followed by a one for three scrip issue, and in making this announcement the board forecasts a divvy of not less than 20% for the year to June 30, 1959.

Explaining its dividend policy, the board points out that conservative distribution has been necessary in recent years when the group had been engaged in a program of large-scale reorganization and expansion. This had involved heavy outlay.

Levitz Wins Court Nod To Re-Plead His Action Vs. 'Firing' By Big Three

Steve Levitz, former Big Three Music stockholder and production exec who later sued the publishing company for an alleged breach of his employment contract, has won the right to re-plead his case in N. Y. Supreme Court. Levitz's case was originally dismissed in that court last year, but the Appellate Division last week granted him the right to file an amended complaint.

Levitz's case involves the question of whether a man who "resigns" under pressure can be considered as "fired." Levitz contends that in 1951 he sold his stock interest to Loew's Inc., parent company of the Big Three, with the understanding that he would be retained for as long as he could work. Levitz states that in 1955, Loew's confronted him with the choice of resigning or being fired. Levitz resigned. He subsequently brought suit charging that his resignation was tantamount to a dismissal and hence was in violation of his verbal employment contract. Theodore Charnas is legal rep for Levitz.

Al Jolson Music Scholarships

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Sammy Cahn will head a Hollywood committee to observe the eighth anniversary of Al Jolson's death (Oct. 23) by establishing a permanent annual music scholarship award in the name of the singer.

Cahn's plans call for the various music schools throughout the country to submit one male and female student each year as a possible candidate for the scholarship. Local auditions would be held in each of the states, with the two winners from each of the participating schools competing in the finals of the Hollywood Bowl on Oct. 23.

The Jolson Memorial will be financed within the entertainment industry. Working with Cahn in the project are Frank Sinatra, Dean Martin, Peggy Lee, Judy Garland, Red Buttons, Howard Keel, Sammy Davis Jr. and composers Jimmy Van Heusen, Jimmy McHugh and Sammy Fain.

Jocks, Jukes and Disks

By HERM SCHOENFELD

Polly Bergen (Columbia): "AU REVOIR AGAIN" (Bloom*), an excellent ballad with a light beat, gets a nifty vocal by Polly Bergen who will nab plenty of jock spins. "COME PRIMA" (AMC*) is an okay Italian number, although this groove is now overloaded, temporarily at least.

Gary Crosby (Verve): "CHEATIN' ON ME" (Advanced*), an oldie, gets a strong slice by the young Crosby who really swings the lyric across. "JUDY, JUDY" (Plectrum†) is a bright rocking number also savvily delivered.

Sam Hawkins (Gone): "KING OF FOOLS" (Sidney†) is a solid, if typical, rocking ballad which this singer delivers with some falsetto effects which could grab some attention. "WHATCHAMACALLIT" (Sidney†) is a catching jump entry.

Bill Hayes (Kapp): "LOVE I MEAN" (Andrew*) is a pleasing ballad delivered in okay style. "THE NINE LIVES OF ELFEGO BACA" (Wonderland*), from a Walt Disney tv production, is a wordy saga which might have some moppet appeal.

Enoch Light Orch (Grand Award): "I WANT TO BE HAPPY CHA CHA" (Harms*) follows in the groove of the "Tea For Two Cha Cha" which is currently clicking. It's colorfully arranged for solid programming values. "CARA MIA CHA CHA" (Record Songs*) is still another familiar tune set to the same tempo.

Fran Warren (MGM): "SUNDAY KIND OF LOVE" (Leeds*), a class ballad, is given a fine rendition by Fran Warren who could come back into the disk sweepstakes with this one. "DON'T LET IT BREAK YOUR HEART" (Safa*) is an okay, but more commonplace, ballad.

Jackie Gleason Orch: "JUST ONE YESTERDAY" (Songsmiths*) is a melodic showcase for the lushly stringed instrumentals that Jackie Gleason has mopped up with in the package field. Fine change - of - pace programming. "WHERE IS SHE NOW" (Songsmiths*) is another lilting tune that's easy to listen to.

The Four Aces (Decca): "THE WORLD OUTSIDE" (Chappell*), the theme from Chopin's "Warsaw Concerto," has been fashioned into a rich ballad material for this foursome which sounds exactly like before even though its former lead voice, Al Alberts, has left to do a single. "HOW CAN YOU FORGET" (Harms*), an oldie is harmonized pleasantly.

Joe Leahy Orch-Chorus (Felsted): "DOES SHE OR DOESN'T SHE" (Caesar*) is a bright entry in the cha cha idiom with a smart lyric handled by the chorus. "BY LOVE POSSESSED" (Cromwell*), a big ballad which has been around now for some months, is given a highly attractive instrumental slice which could start some action.

Richard Hayman - Jan August (Mercury): "CANDY CHA CHA," still another cha cha item, has a catching tune done by pianist Jan August and harmonicist Richard Hayman. "SONG OF LOLA" is a Continental-type ballad wth lesser chances.

Kay Brown (Metro): "I LIKE TO ROCK 'N' ROLL SLOWLY" (Choice*), a good idea in the rocking idiom, gets an okay vocal for good returns. "IF I HAD YOU" (Robbins*), the standard, is rocked effectively by this songstress.

Morgan Twins (RCA Victor): "WHILE IT LASTED" (Acuff-Rose†), a rocking ballad with a fresh slant, is smoothly harmonized by this countrified duo for promising potential. "LET'S GET GOING" (Acuff-Rose†) is a routine upbeat slice.

Marty Wilde (Epic): "MY LUCKY LOVE" (Bentley†) is a charming folk-styled ballad which this singer belts in colorful style. "MISERY'S CHILD" (Mapleleaf†) is less impressive material.

Julius LaRosa (Roulette): "LET NATURE TAKE ITS COURSE" (Kahl†), a clever number with a neat beat, shapes up as excellent material for Julius LaRosa who could rediscover the hit habit with this one. "UNTIL HE GETS A GIRL" (Favorite-Valyr*) is a fine slow-tempoed ballad with less direct commercial impact.

Johnny Jordan (Jolt): "DON'T CRY LITTLE BABY" (Mannyjay-Clayton†) is a cute rhythm entry punched across in first-rate rockabilly style by this newcomer. Could be one of those leftfield hits. "SWEET, SWEET SWEET" (Clayton-Paty†) is another interesting rocker.

Walter Scott (Eagle): "ON THE WAY OUT" (Sounds*), a solid ballad with an above-par lyric, is crooned sharply by this singer who's evidently been influenced by Frank Sinatra. "MY INNER FEELINGS" (Sounds*) is a slow ballad with doubtful chances.

Salvatore Baccaloni (Grand Award): "MIRIT IN CITTA'" (Curci*), an Italo song with a beat, bows this operatic basso in the pop field and the results are offbeat, but not too commercial. "STAIRWAY TO THE SEA" (Leeds*), another Italo import, also isn't likely to make much noise via this rendition.

Earl Bostic Orch (King): "GOODNIGHT SWEETHEART" (Robbins*), the oldie, turns up in a hard-driving rocking version which will give it a new round of spins. "INDIAN BOOGIE WOOGIE" (Leeds*), is also rocked and rolled in a way that the kids will dance to.

Brian Davies (Dot): "LUCY, LUCY" (Greta†) is built along quiet, folk-styled lines that's difficult to get started in the spinning market. "WHEN WE FIRST MET" (Vernon*) produces a nice ballad feel but there's not enough in it to get it moving.

Cathy Basic (Hide-A-way): "I'VE NEVER BEEN IN LOVE BEFORE" Basic's warbling. "SODA POP into a pleasant slice via Cathy Basic warbling. "SODA POP KISSES" (Criterion*) is a bit too precious in performance and material but the pre-teen set may go for it.

Best Bets

BOBBY HELMS ..... THE FOOL AND THE ANGEL
(Decca) ..... A Hundred Hearts

Bobby Helms' "The Fool and The Angel" (Blue Grass) is a solidly commercial rocking ballad delivered in a way that the teenagers will go for. "A Hundred Hearts" (Tree†) is a fair country-styled item.

THE CREW-CUTS ..... BABY BE MINE
(RCA Victor) ..... That's My Desire

The Crew-Cuts' "Baby Be Mine" (Morris) is a swinging Latin-styled ballad with a nifty lyric which this foursome belts in colorful style. "That's My Desire" (Mills*), the oldie, gets a good straight slice.*

GENEVIEVE ..... I'M NEVER GONNA KISS YOU
(Cadence) ..... Cherie, Cherie

Genevieve's "I'm Never Gonna Kiss You" (Admore) is a catching novelty with a one-line catchline which this French songstress keeps repeating through the song. The laugh impact could put it over. "Cherie, Cherie" (Weiss & Barry†) is a fine, straight ballad also due for spins via this charmingly French-accented version.*

PAM GARNER ..... PINCH ME BABY
(Coral) ..... Me and My Shadow

Pam Garner's "Pinch Me Baby" (Regent†) is a bluesy rocker with a good lyric idea that could go all the way via this slick vocal. "Me and My Shadow" (Bourne), the standard, gets an interesting double-tracked workover.*

ROBIN LUKE ..... MY GIRL
(Dot) ..... Chicka Chicka Honey

Robin Luke's "My Girl" (Congressional) is another typical simple-minded juve-angled rocking ballad which could repeat this young singer's click on "Susie Darlin'." "Chicka Chicka Honey" (Congressional*) is a cute rhythm tune also with chances.*

Album Reviews

"Damn Yankees" (RCA Victor). This soundtrack from Warner Bros.' "Damn Yankees" pic is a sure-shot package. The original legit score by Richard Adler and the late Jerry Ross still impresses with its freshness and cleverness. With the exception of Tab Hunter, the film's cast duplicates the Broadway roster. This LP features bright solo performances by Gwen Verdon on "A Little Brains, A Little Talent," "Whatever Lola Wants" and "Who's Got The Pain" plus a nifty duet with Hunter on "Two Lost Souls." Ray Walston has one solo spot on "Those Were The Good Old Days" while Shannon Bolin and Robert Shafer register well on their song assignment, including one ballad, "There's Something About An Empty Chair," that was not in the legit score. Orchestrations by the Italian studio orch which cut this set under Ray Heindorf's baton are excellent.

"Little Women" (Kapp). The CBS-TV musical remake of Louisa May Alcott's novel, "Little Women," has been fashioned into an attractive set spotlighting the vocal talents of Jeanne Carson, Rise Stevens, Bill Hayes and Florence Henderson. The score by Richard Adler contains one strong pop ballad, "Love I Mean," and some bright material tunes like "How Do You Write A Book" and "Dance, Why Not." Basically, the appeal of this set will hinge on the tv show's impact. Adler's score comprises one side of the LP with the other being a collection of familiar pieces played by a stringed orch.

Fred Waring & The Pennsylvanians: "Broadway Cavalcade" (Capitol). Wrapping up the Broadway musical scene from George M. Cohan's pre-World War I production of "45 Minutes To Broadway" to the 1958 "Say Darling" show, this double LP comprises a topflight showtune repertory performed in expert style by Fred Waring's organization. No chronological order has been observed, but the program is neatly paced and varied. Included in this folio are evergreens like "Say It With Music," "Lover Come Back To Me," "The September Song," "The Birth of The Blues," "Hernando's Hideaway" and "76 Trombones."

Gus Bivona Band: "Blast Off" (Warner Bros.). A throwback to the big band era is offered by this new band which plays like any number of swing combos from the 1930s. It's still a great instrumental sound, especially when dished up by a full-sized crew who play with zest and precision. Bivona, on clarinet, fronts the orch on a set of instrumentals including "C Jam Blues," "Sorghum Switch," "The Sidewalk Shufflers," "Fugue For Tinhorns" and "Please." Perhaps the title of this set is a little too strong and modern for this brand of dance music.

"The Great T. D." (Colpix). Among the last sides made before Tommy Dorsey's death a couple of years ago, this set spotlights the maestro at his most commercial. The band's sound is full and swinging as it works through a book made up of numbers like "Granada," "Who," "Silk Stockings," "Marie" and "You're My Everything." Capable vocals by Bill Raymond, Gordon Polk and Lynn Roberts are spotted among the instrumentals.

"Barbershop Quartet Winners" (Decca). Winners of the annual contest run by the Society for the Preservation and Encouragement Barber Shop Quartet Singing in America once again have wound up immortalized in a Decca LP. This is a formalized harmonizing style that remains impervious to time or rock 'n' roll. In this set, runner-up groups are also featured on a repertory that's summed up in songs like "That Old Gang of Mine" and "If You Were The Only Girl In the World." In a companion set, Barbershop Chorus Winners, featuring larger singing groups, get a chance to work out on tunes like "Are You From Dixie," "Hard Hearted Hannah" and "Toot Toot Tootsie Goodbye."

"A Farewell To Steam" (HiFi-Record). This is aimed strictly at the hi-fi fans who go for pure sound. Like previous railroad train disks, this brings all sorts of chuggings, toots, brake squeals, steam blasts and similar sounds into the livingroom. This set, which records the last run of a steam engine on the Los Angeles line of the Atchison, Topeka & Sante Fe, would be, of course, natural for stereo.

"Jazz West Coast—No. 4" (World Pacific). The latest volume in this label's anthology of Coast jazz showcases some of the top names in the modern idiom. This is jazz LP programming at its best with numbers played by the Gerry Mulligan Quartet, the Bob Brookmeyer Quintet, the Chico Hamilton Trio, the Chet Baker Quintet, the Art Pepper Nine and other combos. It swings all the way.

Hal McShay Band: "The Roaring '20's—Vol. 2" (Tops). The reservoir of song material from the fertile 1920s continues to be tapped with nostalgic impact. Hal McShay's band, which accurately captures the flavor of that period with the jazzy Charleston beat, work through a book including "Yes, We Have No Bananas," "Mississippi Mud," "Sweet Sue, Just You," "Varsity Drag," "Look For The Silver Lining" and "Who's Sorry Now."

Manny Albam Orch & Chorus: "Sophisticated Lady" (Coral). A collection of Duke Ellington hit songs turn up in a somewhat pretentious setting here. The instrumentals are generally of a solid jazz quality, but the choral arrangements are mostly sticky and overdone. Herm.

'Murder Ballads'

"American Murder Ballads and Their Stories" by Olive Woolley Burt (Oxford; $5.50) is an exciting, irreverent and sometimes ribald recap of U. S. murder songs of many vintages and sources. Author, surprisingly enough, is a former Utah school ma'arm and one-time writer of children's books. With a selection of many impertinent troubled clefs, Mrs. Burt thoroughly explores a little-known strata of Americana in a gusty, full-bodied tome that will become the keystone work in its field.

Directors, composers, arrangers and producers will be thumbing this volume for years to come. Rodo.

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Hecht-Hill-Lancaster is the first independent film company to sign a collective bargaining agreement with the Musicians Guild of America similar to the Sept. 3 pact with the majors.

The American Federation of Musicians, upon hearing of the pact between HHL and MGA, filed unfair labor charges against the indie film outfit and the Guild with the NLRB charging "illegal execution of a labor contract." AFM also accuses the Guild of exercising bargaining rights it does not yet have.

Jack Marshal, under the MGA agreement, is scoring HHL's "The Rabbit Trap," the first film under the pact.

Johnnie Ray B.O. Slow On the Take in Buenos

Buenos Aires, Oct. 7.

Although Johnnie Ray received a heated teenage welcome when he arrived at the airport here last week (1), ticket sales for his 11 personal appearances at the Broadway (Central Cinematografica Circuit) film house have been slow. The singer had been booked by the COSUDEI agency for the theatre appearances plus two tv shows at a reported $20,000 (about 1,200,000 pesos at today's exchange rate of over 60 pesos to the dollar).

The light ticket sales were expected to spurt over the weekend. A controversy in the university and repeated student riots are blamed for holding down the b.o. take. The teenagers came to the airport, however, and during the tumultuous reception filched his sun-glasses, tore his clothes and almost wrenched away his hearing aid.

Tommy Dorsey orch headed by Warren Covington has been booked for a one-nighter at Club Sevenoaks, San Antonio, Nov. 2.

Oct. 20 Target Date for Revamp Of MGM and Roulette Sales Setups

MGM Records and Roulette will get a facelifting job in their sales structure Oct. 20. That's the date set for Charles C. Hasin's takeover as sales manager at MGM and Irv Jerome's spin into Roulette in the newly created position of veepee in charge of sales.

For the past several months Jerome had been in charge of album sales at MGM. With his shift to Roulette, Hasin, in his new capacity as sales manager, will be in charge of album and singles sales, working on the latter in coordination with Morty Craft, diskery's artists & repertoire topper.

Hasin helped launch the MGM label with its former prexy Frank B. Walker. He joined the company in 1945, two years before MGM's first disk was released. Before that he had been sales manager at RCA Victor for 11 years.

Jerome came to MGM from Capitol soon after Arnold Maxin took over the MGM prexyship at the beginning of this year. In his Roulette spot, Jerome will handle the overall sale of singles and concentrate on mapping out and directing the sale and merchandising of the diskery's album programs as well as build Roulette's distributor relations.

One of Jerome's first moves when he gets to Roulette will be to study and review the distribution network in regard to their methods of selling and merchandising. "I do not plan to make any distributor changes," he said. "However, I feel that every distributor should be prepared to accept and carry out any new recommendations that will be made."

Meantime, Hasin and Jerome (in conjunction with MGM's publicity topper Sol Handwerger) will work hand-in-hand to push MGM's "Fall Album Festival." Trio is out on a cross-country trek of regional distributor meets for an audio-visual presentation of the new LP product. The distrib meets were kicked off last Thursday (9) at New York's Park Sheraton Hotel.

Among the musicians who will aid in the scoring, in addition to playing roles in the film, are Louis Armstrong, Red Nichols, Shelly Manne, Benny Carter, Bobby Troup and Ray Anthony.

Ewen's Anthology On Legit Musicals

By ABEL GREEN

Somebody once said—this reviewer was the one—that songwriters have the most interesting obituaries. Not only do the melodies linger on after their songs are ended but so do the memories. The audience-identification is automatic.

David Ewen points up all of it in his "Complete Book of the American Musical Theater" (Henry Holt; [illegible] librettists from George Abbott to Pelham Grenville Wodehouse; composers from Richard Adler to Vincent Youmans; musicals from "The Black Crook" (1866) to "Oh Captain!" (1958).

Ewen's errors, while minor individually, total to a disturbing score. These run the gamut from name misspellings to wrong show origins for certain titles. This sort of work invariably fetches mail and it is presumed that subsequent edi-

The Duke Comes Back to Brit.

London, Oct. 14.

A quarter of a century is a long time to stay away, but as the old saying goes, "absence makes the heart grow fonder," and judging by the receptions the Duke Ellington orch is receiving, it certainly applies to this outfit.

The Ellington band is currently halfway through its three-week concert tour of Britain as part of an exchange deal with the Ted Heath orch which was set, as usual, by Harold Davison. It's one of those swaps where the American band has to live up to past glory and recent recordings. As a band it certainly does so. It's a well-drilled precision unit that swings as only few bands can, has personality, is relaxed and yet has more than enough drive. But the program that Ellington is providing stays too much in the past and his revolutionary ideas about modern music seep through far too rarely.

When the band opened its tour of Britain with a two-hour concert at the Royal Festival Hall on Sunday, Oct. 5, it was before an audience which included most of the top names of British music. The band mounted the platform minus Duke and went into "Take The A Train." The last chorus was drowned out by the reception for Ellington who ambled onto the stage to roof-raise cheers. With his 60th birthday not far off, Ellington looked and acted like a man 20 years younger. His patter was slick and he had the crowd with him.

As the program went on the Ellington section men came down to the mike to show their stuff on a selection of oldies like "Creole Love Call," "Tenderly," "All Of Me," "Don't Get Around Much Any More," "Mood Indigo," "Solitude" and "Caravan." Johnny Hodges stepped up to play a sweeping, soaring version of "The Duke's Blues," while in complete contrast trumpeter William "Cat" Anderson, with the rest of the tumper section, blasted out "El Gato," with Anderson blowing high notes that weren't intended for the instrument.

A breakaway from the swing routine was provided by songster Ozzie Bailey, with Ray Nance on violin, who came up with a schmaltzy version of "Autumn Leaves." The singer also made favorable impressions on a couple of other numbers including "What Else Can You Do With A Drum?" and "Do Nothing Till You Hear From Me." Neance provided light relief when he sang "Squeeze Me."

The concert wound with a smash band version of "Diminuendo in Blue," and "Crescendo in Blue," which had the hall rocking. But throughout the band's stint at this acoustically perfect venue, where even valve noise comes through clearly, there seemed to be a gap in the blending of the powerful brass sections and the reeds. Perhaps it was intentional, but it played havoc with the balance.

Seeco Buys Masters

Jerry Shiffrin, who took over as artists & repertoire head and sales manager of Seeco Records last week, started rolling with disk-master buys and a distributor addition.

In a move to bring Seeco into the pop field, Shiffrin picked up the Orbits' "Felicia" and "Bandstand Dancing" and Joe Salvatore's "Tina" and "Fools Rush In."

On the distribution end, Shiffrin added the Southern Record Distributing Co. for the Nashville area. Outlet is headed by Murray Nash and John Richberg.

Gala Bows as Britain's 1st Cut-Rate Indie Label; Deal On for Cinema Ties

London, Oct. 14.

The first independent British cut-price pop label, Gala is now in business. Last Friday (3) the platters made their appearance in drugstores, supermarkets, bookstalls, tobacco stores and candy kiosks, and during the course of the next few days, they'll be available in certain picture theatres. Already, one deal is being set with a Midland theatre circuit and news of other tieups is expected soon.

The label, operated by Musical and Plastics Industries Ltd., an offshoot of the Henry Selmar organization, is retailing at 90c for each EP—about half the normal price. At the moment, all the sides on release are of American origin, but Gala plans to sign up and record British artists. It has its own large pressing plant equipped with Yank injection moulding equipment.

In charge of the picture theatre operation is Dan Fish, who has paged a large number of circuits. Idea is that for around $250 each theatre would be equipped with playback gear, a display rack and a stock of disks. Then, taking advantage of the captive audience, the disks would be played during intermissions and slides would inform that the records were available in the foyer.

To launch the label, the company tossed a party for the press, deejays and entertainment biz at the Savoy Hotel.

Glenn Gray has signed a new longtermer with Capitol Records. New pact goes into effect Jan. 1 when his present deal expires. Gray first signed with Cap in 1955.

Dave Cavanaugh will continue as producer of Gray's Capitol albums, latest of which is "Sounds of Great Bands."

Barrys to Roulette

The Barry Sisters (Myrna & Claire) have joined the Roulette roster. The team previously recorded under the Cadence banner. Their first single for Roulette, "I Hear Bells" and "I Get Up Ev'ry Morning," is slated for release this week. Label also has set the duo for an album of Yiddish songs to be issued after the first of the year.

Meantime, Roulette acquired the English disk "Girl of My Dreams" by Tony Brent for release in the U.S. The Brent platter is distributed in England through EMI.

Grand Award's Baccaloni

Salvatore Baccaloni, basso buffo who has appeared at the Metop, will be given a push into the pop field under his new pact with the Grand Award label.

Enoch Light, GA's artists & repertoire chief, is prepping the basso for pop singles and album releases. The LP will contain modern Italian pop songs. In addition to the Met, Baccaloni also appeared in films, including "Full of Life," "Merry Andrew" and "Rock-A-Bye Baby."

Davis to Everest

The Everest label, a branch of the Belock Recording Co., has tapped Hawaiian tenor Charles K. L. Davis. Label has blueprinted five stereo albums for the new singer.

First package will be "Ray Kinney Presents Charles K. L. Davis Singing at the Royal Hawaiian Hotel," to be released in November. A second will consist of operatic areas, and the others in the pop music field.

Davis won the Metop "Auditions of the Air" $1,000 prize in March of this year.

Reno's Journal Tie

Ray Reno has been set to an exclusive disk deal with the indie Journal label by diskery's prexy Tony Dee. Reno had recorded for the label previously but on a non-exclusive basis.

Dee also brought in Milton Kaye, a CBS staff musician, and Lanny Ross' pianist, as diskery's musical director on a non-exclusive basis. Elaine Bergman will handle promotion for the label.

ABBOT LUTZ TO PICKWICK

Abbot Lutz has shifted from Seeco Records to the Pickwick Sales Corp. where he'll take over as product director and exec assistant to prexy Sy Leslie. The Design, Cricket and Stereo Spectrum labels are Pickwick subsids.

REPORT BRITISH ATV BUYOUT OF PYE-NIXA

London, Oct. 14.

According to reliable Stock Exchange circles, Association Tele-Vision has bought the Pye-Nixa diskery. Neither firm has confirmed the deal but the figure involved is believed to be around $700,000.

The programming company has been linked with disk tieup rumors for the past year. ATV (in which the Pye organization has a stake) is believed to have been negotiating for the label for some time. Recently, the American Mercury label, which had British distribution through Pye, pulled out and made a similar arrangement with EMI.

WB Adds Staffers

In a continuing staff buildup of the recently launched Warner Bros. Records operation, Cy Segal has been named branch sales manager of New York. Jerry Simon has joined the company as N.Y. district promotion manager while Bill Hall takes over similar chores on the Coast.

They'll work under Hal Cook, v.p. over sales for the WB label.

Inside Stuff—Music

Colin Lesslie, currently producing "Danger Within" for British Lion release, has succeeded after 14 years in tracing a song which will now be used as the theme tune for his production. The picture is based partly on Lesslie's own experiences as a prisoner of war. He heard the song sung by a French Legionnaire in a transit camp outside Naples and got him to jot down the notes and lyric. The song was called "Ne Partez pas Deja." But Lesslie lost the manuscript.

From 1944 onward he tried to trace the original music. He wanted the song for his picture so he wrote down as much of the lyric as he could remember and got a cleffer to put the song on paper as he whistled it. Southern Music Co. pitched in with its aid and it was finally tracked down to Hamburg where a copy was found. Henry Himmel, composer of the piece, was traced to America, contacted and gave copyright clearance.

Despite Canadian concert contralto Maureen Forrester's three-year exclusive contract with RCA Victor, she has just recorded a side for another company. Miss Forrester had previously cut one side, Brahms' Alto Rhapsody, for Deutschegramophongesellschaft in Berlin, with U.S. release on Decca's Golden Label. Since they were hung up with a blank flip, RCA Victor, as a courtesy, let her fill it with the "Ruckert" songs of Gustav Mahler. She disked it in Berlin recently, during her current tour of Scotland, England, Eire, Sweden, Norway, Holland, Germany, France & Belgium, which teed Sept. 7 at Edinburgh Festival.

Some reshuffling of duties in the Chicago ad-promo office of Mercury Records finds department topper Ken Myers resuming supervision of field promotion. Chore had fallen to publicity director Tom Schlesinger the past year while Myers spent the bulk of his effort on Merc's consumer ad campaign. At the same time, Michael Kerr, an aide to Myers, has been upped to newly created post of manager of radio and tv station relations—meaning liaision with deejays. Responsibility had also fallen to Schlesinger, who'll hence concentrate fulltime on press relations.

MGM Records is going in for an audio-visual parlay for its Maurice Chevalier package "Yesterday and Today." Disk company has set tie-ins on the Paige Palmer Show, WEWS-TV, Cleveland; the Ruth Lyons Show over WLW-TV, which is seen in Cincinnati, Columbus, Dayton and Indianapolis, and the Quiz Club over WBAL-TV, Baltimore.

Plans are already in the works for the sixth annual Newport Jazz Festival scheduled for the July 4 weekend next year at Newport, R.I. A meeting of the festival's board of directors is being set for some time in December and it's expected that the program will be lined up then.

British A&R Novel

London, Oct. 14.

Robert Hancock, a pen-name disguising the identity of a lively London newspaperman, has taken a shrewd crack at Tin Pan Alley in "The A. & R. Man" (Hutchinson, $1.35). It's a short novel which highlights the problems of a music publisher's artists & repertoire representative when he catches a young vocalist named Mabel Love in a dancehall in the sticks and sets out to build her up to the big-time.

The book is little more than a padded-out anecdote, but it reveals a keen insight into the chicanery and gimmick-ridden atmosphere that pervades to some extent in the modern world of pop music and tv. Hancock writes wittily, though in a superficial manner, and even more amusing than his main theme is the deft way in which he guys his own business, newspapers.

"The A. & R. Man" will pass away an idle hour or so very agreeably. It is hoped that the author will set his sights rather higher in his next book. His target is too much of a sitting pigeon and now lacks originality. Rich.

Sunbeam Ups Kaplan

Herman Kaplan has been promoted to national sales manager at Sunbeam Records, diskery run by music publisher Tommy Calando. He succeeds Neil Galligan who takes over as firm's veepee.

Kaplan joined Sunbeam in May of this year to set up its initial distributorship network. Before that he had been doing freelance sales and promotion.

'Nel Blu' Boosts International Angle For San Remo Song Festival Contest

Rome, Oct. 7.

Following the U. S. success of Domenico Modugno's "Nel Blu Dipinto Di Blu," which won first prize at the 1958 San Remo Song Festival, the Italian music world is bustling with activity in preparation for the 1959 San Remo fest, which takes place in the Riviera spa towards the end of January.

While the event had previously meant an important national projection for winning songs, the Modugno click has shown that international impact is also now forthcoming. The Eurovision pickup of the event has also spread new hit tunes across the Continent much faster than ever before.

According to early reports, few changes are contemplated by the San Remo organizers for the next fest. To give the song classic clear sailing, the nearly concurrent San Remo jazz fest will probably be moved back some months, to March. The selection group which prechooses the tunes for the Riviera finals from all those submitted is slated to meet soon, and finalists will be announced as early as October this year.

As for the talent which is to sing the songs at the Festival, decision has yet to be made on whether these are to be new voices or "old" established names. The Festival organizer (under the aegis of the San Remo Casino), Cajafa, is felt inclined towards a name projection, as was the case this year, and may include some stars from the concert stage following the recent success of Italo concert singers with pop tunes at the Como Song Festival held this summer. RAI-TV, the telenet slated to televise the show, is however known to like "new" names and younger talent for the event.

Det. Court Raps Knuckles Of Arts Body for Nixing Aud. Date by Pete Seeger

Detroit, Oct. 14.

Circuit Court Judge Thomas J. Murphy ruled that the Detroit Arts Commission erred in refusing to permit folk singer Pete Seeger to use the Art Institute Auditorium because he was a "controversial figure" who "might" cause "disturbance and damage."

The "controversial" tag appears to have been attached to Seeger because in 1955 he was one of 27 entertainers subpoenaed to appear before the House Un-American Activities subcommittee.

"I think the term 'controversial figure' has no bearing on this matter at all," Judge Murphy declared. "If he was going to advocate some controversial doctrine or make a speech of some kind that might cause a disturbance in the auditorium, it would present a different question. What he wants to do is sing some folk songs which is in keeping with the aims and objectives of the Art Institute."

Seeger is being sponsored here by the Detroit Labor Forum. Fearing a lengthy court battle, the Forum booked the singer in the Dairy Workers Hall for his appearance Saturday (18). So, despite establishing his right to sing in the Art Institute Auditorium, Seeger will appear at the other hall.

tions will witness proper corrections. Perhaps most vulnerable is the "complete" part of the title because those-who-read-fast will overlook Ewen's footnote in the chronology that only the shows covered in the text are indexed. Obviously, a full chronology of all American legit musicals, from post-Civil War to date, would shape into a prohibitive encyclopedic work on size alone. None the less, Ewen should have accented that the samplings are a cross-section and not intended to be fully statistical. This, of course, waters down the authenticity of the "complete book" billing.

There is another major inconsistency in his format. He full-bills certain librettists and lyricists and omits others. Thus, Moss Hart is fully detailed but Lorenz Hart is cross-referenced under Rodgers & Hart. Harry B. Smith is billed but Roger B. Smith isn't. Guy Bolton and P. G. Wodehouse get the full treatment, but there's no cross-reference to Anne Caldwell or Mrs. Rida Johnson Young who, of course, show up in the Kern and Romberg collaborations under the latter's credits. Herbert Fields, Dorothy Fields and Joseph Fields are fully billed but Adolph Green is under "see Betty Comden." George Abbott, Robert Wright & George Forrest, Otto Harbach, E. Y. Harburg, Russel Crouse & Howard Lindsay, Morrie Ryskind get full billing but George Ade and Clifford Grey are not, and that prolific Shubert hack, Harold Atteridge, is cross-referred to "see Louis A. Hirsch." John (Honey) Stromberg, because he composed the Weber & Fields burlesques, gets special billing; so does Harry Tierney but his longtime collaborators, Joe McCarthy, James Montgomery and Frank Craven ("Irene," "Kid Boots" and "Up She Goes") are merely integrated.

Interlarded in biogs of 47 leading stage composers are anecdotes that can stem only from experience and intimate closeup on the shows and their artisans. He reprises plot motifs, notable performances, length of runs, the principal credits as to staging and choreography, and constantly punctuates all this with vignettes on this or that debut, song or songster, tune or terper.

Nostalgia

Nostalgic musicomedy names dot the casts. While Florenz Ziegfeld's initial legit production venture in 1896 introduced the piquant French beauty, Anna Held (later Mrs. Ziegfeld), in Charles Hoyt's "A Parlour Match," it was not until 10 years later that she came to prime attention in "A Parisian Model" with a song interpolation, "I Just Can't Make My Eyes Behave," written by Will D. Cobb and Gus Edwards.

His first "Follies" in 1907 featured 50 "Anna Held Girls." In the 1908 edition an unknown Nora Bayes electrified the audience with "Shine on Harvest Moon" which she wrote with her husband, Jack Norworth, and the year after that, the 1909 "Ziegfeld Follies" capitulated a "red hot momma," Sophie Tucker, to the heights.

The 1915 "Ziegfeld Follies" included W. C. Fields, Ann Pennington, Mae Murray, Leon Errol, Bert Williams, George White (a song-and-dance man who was later to produce his own series of "Scandals"), Ed Wynn and Ina Claire. Wynn was such a scene-stealer that Fields conked him with a billiard cue during one of their scenes—that cured Wynn.

In the 1917 "Ziegfeld Follies," which had songs dominantly by George V. Hobart, Gene Buck, Dave Stamper and Irving Berlin, and a patriotic finale by Victor Herbert, Eddie Cantor made his debut and clicked with an interpolated "That's the Kind of a Baby for Me" (by Alfred Harrison and Jack Eagan). Will Rogers also marked his bow under the Ziegfeld banner in that 1917 edition; and another newcomer sort of sneaked into the limelight in one of the highlight comedy sketches—Eddie Dowling.

Romberg's Score

Sigmund Romberg composed "Sinbad" but Al Jolson's "interpolations" created such standout hits as "Rockabye Your Baby With a Dixie Melody," "Mammy," "Chloe" and, after much pleading, a newcomer called George Gershwin came to attention when Irving Caesar, his collaborator, persuaded Jolie to interpolate "Swanee." It remains Gershwin's alltime pop hit.

Fred & Adele Astaire's first legit musical was Cole Porter's "The Gay Divorce" in 1932. In 1938 Mary Martin, another unknown, in Porter's "Leave It To Me" stopped the show cold with "My Heart Belongs to Daddy." Also in the chorus were two other nonenities, Van Johnson and Gene Kelly.

When Victor Herbert first heard Jerome Kern's "They Didn't Believe Me," in "The Girl From Utah," he told Max Dreyfus, "This man will inherit my mantle."

Rodgers & Hart

There's lots and lots of similar incidental information, such as when Romberg's "The Desert Song" was tried out in Washington in 1926 it was originally titled as "My Fair Lady"; that Helen Hayes in 1906, age 6, had made her stage debut in Victor Herbert's musical "Old Dutch," starring Lew Fields; that the Hippodrome extravaganzas were so lavish that the program credits read "invented" by Arthur Voegtlin (such as "Wars of the World").

Sissle & Blake

Ewen has covered other type musicals, from Sissle & Blake to Fats Waller & Andy Razaf and the Gershwins & the Haywards; from Bert Williams to Eartha Kitt; from Fanny Brice to Joseph Buloff; from Will Rogers to Ezio Pinza; from Bayes and Tucker to Merman and Martin.

'SILVERY MOON' CLICK A GERMAN 'LESSON'?

Zurich, Oct. 7.

Billy Vaughn etching of "Sail Along, Silvery Moon" on the Dot label (released on London over here) is the fastest-selling single disk hit here in many years, according to word from Musikvertrieb A.G., the top Swiss diskery. Disk, which passed virtually unnoticed in the U. S. and Britain, is even out-sailing such top hits as "Third Man Theme" and "Vaya Con Dios." Sales on the Swiss and German market combined are nearing the 1,000,000 mark, an unprecedented high in these parts. It has also been the top U. S. single here since last May and still going mighty strong.

Surprising click of "Silvery Moon" may be due to the fact that it is an instrumental, currently the trend here as proven by the "River Kwai March" hit, and it therefore registers also with those buyers who usually don't go for disks with English lyrics.

Coming up on the heels of "Silvery Moon" is the same orch's "La Paloma," also on Dot-London, expected to be a followup hit.

Cosnat, King Karol Ask Dismissal of AF Suit

Cosnat Distributing Corp. and King Karol Inc. filed papers in N.Y. Federal Court last week making a general denial of allegations and asking for a dismissal of the suits against them started by Audio Fidelity Inc.

Audio Fidelity had filed separate suits against Cosnat and Karol charging that the defendants' use of the trademark "Stereo Fidelity" in the sale of records infringes the plaintiff's trademark "Audio Fidelity." The suit seeks to enjoin the defendants from use of the trademark or anything similar, and an accounting and damages sustained.

Band Review

TOMMY REED ORCH (8)
Eddys', Kansas City

Veteran bandleader Tommy Reed has established a considerable name in the K.C. area, principally on the basis of three years on the stand at the rival Terrace Grill of the Hotel Muehlebach. Lately, he's been playing the area with a five-piece unit, and now returns to his usual instrumentation for an engagement at Eddys' Restaurant.

In effect, Reed replaces Tony DiPardo, who held the stand at Eddys' capably for a number of years with but slight interruptions. And it's an unusual twist in that Reed and DiPardo recently established a band booking agency here in partnership. Their styles are considerably different, however, Reed being a sax man and heading an outfit leaning to the reed lead, while DiPardo is a noted trumpet man who gave brass fuller play.

There never has been any question about Reed's ability to play dance music, and the desired dance rhythm was easily evident on opening night as the flood was nearly filled on the first round. He's putting it out with a trio of reeds (including his own), trombone, trumpet, string bass, piano and drums, with viol thumpist Kenny Fields warbling ballads. Quin.

Let's Be Peaceful!

The music industry, a multi-billion dollar biz, should stop the acrimony and recognize that spitballs and mud never go with growing up. Here we have some 20 million bucks paid yearly to ASCAP for the Radio-TV use of the greatest catalogues of popular music in the world—and America "invented" what the world loves in its pop song fare. My little gay tune, "Mister Sandman", has earned dough in every country in the world except Russia, and 90% of the buyers didn't understand a word of the lyrics, going for the American words instead of their country's adaptations. This is just one little song out of ASCAP's matchless and huge library of the very finest pop songs ever written! And, of course, there were some lousy songs written by ASCAP writers over the years (including a half a hundred by me) but what I object to is this idea that any group, or individual, can with justification say, "This is a good song and this is trash!"

I say, "Who can assume their judgment of quality is occult?"

Billy Hill, the great ASCAP writer, started the international hillbilly vogue with his wonderful songs written for Shapiro-Bernstein. And the same firm's "Prisoner's Song" proved that a lot of plain people in the U.S.A. never heard of Lindy's.

Rock 'n' roll is controversial, of course, but some of our most august citizens have teenage sons and daughters who love it and buy it, and if ANY music can bring on a moral breakdown I'll take a chocolate soda.

Let's quit calling the hits bad and cursing the lack of "good" songs. If the buyers don't want "good" songs—and that's the way it looks—why fight, fuss, and sue?

Let's be peaceful!

Mounties Get Their Manna—56,500 In 11 Shows at Ak-Sar-Ben Rodeo

By GLENN TRUMP

Omaha, Oct. 14.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, booked to feature five rodeos and horseshows in the United States this year, got off to a whammo start at Ak-Sar-Ben's 31st annual World Championship Rodeo & Livestock Show here recently, luring 56,550 through the turnstiles in 11 performances. Capacity is 57,200.

Next stops for the Mounties are the Arkansas Livestock Exposition & Rodeo in Little Rock, the International Dairy Show and Rodeo at Chicago, the American Royal Horse Show in Kansas City, and the Great Western Rodeo at San Francisco.

The Mounties, 39 strong with 36 matched black horses, were tremendous hits in Omaha and show officials were deluged with letters terming it the best rodeo ever staged in these parts. Inspector R. O. Jones is in charge of the group, with S/Sgt. C. C. Bryson handling the musical direction of the ride.

The ride lasts 19 minutes and consists of numerous drills and formations, concluding with a spectacular charge. Presentation is highly dignified and colorful throughout.

Second billing at the Ak show went to Bill Buschbom and his Liberty hoss, Sir Roger, which does leaps and tricks. Buschbom keeps act at a rapid pace.

Other added entries included the Midwest Marching Band Championships for top highschool outfits; livestock parades; the Victor Adding Machine pony hitch and miniature fire engine; and a special hula-hoop exhibition by young kids of Omaha.

Usual cowboy contest events were held, with many of the cowpokes commuting between here and Madison Square Garden in New York. Cowgirls also took part for first time, competing in a barrel racing contest.

Clown chores were most capably handled by Wilbur Plaugher and Jimmy Schumacker. Plaugher's gags included a new sputnik stunt built around Plaugher's diminutive dog and a new Ford that contains some 36 youngsters. Schumaker's clowning was more in a vocal vein, and he also handled the barrel work for the Brahma bulls. Both were outstanding.

Mervyn Nelson Roxy's Stager; '49th Star' 1st

Mervyn Nelson, director of numerous legit and nitery shows, has been added to the Roxy, N.Y., staff to stage and direct the theatre's stageshows. As his first assignment, he'll work under the supervision of managing director Robert C. Rothafel on the forthcoming stage presentation titled "The 49th Star," a tribute to Alaska. Show will open late in October along with the film, "The Last Hurrah."

On Broadway, Nelson directed such shows as "Tickets Please," "Curtain Going Up" and "Ziegfeld Follies." He also has written and directed nitery shows as the Chez Paree in Chicago, the Desert Inn in Las Vegas, the Cotton Club in Miami, and the Versailles and Latin Quarter in N.Y.

With Nelson on the Roxy staff will be musical director Robert Boucher, choreographers Ray Frost and Kenny Springer, set designer Bruno Maine, costume designer Winniford Morton, and musical arranger Perry Burgott.

Berlin, 6 Pubberies Suing Nitery in D.C.

Washington, Oct. 14.

The Casino Royal night club here is being sued by Irving Berlin and six New York publishing firms on charges of infringing the copyright of songs they publish.

Lee Zeiger, who operates the club, said he had been unable to agree with ASCAP on a licensing rate. Previous suits, he said, have been settled out of court. The suit asks $2,500 in damages—$250 for each of 10 songs.

PITT'S GAYNOR MOVING FROM CAFE TO TV'ER

Pittsburgh, Oct. 14.

Steve Gaynor's year-long contract as host-emcee-singer at the New Arena expires next month and won't be renewed. But the veteran cafe performer, who move his family here from New Jersey several months ago, has landed a tv spot and will continue to make his home and headquarters locally.

Gaynor has been signed as vocalist-announce for weekly two-hour early Sunday morning, 12:15 to 2 a.m., show on Ch. 4, headlining Barry Kaye, WAMP deejay who also has a late night interview strip over that station from Holiday House. Gaynor will be the nucleus of a stock company Kaye plans to use regularly.

New Arena has agreed to let Gaynor skip the second show at nitery on Saturday nights to make the video sessions, until his deal runs out.

'Holiday' Nearing Record In Ft. Wayne; Troy, O., 86G

"Holiday On Ice" opened at the Allen County Coliseum, Fort Wayne, Ind., last week with an advance sale of $13,000 over last year's pull and appeared headed to set a record for the town.

Up ahead, the icer played Troy, O., in the Dayton area, Sept. 30—Oct. 6, and drew a gross of $86,285 in 10 performances playing to virtual capacity. Figure was some $10,000 over the 1957 receipts.

Inside Stuff—Vaude

Rich in nostalgia is the program of "The Talk of the Town," a new theatre restaurant which opened last month on the site of the old London Hippodrome. Famed house preemed Jan. 15, 1900 and closed Aug. 17, 1957. It was the end of an era, program notes point out, and much of it has been recreated in the current show's "Nights to Remember." It spotlights the Hippodrome's opening at the turn of the century, the era of revue, and the days of the chorus' high-kicks.

Liberally illustrated with reproductions of programs of yesteryear presentations, the elaborate booklet recalls that when Sir Edward Moss (founder of Moss' Empires) opened the Hipp he achieved his ambition to give Londoners "a circus and watershow combined with stage-spectacle impossible in any other theatre." In an Arctic spec aptly named "The North Pole," some 76 polar bears slid into tank from the stage.

After the Hipp was partially rebuilt in 1909, such stars as Houdini, Marie Tempest and W. C. Fields were seen there. House was a showcase for revues dating from 1912. Among them were "Hello Ragtime," "Zig Zag" and "Brighter London" and their stars were Harry Tate, Sophie Tucker, Paul Whiteman's band, Violet Lorraine and George Robey. Musical comedy came along in the 1920s, the late George Black began a series of top musicals in 1938 and more recently the Hipp's boards handled variety bills topped by Jonnie Ray, Lonnie Donegan and Alma Cogan.

How the Hipp has been rebuilt in a $700,000 undertaking is also intricately described. Stage was completely reconstructed according to producer Robert Nesbitt's plans. Others behind the project are impresario Bernard Delfont and restaurateur Charles Forte. Each is accorded a brief biographical sketch and so thorough is the 25-page program's scope that even the chef and restaurant manager rate one-column cuts.

The Bernard Bros., U.S. disk-mime act, as quoted in the Glasgow Evening Citizen during their vaude at the Glasgow Empire Theatre: "Variety is just being allowed to die in Britain. The tragedy is that the British people won't realize it until all the theatres are closed. If something isn't done now (we) give the music hall only another two years. It's a crime to lose something as British as Buckingham Palace —and that's variety."

For the first time in years an opening of a night club in Buffalo was hailed by critical coverage by a local newspaper. Town Casino opening recently drew a serious full column review of the spot and the show on the theatre page of the Buffalo Evening News. Increasing talk of the desirability of live entertainment is thought to be back of the newspaper's attention to the show.

Lou Walters Enterprises Inc., which filed a petition in bankruptcy some months ago following the fold of Walters' Cafe de Paris, last week submitted an assignment for benefit of creditors in the N.Y. County Clerk's office. Listed as assignee is Alfred H. Rosenberg, a Brooklyn attorney.

Jolly Joyce, the Philly agency, is handling Olsen & Johnson's "Hellzapoppin'" and "Yock and Roll" show for country fairs, arenas, auditoriums and theatres. The William Morris agency books the show in vaude and cafes.

'FOLLIES' AS WALTERS' SHILL

Scorecard on Top U.S. and French B.O. Pullers at Olympia in Paris

Paris, Oct. 14.

Bruno Coquatrix, owner of the Olympia Music Hall, and primarily responsible for the vaude renaissance here, feels there are only a handful of French super-stars who can always be counted on to draw in house stints. There are also a larger group of stars who are fairly dependable, and a fast-rising group of newcomers.

Coquatrix has also found lately, via sock success with Harry Belafonte on a specialized concert level, and the Platters as Olympia headliners, that solid Yank names, backed by good disk reps or films, can also go big here. He is now negotiating for Judy Garland, Betty Hutton, Frank Sinatra, etc.

Coquatrix's list of local "supers" are Gilbert Becaud, singer-composer; Georges Brassens, troubador who also does his own salty, poetic songs; Eddie Constantine, Yank actor-singer who hit here though still practically unknown in the U. S.; Yves Montand, singer-mime who is also a film star, and Edith Piaf.

Among the stars of solid vaude values he lists Charles Aznavour, gravel-voiced singer - composer; Philippe Clay, gangling offbeat singer; Les Compagnons De La Chanson (9); Les Freres Jacques (4), Henri Genes, Juliette Greco, Georges Guetary, Gloria Lasso, Dario Moreno, Patachou, Fernand Raynaud and Charles Trenet. Maurice Chevalier he puts in a specialized durable personality class.

His rising stars are Marcel Amont, song-impressionist; Michele Arnaud, song stylist; Guy Beart, with his own specialized ditties; Raymond Devos, an offbeat standup comic; Dalida, a big-voiced thrush; Rene-Louis Lafforgue, a purveyor of his own street songs; Jacqueline Maillain, an acidulous patter comedienne; Felix Marten, an easygoing singer; Colette Renard, dramatic singer; and Jacques Verriere, a poetic singer-composer.

Others claim he has forgotten such bets as the cosmic songstress Annie Cordy, the velvet-toned Jacqueline Francois, the pert Genevieve, romantic tenors Luis Mariano and Tino Rossi, the comic tandem of Jean-Marc Thibault, Roger Pierre and Jean Richard; and others. Coquatrix' picks were from the viewpoint of b.o. results with his flagship Olympia.

Flamingo Suit Vs. Judy Garland, Luft

Las Vegas, Oct. 14.

Judy Garland and her husband Sid Luft, have been named defendant in a $7,384 collection suit filed on behalf of the Flamingo Hotel.

The action against the couple was entered in District Court by Gladys E. Cox—assigned the debt by the Strip hotel.

The suit seeks money advanced to either Miss Garland or Luft in December of last year, when Miss Garland was headlining the Flamingo show. Hotel spokesmen say the money is for such things as long distance phones, extra musicians and personal advances.

An attachment accompanied the suit and attorney Madison Graves says Miss Garland's salary at the Sands Hotel, where she opened Oct. 1, will be tied up.

Miss Garland left her Flamingo engagement after a special New Year's Eve show where she stalked off the stage, claiming the audience was rude.

Salt Lake Mormon Tabernacle Choir, a 350-voice organization, will make its first New York appearance in 47 years at Carnegie Hall, in a three-day stand, Nov. 4-6.

Frances Faye Injured

Las Vegas, Oct. 14.

Frances Faye, singer-88er who opened to capacity crowds at the Riviera lounge last week (18), fell in her bathroom two days later, fracturing a hip. She was flown to the Mt. Sinai hospital in Los Angeles, where she in under observation.

Team of Jackie & Roy replaced Miss Faye in the lounge.

Pitt Reeling As Hotel Strike Goes Into Third Week

Pittsburgh, Oct. 14.

No sign yet of any break in the local hotel strike which goes into its third week tomorrow (Wed.). Even Mayor Lawrence, interrupting his state-wide campaign for the governorship of Pennsylvania on the Democratic ticket to come here and try to bring management and unions together, couldn't make any progress and negotiations are at a standstill.

Niteries and taverns are screaming. They've been taking it on the chin brutally since walkouts at Penn-Sheraton, Roosevelt, Pittsburgher, Sherwyn and Webster Hall cancelled out a flock of conventions and almost entirely detoured the traveling fraternity. Only big downtown inn still operating is Carlton House because it has a separate contract with the help.

Even if there's a settlement shortly, which on the face of things looks extremely unlikely right now, it's going to be costly for a long period since conventions booked for the city during remainder of October and in early November are already pulling out for other sites rather than wait until the last minute. Aside from hotel employees proper, hardest hit are the musicians. Conditions ordinarily have been bad enough for the Local 60 boys but with party business, the normal offshoot of industrial get-togethers, completely out, they're bleeding.

But it's really battering the flock of cafes, bars and taverns in the Grant sector. There are at least 10 spots in the immediate area, all of them almost wholly dependent on the hotel trade, and the blues are in a major chord.

PITT'S TWIN COACHES IN SQUAWK ON CUGAT

Pittsburgh, Oct. 14.

Twin Coaches has filed a complaint with the musicians union against Xavier Cugat for cancelling out on the local nitery for the week of Oct. 24. He was to have come in with Abbe Lane. Contract called for management to be given 30 days' notice if Cugat couldn't make the date, and Rose and Tony Calderone, owners of the Coaches, claim they weren't notified until 24 hours after the deadline. MCA insists letter was written in time but reached Calderone a day late because Yom Kippur fell then and mail was delayed in the office.

Calderones were particularly miffed because they had landed a couple of big parties on the strength of the Cugat-Lane booking. Jonathan Winters and Jill Corey have been inked to replace them, Miss Corey on an old contract. She was to have played room several months ago but when singer had a chance to play Las Vegas at bigger money and follow that with a picture at Columbia. Coaches permitted her to push back the date.

CARILLON CUFFO A LA DEAUVILLE

Miami Beach, Oct. 14.

Lou Walters is moving his Miami Beach showmanship into the Carillon, whose 620 rooms and 900-capacity Siam Room gives this Herb Robins-Sidney Raffel hotel the "biggest" operation, both in number of rooms and nitery space. Walters is bringing in the "Ziegfeld Follies" unit, which he has set with Sammy Lewis at the Riviera, Las Vegas, Nov. 17. The local date is Dec. 24.

To buck the Morris Lansburgh cuffo show idea, the Carillon will also unveil its "Follies" gratis to its residents, charging a minimum only to the outsiders. It is inevitable that, as a lure to sell $40-$60-a-day rooms, all the other class beach hotels will have to use their shows as shills to lure bookings. The nitery attractions are cuffo to hotel guests, except for the basic charges for food and beverages.

Walters just got back from a quickie to London and Paris where he booked Dickie Henderson, comedian, who only showed on an Ed Sullivan teeveer, to make his U.S. nitery debut with the "Follies" at Vegas. Andrea Trio, dancers, are also set. Jane Morgan, disk-nitery thrush, heads the unit. The Vegas salary is $25,000 for the package; it is reportedly considerably less for the local dates. Walters plans changing shows every four weeks. These, like the "ZF," are booked via the Herbert Marks agency.

Former Latin Quarter (N.Y. and M.B.) impresario had been talking with the Deauville (Lansburgh) management but firmed up with the Carillon.

There was talk locally of 30 hotel managers pooling and putting on super-shows, cuffo, at some such central spot as the Civic Auditorium, to buck the Lansburgh idea, but nothing has come of it.

Belafonte Boffo in Rome And Milan One-Man Shows; 'U.S. Will Survive Faubus'

Rome, Oct. 7.

Harry Belafonte has just concluded an Italian tour with four sock dates in Milan followed by a windup four-night stand in Rome. Critics in both cities were unanimous in praise of singer, with one top Rome daily even singling him out as an example for Italian singers and songsmiths to follow.

In Rome, Belafonte charmed one of the world's coolest audiences into final cheers. Eternal City opener was a star-studded event with all top show biz names, local and foreign, present. Top-scaled tickets sold for over $8 at opener, very high for here, and almost unprecedented for a one-man show such as Belafonte's.

In a well attended local press conference, singer expressed great interest in his forthcoming film on Pushkin, noting that while he had had Russian offers for a Soviet concert swing while in Brussels, he would like to tour Russia as background for his upcoming pic project, one of several for United Artists.

Queried regarding his stand on integration, Belafonte prefaced his remarks by saying that not being a politician, he felt that artists should rule the world. He added that just as some European countries had survived dictatorships, the U.S. would survive Gov. Faubus of Arkansas.

Italian swing was sponsored by Ever Haggiag and Italian impresario Remigio Paone.

Flip-Top for GIs

Noro Morales heads a troupe which left over the weekend (12) for a 10-week trek of U.S. bases in the Pacific. Tour is backed by Philip Morris and Marlboro under name of "Flip-Top Revue." It's the sixth year that the tobacco outfit has sent an entertainment package to the Armed Forces overseas.

Court Dismisses Steel Pier's Suit Vs. U.S. Gov't on 1953 Storm Damage

Atlantic City, Oct. 14.

A $96,937 suit against the U.S. government filed in U.S. District Court by the Abel Holding Co. Inc., operators of Steel Pier here, was dismissed in an opinion handed down last week by Judge Thomas M. Madden.

The company, controlled by George A. Hamid, operator of the pier, charged that during a northeast storm in November of 1953 a channel buoy severely damaged the outermost part of the pier. The claim was filed under the Federal Tort Claims Act.

Damage estimated at $2,000,000 was done to the resort area because of the storm and the pier lost a staging platform, a tank for diving horses and two 120-foot masts used for acrobatic performers. Company said the buoy, placed in the Inlet channel, had become dislodged by the storm and had rammed into the pier, causing much damage.

In his opinion Judge Madden said that the destruction to the end of the pier was an "Act of God" and not due to any negligence on the part of the U.S. Government.

He said that no one had seen the buoy strike the pier and that the theory that it had damaged it was mere speculation.

"Even the United States is not master of the sea and the winds," Judge Madden observed in his opinion.

Revenge

Honolulu, Oct. 14.

Peter Kane was fired as Royal Hawaiian Band saxophonist because he couldn't bring his weight down to a "slim" 240 pounds.

Today he's making more money as a commercial fisherman and a spare time entertainer at private parties. And the worry-free musician now weighs a happy 355 pounds.

N.J. Cafe Owners Front Repeal Of 20% Federal Tax

Atlantic City, Oct. 14.

Repeal of the 20% Federal cabaret tax was demanded in a resolution adopted last week by the United Tavern Owners Assn. of New Jersey in convention here. The resolution said that the tax is "a deterrent to the full employment of musicians, entertainers and service employees of our industry."

Voting cards should also be issued to every citizen reaching the age of 21 in the state, the association urged in another resolution. The cards could serve as identification for persons ordering alcoholic beverages. The state's legal drinking age is 21.

The Federal tax on beer should be cut from its present $9 a barrel to $6, the association said, declaring the higher tax is excessive and a deterrent to increased sales. A resolution urged that rules governing the sales of malt beverages for off-premise consumption be liberalized. Another urged a freeze on new licenses for taverns, distributors and clubs except when a club is a fraternal or veterans group connected with a national organization.

ANKA JAPAN P.A.'S PAY OFF—BUT NOT FOR HIM

Tokyo, Oct. 7.

Paul Anka will apparently leave Japan a boffo b.o., but with no coin to show for it.

Anka, Japan's biggest record seller, scored heavily on personal appearances in Tokyo and other keys. Planned deals to net him dollars, however, appear out.

Japan's Finance Ministry will not approve dollar payment to acts not regarded as "cultural" and yen currency cannot be taken out of the country. All the Ministry approved for the Anka tour was expense money for him and his road manager.

Subsequent plans for Anka to appear in Hong Kong and Manila to earn dollars have not worked out. A possibility of him appearing in a Shochiku film hasn't panned either, although it might be made on his next trip.

Steve Lawrence GI Stint X'es Out Eydie in Dallas

Dallas, Oct. 14.

The Eydie Gorme show which was scheduled to be held at the Cotton Bowl last Thursday was called off. KLIF and the State Fair of Texas were to be co-sponsors of the attraction.

The show, part of a "Shower of Stars" which got off to a financially embarrassing start with Ernie Ford last Monday night, hit a snag when Steve Lawrence entered the Army. He had been scheduled to appear here with Miss Gorme, his wife.

Money was refunded to those who purchased tickets to the show.

Dick Clark Hikes Atlanta Fair's B.O.

Atlanta, Oct. 14.

Given a 12,000-ticket boost by the appearance of Dick Clark, ABC-TV Bandstand personality, and wonderful weather, the Southeastern Fair Sunday (12) closed out a successful run by topping the previous record pull. Attendance this year went past 400,000, some 60,000 more than last year's turnstile count.

Clark's appearance here was sponsored by WLW-A, Crosley outlet here affiliated with ABC. He brought with him thrush Joni James, as "special guest artist," Danny & The Juniors, Conway Twitty, Sam Cook and the Applejacks. In addition, Paul Peek, Atlanta disker, participated in the Clark stand. He did one show Saturday in front of grandstand at Lakewood Park, and then did his live telecast that night.

Special police details were on hand to keep teenagers in line. Tickets to Clark's two appearances were distributed at a booth outside fairgrounds on a first-come basis.

Beachcomber, Last Honolulu Holdout, In Pact With AGVA

Honolulu, Oct. 14.

Donn Beach, last major holdout against the American Guild of Variety Artists, has capitulated and signed a contract for his Don the Beachcomber's Waikiki nitery.

Hawaii branch of AGVA, managed by John Tsukano, now has pacts governing 14 major hotels and indie niteries and has a membership of 250.

Featured performers will now get $100 a week minimum and group entertainers will receive $75.

Ironically, Beach evidently is planning to import name and semi-name acts from the mainland, with Natalie & The Beachcombers launching new policy.

Charlotte Champaign, Dixie warbler and pianist, has opened a two-week engagement with her new trip at the plush Rivermont East Club in Memphis.

Greensboro's Sunday Ukase at Fair Burns Hamid; Autry in for 1, Scrams

Greensboro, N. C., Oct. 14.

The largest crowds of its rain-hampered six-day stand showed up on Sunday (5) as the Greensboro Fair wound up.

Perhaps, lured by the promise of free rides for all those under 16 years of age, the crowds swarmed around the midway but did not seem attracted to the various sideshows in any numbers.

The Gene Autry Shows, billed as one of the main attractions, failed to put on its scheduled show in the afternoon after drawing only a couple of hundred at its first performance.

Some complaints were registered that the rides and concessions were closing up earlier than advertised. The "free rides" promise came from fair owner George A. Hamid, angered over a ruling by the city's attorney that no admission fees could be charged for rides on Sunday.

Harper J. Elam III ruled that under the city's blue laws the fair could charge admission at the gate and to its sideshows but could not charge for the riding devices.

Terming the situation "a fantastic idea," Hamid threw open the midway's 16 rides to children under 16 and had them presented with tickets for the rides at the gate. But there was an admission charge at the main gate.

Autry, whose show had also been hampered by the bad weather that beset the fair, packed up and left town after his 2 p. m. show. His troupe had been scheduled for a second performance at 5 p. m.

Furrier's Writ to Collect On McDonald's Chinchilla

Dallas, Oct. 14.

A garnishment writ was served on the Statler-Hilton Hotel Tuesday (7) by a New York furrier who claimed that singer Marie McDonald, now appearing in the hostel's Empire Room, owed him a $5,000 balance on a chinchilla coat she bought Dec. 2, 1957. Merchant, Milton C. Herman, alleged Miss McDonald made a $2,000 down payment on the $7,000 coat and signed an order agreeing to pay the balance.

Atty. Arthur S. Goldberg filed a suit for the balance claimed by Herman, and the case is docketed for District Judge Paine Bush's court. Miss McDonald was named in the suit as the wife of Harry Karl.

'Jewel Box' Reopening

"Jewel Box Revue," which closed for revisions three weeks ago following a four-performance run at the Shubert Theatre, Washington, is scheduled to reopen next Friday (17) at the Hillside Theatre, Jamaica, N. Y. The show comprised of 25 femme impersonators and one girl, will run in conjunction with a film.

Two performances of the Danny Brown-Doc Benner production are scheduled Monday-Friday and three Saturday and Sunday.

Singing Boys of Mexico In Okay Draw at Austin

Austin, Oct. 14.

New Austin area impresario C. T. Johnson kicked off with presentation last week (7) of Singing Boys of Mexico that drew 1,500 to City Coliseum at $3.60 top. Crowd was considered big for a cultural event for this city.

Negative response of singing troupe to crude facilities of the Coliseum has prompted Johnson to book the National Symphony of Mexico, originally slated for the Coliseum, into Baylor Hall at Waco's Baylor U. on Dec. 5.

Johnson says he'll wait for completion of Austin's lavish $3,000,000 City Auditorium, due to be completed around January, before he books for Austin again.

Long tabbed outmoded by city fathers and others, Coliseum is a converted hangar.

Ted Weems orch will appear at the fifth annual Chrysanthemum Ball Oct. 23 in the St. Anthony Hotel, San Antonio.

House Reviews

Apollo, N. Y.

Jocko Henderson's Rocket Ship Revue with The Upsetters (6), Eisly Boys (4), Bells (5), Chantels (5), Dee Clark, Eddie Anderson & Playmate, Imperials (5), Little Willie John; "Sky Commandos" (Col).

Jocko Henderson, a deejay fave in the Harlem area where the Apollo reigns as showplace, has put together a routine rock 'n' roll affair under the impressive heading of "Rocket Ship Revue." For Henderson's "daddy-o" and "mommy-o" fans, the layout ought to have some appeal, but on the whole it looks like the Apollo management was scrimping on budget in this showcasing of the "beat" performers.

Little Willie John is the big gun in the closing shot and he rolls with "Ring-A-Ling," "Tell Me, Tell Me, Baby" and the like for an okay reaction. Preceding are the Imperials, who've got a current disclicker in "Tears On My Pillow" on the End label. The five boys (and two mikes) sound better on wax but the juke and jock appeal holds up and the aud gets with 'em. They do a couple of other numbers, too, but it's "Tears" that makes the turn in this presentation.

Show opens moderately with the Eisly Boys, four energetic singers who roll through "Everybody's Rocking and Rolling," weep through "This Is The End" and destroy "Volare." They are followed by the Bells, a group of five, who mix up a medley of swingers and ballad for so-so results. The Chantels, five gals, try hard in their three-tune effort but their song message doesn't seem to get across.

Only offbeat attraction in Henderson's lineup is moppet Eddie Anderson who terps and beats the drums to customer approval. His less-than-four-feet size is in his favor, so is the shapely "Playmate" who assists in the terping turn.

The Upsetters, two guitars, a drum and three sax, break it up in show's midway mark with some frantic tootling and warbling by Dee Clark. The group is augmented by three brass, a sax and a piano for the showbacking. They're much too loud to do any of the acts any good. Gros.

Prince of Wales, London

London, Oct. 7.

Dickie Valentine, Joan Regan, Annell & Brask, Harry Bailey, King Bros., Pinky, Perky & Co., Roy Castle, Gina & Gerardo, Joe Baker & Jack Douglas, John Tiller Girls (12), Harold Collins Theatre Orch; directed by Dennis Ringrove; $2.30 top.

The announced indisposition of Hollywood songstress Kathryn Grayson caused this bill to be suddenly rearranged. Bernard Delfont relies mainly on singers as his toppers and the bill, while lacking stellar surprise, is an amiable one which should stand up stoutly for its allotted two weeks.

Dickie Valentine's personality is lively enough to sustain a conventional routine. He takes off Johnnie Ray, Al Jolson, Nat King Cole and Billy Eckstine and also registers firmly with a number of songs in which "The Street Where You Live" and "The Old Pianner" come off well, but "Foggy, Foggy Dew" not so hotly. Valentine, like many modern warblers, cannot apparently be divorced from either a trailing or static mike, a drawback which must be regretfully accepted.

Two other singing toppers help to fill the bulk of the bill. There are the King Bros. with some effervescent rendering of pop numbers, and Joan Regan, looking very sweet but scarcely in her top form except with her offering of "A Certain Smile." Her repertoire includes "That Old Feeling," "When Shadows Fall" and a jazzed-up religious ditty, "Up There."

Among the supporting acts are three that are standouts. Pinky, Perky & Co., w.k. on local tv, is a first-class puppet act, colorful, warm and skilfully manipulated. Gina & Gerardo, from the States, offer some smooth dancing. Finally, Roy Castle is a young comedian who will go far when he gets some stronger material. It's a combination of gagging, impersonations, hoofing and instrumental work and he has a cheerful, infectious personality with a neat sense of timing.

Joe Baker & Jack Douglas and Harry Bailey are routine comedy acts and Annell & Brask are continental cyclists whose act gets away from the normal by its dresses and obviously careful production. The John Tiller Girls open both halves of the bill and they are as lithe, lissome and lovely as audiences have grown to expect.

Johnny Pearson accompanies Joan Regan, Hal Chambers and drummer Denny Piercy do the honors for Valentine, while Dennis Ringrove satisfactorily looks after the entire show as musical director of the Harold Collins Theatre Orchestra. Without anything sensational, this vaude bill provides genial entertainment and is as clean as a whistle. Rich.

One-Man Show

Yves Montand Unit

Paris, Oct. 14.

Andre Cherrier presents Yves Montand in a one-man show with Bob Castella Orch (7). At Theatre De L'Etoile, Paris, Oct. 7, '58; $3 top.

Yves Montand is a savvy showman, besides being an extremely talented one. This is his first singing appearance here in four years, and it was treated as a major event with a publicity-studded opening. Thus, he is never subject to overexposure and has spent the interim on disks, and film and theatre acting stints.

Dressed in an open-necked black shirt and black trousers, he saunters out for a bright, easy opening in singing of friendship. His ease, thespic backing, pleasant personality, excellent enunciation and obvious sincerity and drive soon bring his well selected songalog into a series of joyful, blue or dramatic interludes.

Montand's thesp turns have helped his stance and song underlinings. He is also aided by well controlled lighting and the solid Bob Castella orch (7) backing behind a scrim. Montand has worked on his program for eight months and tried it out around France before bringing it in. It shows deft choice and knowhow. He can also break into dance or use props effectively for more offbeat material.

Showing well are a takeoff on the English gentleman thief with bowler and sword-cane umbrella, solid love ballads, a tale of an unsuccessful terper, a mad jazz fanatic, a tramp reliving old glories, one about a lovesick orch conductor whose work always leads from Beethoven to schmaltz, a tale of a punchdrunk fighter and other hep entries adroitly interlaced to make this a standout affair.

Montand's last one-man show four years ago ran for six months SRO. This can do the same. He works for a lion's share of the house receipts. He is due for a repeat of this show in New York early next year. With a few garnishing entries in English, he should wow the French song aficionados, and word-of-mouth and critics could build it into a top specialized stint there. Mosk.

always a stepchild in the international structure, UNESCO is now slated for a facelifting. Rabb has mustered his committee and prepared them to tackle their jobs on an all-out basis. Jock Lawrence, motion picture publicist, is a member of the U. S. committee. In the past, such show biz personalities as Myrna Loy have been active in UNESCO.

Highlighting the Paris conference, the 10th one since inception of UNESCO in 1945, will be unshuttering of organization's plush new h.q. in the French capital. Delegates from 87 nations will meet here to discuss such problems as free exchange in fields of culture, education and science; development of standards and awareness in these fields in under-developed nations; financing projects in some countries; an international mass communications project, including development of radio-tv; and others.

Accenting newly acquired importance of the entire scope of UNESCO are such recent developments as the East-West cultural exchange program and the various cultural competitions and events at the Brussels Fair.

The Rabb delegation is one of the few which received prompt and enthusiastic Senate approval. In the past, appointments were made during Congressional adjournment in order to avoid controversy.

Rabb is taking leave of office from his New York law firm, which he joined last May, to attend the conference.

hostess Mesta and comedienne Gracie Allen.

In Washington, where entertaining one's enemies is legal, the Mesta-Cafritz social rivalry has had boxoffice since its beginning. Both rivals know it, and play to it. Local and national groups here, with an eye for publicity, nurture it. Thus, the Cafritz show was an assured sellout from the start.

The "instantaneous cast" of Lambs from New York included: Clarence Nordstrom, as Gwen; John L. Cherry, Don Tomkins, Donat Gautier, Pat Harrington, Tommy Dillon and Jerry Bergen. On the staff: musical director, Eddie Weber, assistant production manager, Bruce Evans; and stage manager, Ross Hertz.

Gwen is introduced in a skit in which a drunk tries to pick her up. He is admonished by a friend who advises, "Don't get fresh with her. Don't you know who she is? She's one of the leading hostesses in Washington!"

"Oh, how do you do Mrs. Eisenhower," the drunk replied.

"Not Mamie," his friend advises. "She's a top hostess."

"Oh, Hello, Mrs. Mesta, I didn't recognize you since you lost so much weight," the drunk replies.

"No, no, no. She's the wife of Washington's leading real estate tycoon."

"Hello, Mrs. William Zeckendorf," is the reply.

Mrs. Cafritz' unique choice of words and phrases, termed "Gwendolynisms" by the Washington press corps, get attention from the Kramer script in a scene with a speech professor when she asks, "Tell me, Professor, am I manicuring my syllables properly."

Kramer takes a sharp poke at the absence of adequate food at her parties when one guest is so hungry he searchs vainly "even for a hotdog." The closest he gets for it is an introduction to Supreme Court Justice Frankfurter.

Although Mrs. Cafritz was on hand to see her rival, Mrs. Mesta, sainted three years ago, Mrs. Mesta was too busy to come Monday. She was entertaining Spanish Dictator Francisco Franco's daughter at a luncheon while Gwen was on the S & S griddle.

negotiations. Obolensky's idea of building up the recently acquired Drake Hotel with a class nitery room, a la his former showmanship with the Sherry-Netherland's Carnaval Room, the Ambassador's (now Park East) Embassy Club and Knight Box, the Plaza's Rendez-Vous and St. Regis Maisonette rooms, has now been tabled. The Drake is a cooperatively owned hotel and it is felt that the permanent residents might not like a late-hour boite as with the other transient plusheries.

Young Zeckendorf has his father's cooperation in becoming "the biggest hotel man in New York" and plans to restrict himself to Gotham. Asked what would happen if the Government stepped in, as it did following the Hilton takeover of the Statler chain, he is understood to have said, "Then I'll know we're a big success, and we'll cope with any divorcement when that time comes."

Already, intra-Zeckendorf management of the new "bigger than the Waldorf" hostelry is facetiously called the "Rockenzorf." It is believed that, being in the Radio City orbit, the new hostelry will have extensive television studio facilities to the degree that it might well become a miniature "television city." It is for that reason that the United States Hotel billing, at first mulled, may be waived to include some sort of a tv connotation.

With Zeckendorf's takeover of the Hotel Commodore that is also being given the UN angle with accent on "only three blocks from the United Nations."

Upstairs at the Downstairs, N. Y.

Julius Monk presents "Demi-Dozen," with Jean Arnold, Jack Fletcher Ceil Cabot George Hall, Jane Connell, Gerry Matthews; directed and staged by John Heawood; lyrics and music by Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt, Jay Thompson, Bud McCreery, Bill Dania, Martin Gal, Carolyn Leigh, Cy Coleman; show conceived and supervised by Monk; duo pianos, Stan Keen, Gordon Connell; $5 minimum.

Having pulled a switch on locations and positions—from below 6th Ave. and 51st St. to chic quarters on 56th just off 5th Ave., and from downstairs to a decorative new upstairs—Julius Monk's introes his new haven for sophisticates with "Demi-Dozen." It's a fast, punchy, often hilarious potpourri of satire, parody, ballads and mimicry.

Monk and his collaborators, including the six performers, each one of whom is tops, have a special knack for this sort of fare. Relying primarily on the assumption that their audiences are hep and can take a joke, their show is a well-paced and generally well-balanced mixture of corn and sophistication, a tongue-in-cheek bit of nonsense ranging from the brilliant to the ordinary, but never to the common.

Though the program's basic appeal hasn't changed, and the cast still must make do with a tiny stage (which somehow retains the makeshift intimacy of the whole thing), it's obvious that Monk boite is coming up in the world. The Upstairs room, long and narrow, with a raised section in the back and dominated in its decor by the insistent red of the walls, is considerably roomier than was the cellar-type Downstairs room in the prior establishment. New room seats 150 comfortably and its accoustics are good. Former Wanamaker mansion, now has its street-floor room used as a cocktail lounge, with entertainment.

When Monk clicked in his rather shoddy basement bistro on 6th Ave. and 51 St. (formerly Morey Amsterdam's Playgoers Club) he took over a street-level room and whimsically billed it as The Upstairs—Son of Downstairs. Here, in the posh former Wanamaker town house, he has both street-floor and one-flight-up bistros combined into a handsome package, housed in a plush environment with decor to match.

"Demi-Dozen" consists of nine numbers with an intermission. It starts off with a merry "strolling players" opening that immediately sets the right mood for the show. Since everyone in the cast has definite talents, the skits segue regularly into solos, and it's here that "Demi-Dozen" is at its best. Outstanding is Ceil Cabot, a petite dame with mucho appeal, who practically steals the show with a couple of musically-inclined monologs. She's good enough to work solo in any room and shapes as a natural for television. Her "Statehood Hula," with lyrics by Tom Jones and music by Harvey Schmidt, is a knockout. She's also great in the bouncy "Upper New Jersey Hop," written by Jay Thompson, a takeoff on the twenties.

Jones and Schmidt collaboration also produces the appealing "All I Know" ballad sung well by Gerry Matthews, the "Mister Off-Broadway" takeoff done by Jack Fletcher, the very amusing "Seasonal Sonatina" parody in which the whole cast participates, and the serious "The Holy Man and The New Yorker" parable which Matthews sings and acts out effectively. Schmidt alone is responsible for music and lyrics on the "One and All" ditty which George Hall puts across cleverly.

But their best number, and another highlight of the show, is "The Race of the Lexington Avenue Express," a parody sung by Jane Connell in the guise of one of the more arty folk balladeers. Laughs drown out the better part of this sock act. Miss Connell in this and other numbers is excellent.

In some respects, "Demi-Dozen" needs tightening. Several numbers, including one of the opening skits ("A Med-Mime" and "Merchandise Medicine"), are definitely too long. Not even the clever pantomime of Fletcher, Miss Cabot and Miss Connell can save that bit from becoming a bore. It's questionable, too, whether the several repeats from earlier shows, like the "Portofino" number, are necessary and wouldn't have been more advantageously replaced by new material, though Bud Mc Creery's "Guess Who Was There" bit still is good for yaks.

Certainly, the new stuff stands up well. "Conference Call," with the versatile Jean Arnold, Fletcher, Hall and Matthews, is Bill Dana's very clever and funny takeoff on Madison Ave. jargon and attitudes; the Fletcher-Hall dialog bit, "Moderne Artistes," scripted by Tom Jones and Martin Gal, catches just the right flavor; Miss Arnold's rendition of "You Fascinate Me So," lyric by Carolyn Leigh music by Cy Coleman, is a nice switch of pace, and the "Now I Lay Me Down to Couch" montage done by Hall, Matthews and Miss Arnold has the customers howling. McCreery contributes the finale, a takeoff on a minstrel show.

"Demi-Dozen" is uneven—it's second part is much better and funnier than the first. It is totally devoid of any political satire, which could have a place in such a show. Nevertheless, host Monk offers up the kind of combination of taste, elegance and fun that just can't miss, and he's picked a young and enthusiastic troupe. Show is cleverly staged by John Heawood to take best advantage of the limited space and individual talents. Stan Keen and Gordon Connell provide excellent background music on their two pianos. "Demi-Dozen" rates a long run. Hift.

What sold on the old five-a-day vaude circuits is just as effective today on the nitery beats. Proof of that is Jimmy Conlin and his frau, Dorothy Ryan, who are presenting a turn that brings back memories of the golden days.

Although Conlin's name, isn't wellknown, at least in these parts, the customers immediately recognize him as a character actor of many films and as the waiter at Archie's Tavern.

The vet (he'll be 74 on Oct. 14) handles the comedy, mugging and piano-pounding chores while his striking wife, gowned in eye-catching blue formal, straights and turns in an A-1 singing job. Conlin's comedy is strictly up to date and his excellent ragtime 88ing includes some of his own compositions. A rousing "Bill Bailey" sends the duo off to an ovation. Trump.

Chateau Madrid, N. Y.

Nejla Ates, Tun Tun, Pepita & Goyo Reyes, with Olga & Curro Amaya; Candi Cortez, Ralph Font and Panchito Orchs; $4-$5 minimums.

This popular Latin-American spot has come up with another solid bill which is packing them in. Angel Lopez has probably the most ambitious revue in many months, being topped by Nejla Ates, erstwhile Turkish favorite who first gained prominence as a singer-specialty dancer in the musical, "Fanny."

While Miss Ates obviously is the boxoffice magnet, current show also boasts considerable additional talent. Pepita & Goyo Reyes, flamenco dancers, are holdovers from the last bill, with Olga & Curro Amaya, terps combo, acting in support or pairing up for a four-person dancing ensemble. All four have been here before, and are great faves with the Spanish patrons. Goyo Reyes, of course, shapes as standout with several solos. The spotlighted heel-and-toe specialty scores heavily. The four work well together, with colorful garb helping to add class.

Tun Tun, half-pint Mexican film and stage comic, also helps make the show jell. He's been around, and has done well in this room previously. The Latin-American midget cashes in on his abnormally short legs and height for solid returns. He is especially good with his mambo, as done in Italy, German, Cuba and by dancing school neophytes. Energetic youth does a likely imitation of Ed Sullivan, with the Sullivan style of emceeing serving as an intro to imitations of Nat King Cole, Billy Eckstine and Elvis Presley. Even a miniature piano is used for a vigorous Liberace takeoff.

Tun Tun's version of a bullfight unfortunately seemed a bit draggy, but the audience loved it.

Miss Ates appeared to be working under wraps at show caught, understandable since it was the dinner performance. She used two songs, both quite effective, for a change of pace. The Turkish love song could be developed further for a stronger payoff. She seemed annoyed by the rather noisy dining crowd when about to go into a ballad.

Quite obviously the auditors here came to glimpse her belly gyrations, few evidencing much interest in Miss Ates' vocal ability, good as it is. There was plenty of this type of terpsing, but some wondered if a change of costume and some added routines might not enhance her current act. However, she scored heavily and had to beg off.

Ralph Font's combo plays for the show in easy fashion as well as for the customer dancing. Panchito alternates for dancing, favoring Latin tunes. Candi Cortez again femcees the show and vocalizes with the bands. Wear.

Queen Elizabeth, Mont'l

Montreal, Oct. 10.

Nelson Eddy, Gale Sherwood (with Theodore Paxson), Don Warner Orch (10), Louis Bannet Trio; $2.50-$3 cover.

The combination of Nelson Eddy and Gale Sherwood is almost unbeatable in a room such as the Salle Bonaventure in the Hilton-operated Queen Elizabeth Hotel. The Eddy name is a cinch to bring out the femmes who were wearing sack dresses before they came into fashion, and the appearance and piping of Gale Sherwood are sure to keep the husbands and escorts happy and convince them the tab is worth lifting regardless of the size.

On paper, nothing could be more contrived than the teaming of Eddy and Miss Sherwood. But in actual performance each compliments the other and together their combined show savvy and talent make for a sock entertainment package. After a few so-so offerings that garnered little for the room's rep or coffers, general manager Don Mumford has come up with a ringer and should establish house records during duo's three-week stint.

Backed by the fine pianoisms of his musical director Theodore Paxson, Eddy offers an act that is anything but pompous and affected. In fact, he tends to bend almost backward to keep a light tone running throughout despite repeated patron requests for his more serious tunes of another era. Midway through routining he brings on Miss Sherwood, a blonde looker with a fine voice, and team earns plaudits for their interp of the standards and operetta items. Miss Sherwood returns later as Eddy's dream girl in selections worked around "Desert Song." Her brief costume and figure plus her easy sense of comedy during session do much to enhance visual qualities of act and endear her with the ringsiders.

The Don Warner orch gives couple okay backing and plays for customer hoofing between times with the Louis Bannet trio in the relief slot. Jacqueline Francois is down for an Oct. 27 opening. Newt.

Dorchester, London

London, Oct. 7.

Giolli Sisters (2), Helmuth Gunther, Dorchester Girls (4), Tommy Whittle & Albert Marland Orchs; $6 minimum.

The Giolli Sisters, who headline this layout, are wellknown in their native Italy and are prominent recording artists. This is their first engagement in London and they impress as a pleasant enough duo with a nice, friendly personality and with adequate vocal prowess. They are also both accomplished guitarists and, in consequence, provide their own accompaniment.

Like other visiting continental artists, the sisters obviously don't know very much English, but they've attempted to remedy this by learning the words of "Que Sera Sera" and a quaint accent provides its own charm. For the rest, their routine is confined to a couple of songs sung in Italian; but inability to follow the lyrics places some strain on the audience.

Helmuth Gunther, German juggler, starts his act slowly by going through the motions with conventional tricks, but builds up to a socko close. His final stint, in which he ends up balancing half a dozen candlesticks and a lighted candle on his head, earns a spontaneous reaction from ringsiders.

The Dorchester Girls, back in the layout after their summer vacation, have three brief spots and fill them all delightfully. The girls are lookers, have charm and can dance. Their opening ballet routine is particularly attractive.

With this bill, too, the Dorchester has a change in its musical lineup. Tommy Whittle has the new dance orchestra, replacing Cyril Grantham's combo; and Albert Marland and his piano music have taken over from George Birch. Myro.

Flamingo, Las Vegas

Las Vegas, Oct. 9.

Mills Bros. (4), Andrews Sisters (3), Sid Krofft & Marionettes, Don Kirk, Flamingoettes (11), Jack Cathcart Orch (13); choreography by Buster Burnell; $3 minimum.

The combination of the Mills Bros. and the Andrews Sisters on the same bill results in a pleasant musicale that had Flamingo Room first-nighters pounding the tables for encores. The well-balanced four-week package contains Sid Krofft, held over with his fine puppet act, and a new production number featuring the voice of Don Kirk and the terps of the Flamingoettes (11) which Buster Burnell has woven together with big-time flair. Jack Cathcart's orch (13) backs the show with its usual finesse.

The familiar voices of the Mills Bros. lend their blend to such numbers as "Opus One," "I'll Be Around," "You're Nobody Till Somebody Loves You," "Paper Doll," "She Was Five and He Was Ten," "Glow Worm," "You Always Hurt the One You Love," "Gum Drop" (which is their bow to rock 'n' roll), "Up A Lazy River," "Basin St. Blues" (in which they do their oral impreshes of musical instruments) and "How Blue?" a new version of "Blue Danube."

The Andrews Sisters, with their splendid harmony and distinctive sound, offer such as "Don't Fence Me In," "Begin the Beguine," "Pennsylvania Polka," "Roll Out the Barrel," "Apple Blossom Time," "Rum and Coca-Cola," "I Can Dream Can't I?" along with some of their other disclicks. They do an amusing flapper routine which includes some of the oldies like "Don't Bring Lulu," "Barney Google," and "Show Me The Way To Go Home," latter made into a community sing complete with bouncing ball on the lyrics. Duke.

Barclay Hotel, Toronto

Toronto, Oct. 7.

With a company roundup for an opening hillbilly production number of "Lazybones," the boys in overalls and the girls in briefies, Al Siegel has whipped together a fast-moving 60-minute floorshow. Before a log-cabin cutout plus rustic palings, there's a fast-opening that includes a square dance and a "Jubilation E. Cornball" hoedown that has Jackie Jay at the mike for the solos but everybody showing plenty of audience participating energy.

The engagement is also a personal triumph for the dinner-jacketed Three Deuces who are back in their hometown after having completed 23 weeks in Britain with the Moss Theatres, including a Command performance and 10 appearances on the BBC. Heading the trio is Paul Summerville (whose grandfather and father own a chain of Toronto theatres operated by Famous Players). The other members are Ray Marlowe and Jack Northmore.

Their opener is a swift "You for Me," with the trio into "Love is a Many Splendored Thing," a set of spirituals headed by "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," and finishing with a spirited "When the Saints Come Marching In." It's a rousing offering, with the group in fine fettle; ditto the enthusiastic audience's hand-slapping for the trio's "It's Gonna Rain," for which they had to take an encore. Here are three boys with outstanding energy and harmonious pitch.

Jackie Jay, as the "Ioway Twister," belies his billing in his dinner jacket, but is an excellent storyteller and eccentric dancer. His use of double flutes in "Darktown Strutters Ball" and the "Third Man" theme, plus the gymnastic monologist's imitation of the bagpipes on a hot-water bottle, also bring big applause.

It's a segue to Frankie Connors, a high tenor, again in dinner jacket, for his bouncy "Thou Swell," a ballad for change of tempo to "Fascination" and "Around the World," with a fine finish for his buoyant "with a Shillelagh Under My Arm." Good-looking Connors has no trouble in getting over on lusty delivery.

The Craig Daye Dancers are on with their "Jazz Cocktail" number in gorgeous silver and crimson costumes, plus feathered headdresses; are back for "Night and Day" number in spangled, black gowns, with the Deuces and Connors as tophatted suitors at the mike, doing "Lullaby of Broadway" and "One Night in Manhattan," with the girls dancing in the background and Jimmie Amaro's orch lending strong support. It's a colorful finale and a tribute to Siegel's staging. McStay.

New Acts

BILL DUNGAN
Comedy
25 Mins.
Blinstrub's, Boston

Bill Dungan, around for some time on the Coast, but not documented in VARIETY's New Acts file, is a singing comic who's a dead ringer for Red Skelton, yet does no Skelton bits or impreshes. A redhaired, 6-ft., 200 pound former pro football player, he's a zany comic who works chants, patter and antics into strong session. Special material by Eli Basse includes a slick bit on an unfortunate paratrooper whose parachute failed to open and a western drunk routine.

Dungan is a speedy dispatcher of comic business and he scores fine with a Ted Lewis takeoff with toy clarinet and tophat which turns out to be an impresh within an impresh with tv commercials, politicos, John L. Lewis and Sydney Greenstreet all interposed. He does two straight numbers in song, a big "Old Man River" in deep baritone voice and "Where Or When" displaying pleasant piping.

Opening with "I'm Happy," fast moving comic, at song end where band plays chords, pulls soft hat from coat, pushes his jacket back on shoulders, and goes into a zany drunk. This segues into the paratrooper bit, and then he does "how I got into show biz" routine. With straw hat and cane for old vaude days, he winds up strong with a Jolson medley. Dungan is one of the better practitioners of comedy and singing in that he uses clean, fresh and original material, refuses to capitalize on his amazing resemblance to Skelton, and when he sings Jolson songs lays off the a la Jolie kick, piping them in his own voice. He's split the singing and comicking well, showing ability in both categories.

LINO FITZGERALD
Songs
15 Mins.
Cafe Bohemia, N.Y.

Dino Fitzgerald is a pleasant singer, who's delivering in a style reminiscent of Dean Martin. His songstering, as he accompanies himself on a guitar, is mostly in the ballad vein and easy to take. His appearance is suitable for visual bookings, while vocally he's likely candidate for a wax workout.

Tunes delivered by him include such numbers as "Just in Time," "My Heart Belongs to Somebody Else" and "Try a Little Tenderness." Jess.

LAMBERT, HENDRICKS & ROSS
Songs
30 Mins.
Storyville, Boston

Dave Lambert, Jon Hendricks and Annie Ross, out together for about a month, have welded themselves into a click jazz singing group. The Hub Storyville buffs cheered from start to finish, calling for three encores. Group scores with numbers from their album, "Sing a Song of Basie," as well as straight jazz tunes by top composers and slick special lyrics by Hendricks.

All three have established reps in the jazz field. Annie Ross, striking redhead, is a looker and delivers in a wild turquoise and blue ballon sack with the two tux-clad lads.

Three are backed by strong rhythm section of bass, piano and drums and overall effects sounds like full band. Although spotted No. 2 on the George Wein bill, trio shows strength for top spot and has been booked for return in December and March to top bill. Comedy and entertainment value is big, visual appearance is great, for class rooms as well as jazz boites. With fresh, new approach to group piping, should climb to top fast. Guy.

MARC ALDEN
Songs
12 Mins.
Gatineau, Ottawa

Marc Alden is equipped with looks, a clicko set of pipes and an okay personality but nobody's shown him what to do with any of them in front of an audience. Currently he's handling triple chores at the Gatineau Club: emceeing, chanting solo and with the line. He's adequate but shows big need of an act plus a course in staging savvy.

With proper backing he could be okay on disk. With production, he could crutch a nitery bill. Gorm.

Moulin Rouge, H'wood

Hollywood, Oct. 9.

Anna Maria Alberghetti, The Happy Jesters, Donn Arden revue, "Wonderful World," Dick Stabile Orch (16); $2.50-$5.50 package.

From Arizona to Africa, from London to Hollywood—with three white steeds, a trio of gray elephants and 100 nattily and sometimes scantily attired humans—the latest Donn Arden revue, "Wonderful World," opened at the Moulin Rouge (9) to a star-studded audience, many of whom ended up onstage to wish Frank Sennes a happy birthday. If the whole 90-minute show be likened to Sennes' finely baked birthday cake, then the topping—a striking combination of talent and looks—was Anna Maria Alberghetti.

The voice that Miss Alberghetti maneuvers with such ease is of excellent timbre and range, and, what is just as important in a night club, she realizes this is not a concert hall. The balance of classical and pop selections is perfect, and there's a mighty fine act here, besides. Joined by skillful dancers Jerry Antes and Pepe DeChazza, Miss Alberghetti flows just as smoothly through her routines as she does through her repertoire. Her stage presence is made of light-hearted dignity; she is sometimes soft and tender, often exciting and always in good taste. On opening night, the vocalist's mother, a pianist of no mean talent herself, Steinwayed a session of boogie that scored with the audience and her daughter.

Up for Act II of "Wonderful World" are the Happy Jesters, a trio of zany funnymen who rate solid kudos for their impersonations and happy sound.

The newest Donn Arden revue, said to have cost $250,000 to mount on the newly expanded panoramic stage, has the extravagant look of the old Metro filmusicals and the exuberant look of modern choreography. It starts with "Americana," a wild west show in which pinkclad cowpokes and girls raise the standards for "Gunsmoke," "Wyatt Burp" and "Have Gun Will Run." Next up is "Big Ben Beat," a study in red, white and black, with the final production number being "Africana," a rousing, fiery and savage spectacle that includes a bonfire sacrifice of the huntress. Taste, imagination and showmanship are keys to Ardens talents, and great assists come from music and lyric writers Lenny Adelson and Lyn Murray, costumer Mme. Berthe, choreographers Bonnie Hunt and Larry Baldonado, scenery designer Harvey Warren, musical arrangers Jack Hayes and Ruby Raksin and choral director Johnny Mann. Backing up the entire evening with stirring support and artistry of its own is the Dick Stabile orch (16).

Opening night crowd broke up with a nightcap bantering of Milton Berle, Jerry Lewis, Sammy Davis and Jimmy Durante who were called onstage, and later joined by Julius LaRosa, to say happy birthday and intro the stars who remained seated.

The Moulin Rouge, particularly with inauguration of a new low-price package to midweek patrons, should do especially well with its new show and already boasts a reported 25,000 advance reservations. Miss Alberghetti will hold down the top spot through Oct. 22, with Roberta Sherwood and Paul Gilbert then taking over. Ron.

Cafe Bohemia, N. Y.

Arthur Blake, Thelma Carpenter, Dino Fitzgerald, Don Forbes Trio; $3.50 minimum.

The Cafe Bohemia is launching its switch from a jazz policy to regular acts with a solid show. The talent lineup is on a par with that offered by the more established intime bistros in the New York area and the room itself is comfortable.

The Bohemia, in Greenwich Village, is a short distance away from the defunct Cafe Society Downtown. With its entry into the regular act class, it brings to three the number of Village spots with similar-styled entertainment. The other two are the Bon Soir and No 1 Fifth Ave.

Working out at the spot after being absent from the New York scene for a while are impressionist Arthur Blake and singer Thelma Carpenter. They're both top-drawer. Rounding out the bill nicely are singer Dino Fitzgerald, who's reviewed under New Acts, and the Don Forbes Trio.

Blake's material, frequently risque, is generally funny and sometimes possibly a little too tradey for the average customer. His mimicry covers a flock of celebs and several offbeat items such as a "Baby Doll" takeoff that's a strong yock-puller, but would never get a Legion of Decency okay.

Miss Carpenter, who does a nifty song-selling job, enhances her stint with an informal and personable delivery that takes in some between-tunes chatter. She delivers some of her numbers sitting on the edge of the stage and the effect is good. Her song spread, for which she occasionally uses a mike, covers such items as "Cry Me a River," "If I Could Be With You," "Something to Live For," "I Could Have Danced All Night" and "Harlem on My Mind."

Besides backing the acts, the Don Forbes Trio takes the spotlight on its own for a pleasantly melodic session. Forbes also does an okay job in the vocal department. Incidentally, the maitre d' handled by Carl Lee (son of the late actor, Canada Lee) who recently finished a lengthy road tour in "No Time for Sergeants."

Colony, London

London, Oct. 8.

Barry Sisters (2), Felix King and Santiago Orchs.; $5.50 minimum.

The Barry Sisters are an amiable vocal team whose material is substantially helped by fancy and diverting arrangements. They're an attractive duo, strikingly gowned in red sheath-like dresses, and work together with just a shade too much precision.

This is their first London date and once they've settled down it should be a successful engagement. On the show caught, the act was on the longish side, running to about 35 minutes; elimination of one or two of the weaker entries would provide an effective trim and hypo the overall effect. Their routine starts with a cute introductory number appropriately titled "My Sister" and the best items included a racy calypso, "Man is for the Woman Made" and a Japanese-style interpretation of "Making Whoopee." "Take it Easy Boys" lacks the piquancy suggested by the title.

Felix King, now back on the dais after a vacation, gives the gals handsome treatment by always being on top of the music. The two house combos take full care of the dance time. Myro.

Steuben's, Boston

Boston, Oct. 9.

Danny Dillon, Jenny Collins, Los Rivieras, Don Dennis, Tony Bruno Orch (5); $2.50 minimum.

Danny Dillon registers solidly with patrons of Joe & Max Schneider's theatrical boite. On for 40 minutes, he nabbed three encores opening night (9) headlining a nicely paced Jack Mandell booked show in for two frames. Dillon has the customers pleading for more after a sock round of impresh bits ranging from "Mr. Magoo" and film cartoon characters to Elvis Presley. He opens with a slick Hollywood schooldays routine in which he carbons James Stewart, Frankie Laine and Vaughn Monroe.

One of his best bits, on which he draws heavy mitting, is a takeoff on Bing Crosby. The personable blonde tux-clad singing impressionist has a sock routine will all the film cartoon laughmakers. "Bugs Bunny," "Doc," "Porky Pig," etc. He segues to a Jimmy Durante impresh, then pipes "Bill Bailey" in Eddie Jackson fashion. He has a piping stint on "This Old House" in which he mimicks a considerable number of sound effects from wind to rain for big hand. From takeoff on Charlie Weaver and the Jack Paar show, he goes to rock 'n' roll with three Presley bits, complete with sideburns and GI hat. Windup is "Don't Step On My GI Shoes" a la Presley in the Army.

Jenny Collins, in pale pink strapless bouffant gown of nylon net with sequins and a tiara atop her black hair, looks regal as she pipes a rousing songalog in fine soprano voice. She's slick with "I Could Have Danced," fiery with a gypsy love song, and whams over "Sorrento" for big returns. She throws in "Volare" in cute style, windsup with boff "One Fine Day." Don Dennis, singing emcee, brings a new number to the room where he registers fave, and goes over big with "Dance, Everyone Dance" and encores with a dramatic "Fernando's Hideaway." Los Rivieras, two lads and a femme, terp some torrid Latin rhythms. Black-haired femme scores solidly in symbolic terp bit with two partners and in jitterbug windup in which she twirls bits with each partner ending with turnover spin. Tony Bruno cuts the show in nice style. This layout exits Oct. 22; Marge Cameron opens Oct. 23. Guy.

El Rancho, Las Vegas

Vic Damone, Lili St. Cyr, Hal Loman & Playmates (3), Dick Rice Orch (14); $3 minimum.

After an admiring glance in the direction of where Lili St. Cyr had just finished her artistic undulation, Vic Damone got yocks from first-nighters—and he almost broke up—because his first two songs were "I Love All of You" and "I've Got It Bad and That Ain't Good." He cracked, "Maybe I should change these songs around—let's do 'The Star Spangled Banner!'"

Damone's voice is bigger and better than ever in this turn. He seems relaxed, and he sells like a vet showman. The pacing is good as he smoothly sings such as "Cheek to Cheek," "I've Got You Under My Skin," "Someone To Watch Over You," "World On A String," "They Can't Take That Away From Me," "Street Where You Live," "Fascinatin' Rhythm," "Gigi," "Two Left Feet" and "Arrivederci Roma," latter being a dramatic standout rewarded with warm mitting. Bob Smale, piano; Artie Anton, drums; and Bob Morgan, guitar, are strong assistants, and the Dick Rice orch (14) capably coordinates.

Miss St. Cyr's act is called "A Night In Tangiers," which again displays the exotic in bedroom and bath. The beautiful stripper still has one of the most gorgeous figures on any stage.

Hal Loman & His Playmates (Loman and two girl terpers) is a dance act of the loftiest quality, well executed in all departments, and staged with imagination. For this four-week attraction, there is no regular line. Duke.

Ambassador Hotel, L. A.

Guy Lombardo Orch (12), Jackie Kannon, The Petticoates (3). $2-$2.50 cover.

The LP'ingest band in show biz and reputedly the four brothers who gave MCA their first real importance as bookers of orchestras are back in the Grove after a 10-year absence spent mostly in Manhattan's Roosevelt hotel as in the years before. That the passing years (ringsider Norman Siegel said he danced to Guy Lombardo's music in Cleveland 33 years ago) may have blunted their nitery appeal but not their musicianly skill is readily apparent because of the changing styles in music. The opener of a three-week stand Wednesday (8) caught only half a house and scarce few of the Hollywood crowd.

The Lombardo music still flows soft and silky from the sax section, which brought the band to acclaim, but the two pianos get most of spotlight bask. There's a strong output from the brass, too, but the tempo rarely gets too hurried for the cover slifters. From the Lombardos they expect a relaxed stimulation of their nethers and the massed shuffle becomes about as spirited as Perry Como trading gags with a guest. But the floor was packed and that's what dance bands are for.

The Lombardo name in lights will account for its own particular draw but whether the remainder of the show will pull of its own weight is questionable. Jackie Kannon, a flip standup comic, has been around the night spots and after a slow start he "reaches" the sitters to bag a good quota of laughs. A trio of femme singers called the Petticoats (Mary & Bea House and Margie Hirth) match their voices to good effect and give promise of making their mark in a field not too crowded presently. As with the McGuire Sisters, to whom they conjured comparisons, they diversified with instruments for a fast banjoing of "Bill Bailey."

The Lombardos, who take the beat from brother Guy—Carmen, Liebert and Victor—are still the key men and Carmen sends up a vocal of his own composition. Kenny Gardner carries the bulk of the vocals with an assist from Bill Flanagan. Next booking brings Carol Channing into the Grove with Freddy Martin's orch.

Shoreham, Wash.

Washington, Oct. 7.

Vaughn Monroe, The Hamilton Boys (3), Al Donahue Orch (10); $2 cover.

Vaughn Monroe seems to make his living easily. In Washington, where he has established himself as one of the most popular nitery draws, he exhibits no particular use of energy in voicing favorites everyone likes.

But while Monroe and his relaxed masculine manner of putting across the moon and swoon tunes appears effortless, the result has its impact. On opening night in the Shoreham Hotel Blue Room, his act was interrupted and midway by a former femme member of Congress, now a widow, who rushed up to kiss him full on the lips.

Monroe plugged his new record, "Ten Chaperones," which went weakly, plus many songs which have proved strong for him, like "Sound Off," "Ballerina," "Tangerine" and "Racing With the Moon" (in a town where the current emphasis is a race to the moon). But the crowd liked even better such numbers as "The Girl That I Marry" and "Home on the Range."

By coincidence, opening night was his birthday (noted by maestro Al Donahue) and his capacity audience didn't want him to stop singing. He does a one-stand nightly, and repeated encores kept him before the mike for an hour and 10 minutes. Finally, he snuffed further demands by inviting everyone to dance to his last number. He had a similar set of experiences when in the Blue Room last spring. He's well liked there.

Monroe has a trio, the Hamilton Boys, with special material to support him. Even with mike trouble, they added to the show. The Ximinez-Vargas Ballet Espanol group follow him Oct. 16: Carp.

Black Orchid, Chi

Chicago Oct. 10.

Phil Foster, Dr. Arthur Ellen, Joe Parnello Trio; $1.50 cover.

What with a discourteous party or two and a persistent tipsy heckler, Phil Foster couldn't have had it rougher for his preem (10) in this smallery if someone had planned it that way. Comic showed not only much patience but some nifty squelching talent for bonus yocks. In the story vein, he roped 'em nicely with an "account" of his trip here by car, then doubled 'em with impreshes of Catskill resort types.

Tablers are naturally alert to hear his Brooklyn boyhood revivals, and Foster wisely doesn't disappoint. Bit, seemed to miss the usual gusty reaction at the opener, however, but it's likely the ill-mannered outfronters may have taken the edge off it. Comic also has an okay takeoff on Latin band chirps that might be enhanced for more returns.

Hyponotist Dr. Arthur Ellen, on fourth stand here, shows himself as crafty and slick as ever, though outing caught didn't favor him with an ideal selection of subjects. Leadoff is the blackboard routine, with customers calling out numbers and items to fit boxes for an impressive memory demonstration. Hypnosis of volunteers follows the formula, but Ellen could beef it with a gimmick or two and some more laughs. Hypnosis may be a true science, but showmanship first if it's via a theatre or nitery. Show's in for two weeks, and runs to 80 minutes—a mite too long for all talk and no song.

Joe Parnello house trio ably gives brief assist to both acts, and offers fine entr'acte jazz. Phil Ford & Mimi Hines plus Sallie Blair come in Oct. 24. Pit.

Dunes, Las Vegas

Las Vegas, Oct. 9.

"Folies International," Tempest Storm, Norton & Patricia, Tommy (Moe) Raft, Irving Benson, Murray Briscoe, Vicki Denas, Marilyn Dann, Samy Bros, (2), Sharon Randal, Alan Roberts, Barbara Esko, Minsky Models & Dancers (31), Cee Davidson Orch (11); produced by Harold Minsky; stage director Eddie Lynch; $3 minimum.

The new edition of Harold Minsky's show is called "Folies International. Like his previous offerings at the Dunes, it's a fast & funny frolic, typically Minsky in that it seems to have a little bit of everything and a lot of beautiful girls (31) including 11 in the bare-breasted category. It's a show that's sure to keep the Arabian Room packed, even during this "slow" season.

Tempest Storm headlines, and this time she's seen in a new act staged by Bob Sidney which shows off her exciting "exotic dancing" to best effect. In a lavish bedroom setting, she removes her clothes in a manner appropriately naughty.

Like in most burlesque-type revues, the comedians steal the show—and this time it's Irving Benson and Tommy (Moe) Raft who walk off with the yocks. They make ancient skits as funny as ever, are ably assisted by Murray Briscoe and Vicki Denas. Also getting laughs are some well-trained English sheepdogs in a clever act called "Excess Baggage." Terp team of Norton & Patricia score with a neat impresh of dancers on a music box; the Samy Bros. (2) show unusual skill as one juggles the other with his feet; ballerina Barbara Esko is refreshing as she moves with real class; Duke.

Montreal, Oct. 10.

Tony Bennett (with Ralph Sharon Trio), Gary Morton, Joy Dancers (4), Wally Aspell Nick Martin Orch (11), Three Keys with Ann Summers; $1.50 cover.

Three-act shows with headliners and sizable budgets mean biz for El Morocco these days and current layout with Tony Bennett is no exception. Bennett, always a fave in Montreal, continues to wow with a songalog that is diversified, neatly paced and casual to a point of almost losing his audience at times. This attitude, reaching its zenith with some one such as Perry Como, can be a risky commodity in the hands of lesser singers, but Bennett knows just when to come back. Working with the solid backing of Ralph Sharon and an enlarged Nick Martin orch plus split-second timing of a single spotlight, Bennett belts an item like "Just In Time" and then dramatizes "Without a Song" for okay mitting.

Over-generous almost to a fault with the songs offered, Bennett takes time out to let his bongo drummer, Candido, take the floor with a mighty fine session and then smoothly works back into a song. There's no milking with Bennett and no unnecessary gabbing about his past hits or future waxings—"soon to be released"—which is refreshing.

Prior to Bennett's 40-minute smash is the comedy of Gary Morton, back in Montreal after a five-year absence. Morton brings back a great deal of new material and still highlights with his impresh bits which are standout because of the offbeat ideas. The Joy dancers, three femmes and a male, appear at the opening and midway marks and apeal visually. House emcee Wally Aspell with his usual enthusiasm does a song or two and Newt.

Beverly Hills, Cincy

Cincinnati, Oct. 10.

Alan King, Helene Aimee, Lindsay-Sapphire Dancers (9); Bill Raymond, Gardner Benedict Orch (10), Jimmy Wilber Trio, Larry Vincent; $3 minimum, $4 Sat.

Greeted like a long lost son in his first Greater Cincy exposure, Alan King hits high on the entertainment meter in this fortnight's layout at swank Beverly Hills on the Kentucky side of the Ohio River. The dapper and dynamic comic, on a brief visit from a lengthy stay in England, is supported by chirp Helene Aimee, also a newcomer, and the bistro's Lindsay-Sapphire line and band directed by Gardner Benedict.

Sticking to a Yankee Doodle fun pattern, with nary a note of British accent, King rattles the walls with yocks over a goodly part of 35 minutes. His material is fresh and clean and for the most part satires goings-on in the average household. Pins barbs on the beloved wife and kids, tv soap, horse and gangster operas and home and family problems.

Miss Aimee apparently was hindered by ailing pipes at the opening session. Billed as a Benida record'ng star, the flaming redhead's numbers include "Put Me Papoa" and "Love For Sale" in English and three songs in foreign tongues. Koll.

Hotel Muehlebach, K. C.

Rowan & Martin, Larry Green Orch (8); $1-$1.50 cover.

Early in their careers as a comedy team Dan Rowan & Dick Martin played Kansas City, albeit at another spot. Now more than four years later they are back and have pretty well spanned night clubs and hotels, have a motion picture to their credit, and a network tv show coming up. They've acquired considerable polish and upgraded their material along the way until their half-hour or so is satirically packed and makes a happy entertainment session for the Terrace Grill patrons.

Generally, Rowan plays it straight with Martin as his bumbling, carefree foil, breaking up a serious attempt at Shakespeare with skilled heckling, twisting up his partner's psychology on femmes and ruining a vocal attempt on "Old Man River." They have a sequence well adapted to their talents as they satirize an evening on tv—the fights, the westerns, the commercials, etc. Much of their laughs come from sight gags, especially Martin downing four bottles of beer during the show (every performance).

They maintain the satirical plane throughout, with a bit of sophistication contrasting with some broader interludes. keep away from the off-color, and hold the pace steady. 16. Quin.

As the first new musical of the season, "Goldilocks" hardly explodes with a bang. With reportedly large theatre party bookings and the absence of new song-and-dance competition, the show should keep the luxurious Lunt-Fontanne Theatre lighted for a considerable spell. It won't cause a boom for the ticket brokers, however. The production reportedly cost over $300,000.

"Goldilocks" is, the Walter and Jean Kerr show. At least that's the way it's generally referred to in the trade. Walter Kerr is the legit critic of the N. Y. Herald Tribune and his wife, besides being the author of the bestselling "Please Don't Eat the Daisies," has written or collaborated with her husband on various shows, including "King of Hearts," and a couple of previous musicals.

The Kerrs have supplied the book for "Goldilocks" and collaborated with John Ford on the lyrics, and Walter has staged the production. The music is by Leroy Anderson, his first legit assignment. The dances and musical numbers have been directed by Agnes de Mille, and are her best Broadway work in some years. The excessively elaborate scenery is by Peter Larkin and the over-dressily handsome costumes by Castillo. Robert Whitehead's production is presented by the Producers Theatre, their first venture with a musical.

Don Ameche and Elaine Stritch are costarred in the yarn about a shoestring movie producer of the nickelodeon days and the Pearl White-like actress he bamboozles into being the workhorse heroine of his quickie epics. Some of the shooting scenes are laughable, especially a pioneer western sequence and a grandiloquent Egyptian ceremony, but they tend to be repetitions of a single idea and are incidental to the main story line.

There are an unusual number of dialog laughs, mostly in the quiet, throwaway style of the authors and not of the slam-bang sort to convulse a Broadway musical audience. Essentially, however, the book is the thin and uncomfortable element in the show.

Miss de Mille's ballets are excellent and pleasantly varied in flavor, although possible a trifle lengthy, and her staging of the musical numbers has professional gloss. There are several fairly good songs, including "Save a Kiss," "No One'll Ever Love You," "Shall I Take My Heart and Go?" and an almost certain number for disking by pop singers, a lament titled "I Never Know When." But passable songs are one thing and audience-rousers are quite another, and "Goldilocks" is painfully lacking in a real powerhouse musical number.

Don Ameche, who took over the top-starring role of the flicker producer during the tryout tour, succeeding Barry Sullivan, who had succeeded Ben Gazzara just before the start of rehearsals, has welcome animation and presence. But he lacks the kind of galvanizing drive that might overwhelm an audience and carry a show. He sings proficiently and acts acceptably, if with a somewhat disconcerting air of detachment.

Elaine Stritch is visually attractive as the actress who relinquishes her ambition of marrying for social position and financial security in favor of stringing along with the infant film biz. She handles the Kerrs' brand of casual jokes with offhand deftness and sings well, being particularly impressive with "I Never Know When." But she, too, seems only vaguely interested in the love story, and as with Ameche, hasn't bulldozer power.

Russell Nype is warm and disarming as the society Croesus who almost marries the actress but who merely bails out the producer and prepares to make do with a palpitating non-show bizzer. He sings agreeably enough and actually seems to be thinking of what he's saying. Pat Stanley registers effectively if not sensationally as the girl who yearns for the producer but learns to accept the rich man. She clicks as a dancing comedienne, and just about ekes by as a singer.

Margaret Hamilton scores as the standard musical comedy character woman, Nathaniel Frey is okay in the straight scenes as an incorruptibly devoted cameraman, but seems to force the comedy scenes and numbers, and there are the customary assortment of journeymen clowns, stooges, singers and dancers.

Kerr has staged the proceedings with what appears to be the proper amount of invention and propulsion, although there isn't quite the maximum degree of pandemonium in the movie shooting sequences. All in all, "Goldilocks" has a promising idea and some funny stuff, but lacks a knockout punch.

Drink to Me Only

George Ross Gn association with John Robert Lloyd) production of three-act (six scenes) comedy by Abram S. Features Tom Poston, Paul Hartman, Cameron Prud'homme, John McGiver, Royal Beal, Sherry Britton, Jack Gilford, Leona Powers, Georgann Johnson. If a couple of very funny scenes made a show, "Drink to Me Only" would be the new Broadway comedy smash. But this Abram S. Ginnes and Ira Wallach farce doesn't sustain as a full evening. In fact, it just about collapses in the third act, and ends as a dud.

If there's not enough of a play for Broadway standards there's hardly sufficient for a picture, and it's hard to figure how the piece could be expanded more than it already has been. That leaves television, for which it might provide a convulsing half-hour, and of course "stock."

The whole comedy is based on a gimmick idea about how, in order to defend a client charged with wife-shooting, a young lawyer tries to prove that it's possible to drink two bottles of whiskey during a 12-hour period and then argue the case in court. In perhaps the most brilliant comedy performance the masterful George Abbott has ever staged, the attorney not only gets hilariously ossified but also manages to shake down his domineering boss for $100,000 and becomes a member of the law firm, with billing above the other two partners.

The courtroom scene immediately following also opens uproariously, but it's essentially an elaboration of the same drunk routine, and it's continued after the humor has been exhausted. The final scene has approximately as much bounce as a morning-after.

As indicated, Abbott's direction glistens with superb economy, drive and tempo. Especially in the expertly pyramided invention of the long second-act souse scene, this hysterical hubdub builds to a peak of frenzy.

As the dutiful-beyond-the-call-of-Blackstone lawyer, Tom Poston is side-splitting, and there are varyingly amusing supporting performances by such knockabout comics as John McGiver (who has the appearance — and sound — of an aggrieved moose, but is occasionally unintelligible), Cameron Prud'homme and John Beal as the harrassed legalites. Paul Hartman as the cheerfully daffy defendant, Jack Gilford as a bemused medical expert, Truman Smith as the tolerant-as-Job judge, Leona Powers as the attentive witness of the liquor consumption, and Georgann Johnson, Sherry Britton, Undine Forrest and Diana Millay as visual assets.

John Robert Lloyd, besides being associated with pressagent George Ross in the production, has designed three divertingly flossy sets and Julia Sze has provided eye-catching costumes. But even in a less cavernous house than the renovated and newly renamed 54th Street (formerly Adelphi) Theatre, "Drink to Me Only" would probably be too sketchy for Broadway.

Concert Reviews

Little Orchestra Society

(Thomas Scherman)

Thomas Scherman, son of the Book-of-the-Month Club tycoon, has for some years been providing New York with interesting and obscure musical curios. For the start of his Little Orchestra Society's 12th season Monday (6) he performed the masque "Comus," with a text by John Milton and music by the 18th-century English composer, Thomas Arne.

From a musical standpoint, the performance was a hit. Arne seems to have been the Dick Rodgers of his time, and his writings were abundant, including scores for masques, operas, songs, odes, sonatas and incidental music for plays, including works by Shakespeare. His melodies are tuneful, filled with flowing lines and pleasing to the ear. The arias lack drama and variety in content, but they are a joy to hear, particularly when warbled by the cast of singers Scherman assembled for the occasion.

As dramatic fare, "Comus" did not fare so well, though the narration and the spoken lines were declaimed with fervor and intensity. The text is filled with glorious Miltonian prose, but the tale simply does not interest the contemporary mind. At no time were the proceedings dull, but the lift of the performance was provided in the naive charm and simplicity of the Arne score.

Veteran soprano Dorothy Maynor, who has not been heard here often in recent years, incited a brief interruption in the proceedings with her stunning performance. Appearing near the very end, Miss Maynor sang her long and difficult arias with clarity and beauty. It took courage on Scherman's part (and imagination) to cast this half-forgotten star of pre-World War II days, and he was rewarded with an exhibition of superior vocal gymnastics that won the heart and plaudits of the capacity house.

Laurel Hurley, John McCollum, Laura Castellano, Max Adrian and others in the cast performed with distinction. The orchestra, conducted 18th century fashion by Scherman from the harpsichord, was first-rate.

Anna Russell

London, Oct. 7.

New York's Anna Russell packed the Royal Festival Hall on the opening date of a British tour of one nighters, wowing her audience with 110 minutes of musical mimicry, wit and polished professionalism.

The first half was devoted to devastating observations in a song recital which took in the varying styles of a choir boy, an amateur lieder singer, a prima donna, etc. Miss Russell is ably accompanied at the piano by Eugene Rankin.

Her lecture on the bagpipes and a potted version of "The Ring of The Nibelungs," scored the biggest success of the evening. Seated at the piano, she demonstrated perfect timing and amazing mimicry while ridiculing and simplifying concert traits. British loved her.

Inside Stuff—Legit

A story from London in last week's issue reported that Wendy Craig, imported to repeat her original West End performance in the Broadway production of "Epitaph for George Dillion," has a contract for only eight weeks, including the four-week tryout tour and four weeks in New York, commented that some years ago Vivien Leigh had a deal for only three months on Broadway.

Morton Gottlieb, who was company manager for "Edward, My Son" during the 1948-49 season, points out that Peggy Ashcroft's costarring contract in that show provided for eight weeks' appearance, including the five-performance tryout in New Haven and seven weeks in New York. She was subsequently succeeded by Adrienne Allen.

John Gielgud, who for years has had a standing invitation to star in the Stratford, Ont., Shakespeare Festival, wants to—but not in Shakespeare. So he told Sydney Johnson, Montreal Star's theatre critic, after the one-night teeoff of his North American tour in "Shakespeares Ages of Man" in the Stratford Festival Theatre. He'd like to do "Cyrano de Bergerac" if he can get a new adaptation from Christopher Fry. He says he has already played all the Shakespearean roles he is young enough to play, and is tired of them.

Contract of the Coast company of "Auntie Mame" with the Louis R. Lurie-operated Geary Theatre, Frisco, calls for 60 house seats nightly to go to general manager Ben F. Stein, instead of 60 pairs as reported in the Oct. 1 issue. Also, typewritten in the contract is a clause giving 100 opening-night house seats to Stein, on top of which he asked for another 150, as was reported. All negotiations were by long-distance phone, as Stein was not in Frisco for the confabs.

Baltimore, Oct. 13.

David Merrick & Joshua Logan production of three-act (four scenes) drama by John Osborne and Anthony Creighton. Staging, William Gaskill; scenery, Stepneh Doncaster, supervised by Ralph Alswang; costume supervision, Helène Pons. Stars Eileen Herlie, Robert Stephens; features Alison Leggatt. At Ford's Theatre, Baltimore, Oct. 13, '58; $4.98 top.

If playgoers who kept John Osborne's "Look Back in Anger" alive on Broadway for a healthy spell are still in the mood for "Angry Young Men" who spout bitterly and endlessly about everything from sex to religion, "Epitaph for George Dillon" should be their dish. The hero of the drama is a blood relation to the Jimmy Porter of "Anger." Dillon is an actor-playwright, an "artist" with not too much to show but ample to say for himself. At least the talk is forceful and articulate.

Dillon plants himself on a British middleclass family that wallows in the kind of bourgoise things that are repugnant to him but worthy of his most inspired ridicule. An arrant opportunist, he feigns sincerity, gratitude and mediocrity to keep himself close to the hands that feed him. To Ruth, the aunt, played expertly by Eileen Herlie, he is most revealing, and it is when these two hold the stage, that co-authors Osborne and Anthony Creighton are most theatrically effective.

Comprising the family in addition to Ruth are the mother, who invites George to live with them, her scorned husband, and their two dimwit daughters, one a looker and the other a frump. The father thinks George is worthless, the aunt tries to see him for what he is, one daughter is impressed by him and the other unimpressed by anything. Conversation gallops along until George is told he has TB, one of the daughters becomes pregnant with his child, the aunt moves out and Dillon is trapped as part of the mediocrity he has been decrying.

"Dillon" should be satisfying to playgoers who like their comedy-drama on the intellectual side. It's not an action play, for dialog is the thing, and Osborne and Creighton come through with some biting, entertaining, sometimes brilliant and almost always interesting lines.

There are dull patches here and there when the talk stops, but these are few and serve as breathers. The acting is superb, with Miss Herlie and title player Robert Stephens taking first honors. Alison Leggatt, as the mother, provides most of the laugh lines and does well by them. The others are not to be ignored, particularly James Valentine as the religious man who's a target for Dillon, and Felix Deeband as a theatrical producer.

An irritating aspect of the show, particularly to patrons in the rear of the house, is director William Gaskill; frequent way of having the players read their lines while facing upstage. This is especially difficult as the British accents already have spectators on edge in an effort to understand all that is being said.

The single set by Stephen Doncaster has the right note of drabness, and the lighting and costumes seem appropriate.

Crazy October

New Haven, Oct. 8.

Walter Starcke presentation of three-act comedy by James Leo Herlihy. Stars Tallulah Bankhead; features Joan Blondell, Estelle Winwood, Jack Weston, Collin Wilcox, Fred Beir, J. Frank Lucas. Staging, Herlihy; scenery, Ben Edwards; costumes, Alvin Colt. At Shubert Theatre, New Haven, Oct. 8, '58; $4.80 top.

Dorrie Cotton ..... Collin Wilcox
Daisy Filbertson.....Tallulah Bankhead
Rudy Filgertson ..... Jack Weston
Thelma ..... Joan Blondell
Boyd ..... Fred Beir
Charlie ..... J. Frank Lucas
Miz Annabel Cotton.....Estelle Winwood

This is a weirdie. It has an actual skeleton in a closet, an assortment of unusual characters, and a pratfall by Tallulah Bankhead in an angel costume. It adds up to an incongruous piece of stagecraft and, subject to smart doctoring, is a questionable bet for Broadway.

"Crazy October" is located in a roadside inn near a small coal-mining ghost town. Owner of the spot dominates everyone she contacts until her not-so-bright son uncovers a family skeleton that brings the mother up on the short end of the rope, and everybody walks out on her. The role of the inn proprietor could be interesting when it is developed, but its potentialities have not yet been fully realized. However, the actress does okay with what she has.

Joan Blondell, playing a heart-of-gold prostie, maintains pleasant contact with the audience. Estelle Winwood's version of a hypochondriac widow is excellent. Collin Wilcox as a smalltown girl experiencing her first touch of love, and Fred Beir as the personable lad responsible for it, make a worthy team. J. Frank Lucas scores in a brief appearance as an also-ran suitor. Jack Weston gives a knowing interpretation of a lightweight mentality.

Ben Webster's single set of the inn lunchroom is appropriately commonplace and the Alvin Colt costumes, with exception of the prostie's classy wardrobe, are appserviceable. The author's staging is coherent to a degree, but reflects his own scripting uncertainty as to proper approach.

Although Jose Ferrer gets an ovation for his title performance in "Edwin Booth," the Milton Geiger drama doesn't impress as much of a vehicle. It is trying out at the Huntington Hartford Theatre here, prior to San Francisco and ultimately Broadway.

The piece tends to be a series of sketches covering 42 years of the famous tragedian's life, and although it is theatrical and at times moving, it lacks dramatic form and cohesion.

Geiger has laid much of the continuing exposition in the hands of a narrator, and while the words are compelling and often humorous, the device doesn't maintain pace. The frequent play-within-a-play interludes of Shakespeare are

USSR Envoy Succeeds Sherm Adams; As Steady D.C. Legit Patron, That Is

By LES CARPENTER

Washington, Oct. 14.

It has picked up an exotic alternate, however. This new name theatre enthusiast on the Washington scene is the Russian ambassador, Mikhail Menshikov. He is locally dubbed "Mikey the Smiling Marxist" because of his affable politeness, in contrast to his Soviet predecessors.

Menshikov showed up at the National Theatre a few nights ago for "The Man in the Dog Suit," and, according to others nearby, found it highly amusing. It was his first comedy at the National, although he has attended several dramas, including "Long Day's Journey Into Night" and others, since his arrival in Washington last spring.

While the number of officials, both foreign and domestic, who attend the local theatre regularly is not especially large, Adams was among the group. U. S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Earl Warren is the highest ranking official who is an almost invariable ticket purchaser.

Adams' faithful attendance at National opening nights was not interrupted on the evening that President Eisenhower was taken to the hospital with an ileitis attack. Adams had tickets that night and used them, checking on the President's condition by a lobby telephone at intermission.

Most VIPs showing up at the National and Shubert are occasional theatregoers as guests in parties given by local society leaders buying blocks of seats. Presi-

Herb Rogers Switching To Name Policy for His Chi Barns Next Summer

Chicago, Oct. 14.

Strawhat producer Herb Rogers, citing the scarcity of hit shows for the silos in recent years, says he will subordinate plays to stars next summer. He even may present two weeks of vaudeville at his Music Theatre in Highland Park, Ill.

"There is room for that in summer theatre," he suggests. "We may even do a minstrel show too. This way we'd save on costumes, royalties, ensemble, choreography, scenery and like expenses, but would have a big name as draw."

The Tenthouse, a straight play theatre which Rogers also owns, will disband its resident company of the past 10 years in favor of a star policy in 1959. First gesture in this direction was made at Tenthouse this last summer, when Hal March was booked for a week in "Hole In the Head."

With four other barns in this area offering names, the Tenthouse has had a struggle getting much publicity Rogers has also found that customers want a firstclass headliner, regardless the play, for their $3.40 admission.

Both these developments, he believes, arise from the fact that Broadway does not produce enough smash comedies, the shows that have been the lifeblood of summer theatres in the past. "Any of the big ones we can get," he points out, "become available only after their Broadway glory has faded and usually after the film companies have disposed of them."

'Plume' Cast Planes In; Something for Prudes

The original cast of "La Plume de ma Tante" arrived in New York from Europe yesterday (Tues) aboard the Queen Mary prior to beginning a two-week pre-Broadway tryout run in the show at the Forrest Theatre, Philadelphia. British producer Jack Hylton, who's co-sponsoring the Broadway presentation with David Merrick and Joseph Kipness, preceded the company by plane.

Tradesters, who saw the revue overseas, are speculating as to how the bluenoses will react to a sketch in which Robert Dhery, who heads the troupe, is trapped in a French-style public toilet.

Haeussermann Will Head Vienna's Burg Theatre

Vienna, Oct. 7.

Ernst Haeussermann will take over as head of the Burg Theatre, the leading German-language house here, next Sept. 1. The present management continues until then, but Haeussermann, who comanages the Theatre in der Josefstadt, the Kammerspiele and the Little Josefstadt, will soon take an active part in the Burg operation. Dr. Karl Haertl remains as general manager of all state theatres.

Incidentally, Haeussermann's wife, Susie Nicoletti, is a member of the Burg Theatre company.

'Garden District' Recoups, London

London, Oct. 14.

"Garden District," currently in its fifth week at the Arts Theatre here, earned back its investment after only a fortnight at the house. The production, capitalized at around $5,600, cost about $3,000 to open. It's slated to remain at the Arts at least one more week and then may move to a West End house.

The Tennessee Williams double-bill, presented locally by Jerry Leider, John C. Wilson and Toby Rowland, Ltd., opened Sept. 16. Patricia Neal, who was costarred with Beatrix Lehmann, exited the cast last Sunday (12) to fulfill a commitment in the upcoming Broadway production of "Far Away the Train Birds Cry." She's been succeeded by Margo Johns.

Another edition of "District," is scheduled for Oct. 28 at the Ivar Theatre, Los Angeles, with Cathleen Nesbitt starring. Herbert Machiz, who directed the original off-Broadway company and the London version, will ditto on the Coast entry, in which Sylvia Stone and Olive Deering will repeat the roles they played off-Broadway.

45G FORD FUND GRANT FOR LEGIT DIRECTORS

The Ford Foundation has made another grant for legit. Following up earlier allotments for the development of actors and playwrights, the fund has now given the nod to directors. A three-year program of director-observerships is being financed by a $45,000 grant to the New Dramatists Committee.

The project calls for the expenditure of $15,000 annually to cover the subsistence expenses for up to five qualified stagers to observe the development of Broadway plays by a similar number of leading directors. Applications for consideration under the grant are to be made directly to George Hamlin, executive director of the New Dramatists.

Glasgow, Oct. 14.

As a step toward insuring the continuation of the live theatre in Scotland, television executives have estiblished a fund for the support of legit repertory companies. An initial donation of $15,000 has been made by Roy Thomson, head of the local-based Scottish Television Ltd.

Struggling repertory groups here and in Edinburgh Perth, Dundee and Pitlochly will be eligible for grants from the fund, and other outfits may also be helped from time to time. The grants are to be used only for capital expenditure. However, the tv companies also plan to assist the legiters by using stage players in video shows.

Sets and costumes for the upcoming off-Broadway production of "Diversions" will be designed, respectively, by William Strom and Charles Hanford. Carl Davis is musical director.

In the opera vein, five works are contemplated for the 1959 season, including a preem of "Giulietta," by Heimo Erbse.

Pitt CLO Quitting Stadium for '59; Competing Tent?

Pittsburgh, Oct. 14.

Civic Light Opera Assn., after its worst financial beating in 13 years of outdoor operation at the Pitt Stadium, announced last week that it would not be back at the same stand next summer. The group is considering a tent as an interim project until completion of the projected Civic Auditorium downtown, with a movable steel roof. That will hardly be before season of 1961, or even later.

CLOA heads haven't decided whether to go under canvas next year. Meanwhile, however, David M. Holtzman, a New York attorney who manages the South Shore Melody Tent at Cohasset, Mass., announced plans for a tunetent next summer at Murrysville, about 15 miles from downtown Pittsburgh.

Through his local spokesman, Lawrence Carra, of the Carnegie Tech Drama School faculty, who has been directing shows for the last two seasons at Cohasset, Holtzman said his tent would seat 2,000 and have parking space for 700 cars. Corporate name will be the Pittsburgh Music Theatre and the release said the project will be controlled by an unspecified group of local professional and business men.

In the past, canvas operations had been considered several times, but were dropped because nobody wanted to buck the outdoor civic enterprise at the Stadium. The CLOA project has been a steady loser at the Stadium, with deficits made up by private guarantors and business firms. This summer was the worst yet, however, with the rainy weather playing havoc at the boxoffice.

MAKES B'WAY ROUNDS DURING EUROPE TOUR

Making the Broadway rounds during the summer can be a long distance proposition, even extending as far as Europe.

By hopping overseas during the warm-weather months, actors are virtually assured of meeting the people they normally would contact in New York, during the active fall and winter months. That, at least, is the conclusion of Chris Gampel, who stretched an approximate month-long Israeli stay in the Broadway production of "The Firstborn" into a three-month European tour.

Illustrating his point, Gampel notes that while visiting London he met about 15 agents and directors, having previously bumped into stager Elia Kazan during a one-week stay in Athens. However, there's a wrinkle to Gampel's Atlantic hop. The transportation cost, which most actors might find prohibitive, was covered by the "The Firstborn" management. All Gampel had to do was arrange with El Al Israel Airlines to extend his overseas stay beyond the windup of show's Israel engagement.

TV Scripter Eugene Vale Authors Play and Novel

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Eugene Vale, who quit tv scripting to write a play and a novel, has connected with both. The play, "The Fragile Titans," has been optioned by scenic designer-producer Jo Mielziner for Broadway presentation, possibly next Spring or the following season.

The book, "The Thirteenth Apostle," will be published by Scribner's.

Mixed Press on 'Goldilocks' Rebuts Perennial Critics' Logrolling Charges

The critical reception of "Goldilocks" is causing the usual palaver about reviewer logrolling in legit circles this week. Any time a drama critic gets involved on the nether side of the footlights, between-the-line interpretation of reviews becomes the trade sport-of-the-week.

"Goldilocks," of course, is the new musical comedy for which the N. Y. Herald Tribune's regular drama critic, Walter Kerr, has been director, co-author of the book with his wife, Jean Kerr, and for which the Kerrs have collaborated on lyrics with Joan Ford.

Recent shows affording opportunities for similar chatter have been the late Wolcott Gibbs' "Season In the Sun," and another Kerr family collaboration, "King of Hearts" (she as co-author, he as stager). On both those shows, there was some assertion that the aisle-sitters were cozily careful with their confrere's handiwork. Perhaps significantly, however, both "Season" and "Hearts" were hits on the hard practical standard of paying off.

Analysis of notices in the seven principal metropolitan dailies Monday (13) showed "Goldilocks" netting two favorable reviews, three negative and two "no opinion." Five of the critics, however, agreed that the show suffered from a weak book, although other production aspects provided offsetting compensations.

Only on the question of directing did there seem reluctance to state an opinion. Two critics who firmly committed themselves were Brooks Atkinson, of the Times and Robert

Tap Orson Welles And John Osborne as Crix

London, Oct. 14.

Orson Welles and John Osborne are among those who have been approached by The Observer to act as guest legit critics during the year's absence of Kenneth Tynan in New York. No one is set for the assignment, however.

Tynan starts Nov. 3 as theatre critic of the New Yorker, and will cover the entire Broadway season through next May. He will then cover the European theatre season, with accent on the cultural theatre, and return to London in October, 1959. During his Broadway stint Tynan will also contribute special pieces to The Observer.

Equity Burns At Member-Scribe

Actors Equity has sprung a press leak. The union has been caught in a situation where a new member, who's also a trade reporter, is utilizing his access to membership meetings for news-gathering purposes.

It's believed to be the first time such an incident has occurred. Union officials are concerned over the matter and are considering possible ways of dealing with it. Although, as a rule, reporters aren't admitted to the Equity conclaves, there's nothing in the union's existing regulations to prevent a member in good standing—even a working journalist—from attending meetings.

There's also no regulation regarding reporter-members who cover meetings for their newspapers. However, the union feels it's a matter of ethics and there's a possibility it could involve charges of "conduct unbecoming an Equity member." The reporter, who joined Equity last summer, is one of several newsmen belonging to the association.

Among the fourth estaters are N.Y. Times legit reporter Sam Zolotow and Broadway columnist Ed Sullivan. However, they haven't used their dual positions to get inside info on the organization. It's understood, however, that Zolotow has several times suggested that the union open its membership meetings to the press.

AGATHA CHRISTIE HAS NEW HIT WITH 'GUEST'

London, Oct. 14.

Agatha Christie has another West End hit in "The Unexpected Guest," which has been running at the Duchess Theatre for two months. It recouped its investment after one week on the road and four weeks in town, and broke the house record during the week ending Sept. 20.

Miss Christie's other hit, "The Mousetrap," is the all-time West End champ which is now nearing the end of its sixth year. Both shows are presented by Peter Saunders.

Plan Annual Cruise For Minnesota U. Showboat

Minneapolis, Oct. 14.

The Minnesota Centennial Celebration showboat, which docked at nine towns along the Mississippi River last summer, will be sent out on an annual basis by Minnesota Univ. A different play will be presented each season by the non-pro operation.

On its recently-ended initial voyage, the showboat offered Augustin Daly's 19th century meller, "Under the Gaslight." The presentation played to 20,000 patrons at 103 performances, of which 92 were sellouts. According to Dr. F. M. Whiting, the college's theatre director, some of the towns visited had never before had legit on either a pro or amateur level.

The showboat is being moored at the east Mississippi river bank here, during the winter.

ATPAM Membership To Consider League Offer, Elect Business Agent

Consideration of the latest contract offer from the League of N. Y. Theatres and the election of a new business agent will highlight the regular bi-monthly meet of the Assn. of Theatrical Pressagents & Managers in New York tomorrow (Thurs.).

The ATPAM membership, which last month voted to continue negotiations with the League, despite dissatisfaction with the producer-theatre owner group's original proposals, will weigh the revised terms being offered. The confabs between the two groups were launched July 22.

As before, the members can agree to accept the League proposals, approve continued negotiations or authorize the union's board of governors to call a strike. The membership decision will also effect the Shuberts, with whom ATPAM negotiates separately as a result of J. J. Shubert's resignation from the League in 1954.

In relation to the business agent post, the election is for a successor to the late Joe Moss, who died June 26 after holding the post a few weeks. Edward J. Scanlon has been functioning as temporary business agent since late July. During the interim between his appointment and Moss' death, the office was held on a voluntary basis by different ATPAM members.

Incidentally, both the Shubert and League pacts with ATPAM expired Aug. 31. The contract with the League covered a three-year period and the agreement with the Shuberts was for one year.

Meet 2 Burt Lancasters: With 'Disciple' and 'Pigs'

London, Oct. 14.

Burt Lancaster gets around a lot. At least, it seemed so last week to Kirk Douglas, who's costarring with him in the film edition of Shaw's "The Devil's Disciple," currently being shot here.

Douglas attended a performance of the legit drama, "Live Like Pigs, at the Royal Court Theatre, and was startled by a program note reading, "English Stage Society's assistant stage manager, Burt Lancaster." It turned out that the a.s.m. is a 20-year-old Englishman whose full name is Frederick Burt Lancaster. The American actor's real name, incidentally, is Burton Stephen Lancaster.

In stark, documentary fashion, Robert Ardrey depicts 12 tragic years in the history of Hungary, from the time of the rout of the Nazis in 1944 to the abortive uprising in 1956. It is a sombre and grim story and, although there is some of the West End's top talent to decorate the marquee, it is questionable whether the theatre-going public will support this type of entertainment.

The harsh reality of the subject is put into sharp focus by the style of presentation. A bare stage is relieved only by a few screens, and a few simple props indicate changes in scenery. Harsh white lights hypo the sombre effect.

In a play of this nature the treatment must necessarily be episodic, but a degree of continuity is maintained by the use of a narrator, Emlyn Williams, who speaks as the author and who sets the scene and introduces the characters. The tragedy of Hungary is unfolded with Lazlo Rajk and his wife Julia, the principal characters, and all the top brass in the Communist hierarchy (both living and dead) identified by actual names. Only a few fictitious personalities have been added as a device to maintain the plot continuity.

The author claims that the basic events are based on historical fact and it is clear that he has undertaken considerable research. His treatment is subjective, but that's understandable in the circumstances, as he's retelling a recent page of history which shocked the world.

The play begins with considerable dramatic force and the opening scenes, with a blend of violence and suspense, describe how Rajk and Janos Kadar defy the German occupation forces to contact with the approaching Russians. Three years later Rajk is a member of the Hungarian Communist government, but his fortright and independent stand makes him an embarassment to his Party colleagues.

He's arrested on charges of negotiating with the Titoists and is tricked by his friend and colleague, Janos Kadar, into making a false confession on the understanding that the inevitable death sentence will not be carried out, that he will be transferred to the Crimea under another name and his wife (also in jail) and son will be free to follow.

Rajk makes his confession, but the execution follows. From then on, it is a story of cynism and a struggle for power within the Party on the one side and the fight for freedom from tyranny, led by Rajk's widow, on the other.

Peter Hall's highly dramatic staging is given the fullest backing by an outstanding cast. In addition to Emlyn Williams' suave narration, there is a moving performance by Peggy Ashcroft as Julia Rajk; a sinister interpretation by Alan Webb as Kadar; and cynical studies by Stephen Murray and Martin Miller. Mogens Wieth has conviction as Lazlo Rajk and Norman Pitt achieves a surprising likeness in the role of Nagy. Myro.

Live Like Pigs

London, Oct. 1.

English Stage Co. presentation of three-act drama by John Arden; staging, George Devine and Anthony Page; decor, Alan Tagg. Stars Wilfrid Lawson, Anna Manahan. At Royal Court Theatre, London, Sept. 30, '58; $2.30 top.

Big Rachel ..... Anna Manahan

Blackmouth ..... Robert Shaw
Old Croaker ..... Madge Brindley
Daffodil ..... Barbara Ashcroft
Official ..... Alfred Blake
Doctor ..... Anne Blake
Police Sergeant ..... Stratford Johns

"Live Like Pigs" is an apt title for an unsavory and unpleasant play. John Arden, a new writer, has plumbed the depths of squalor and degradation for the characters. The drama is utterly distasteful, without even the merit of a plot to provide conventional dramatic form. The script is just a situation over-extended in three acts.

The main characters are gypsies compulsorily moved from their caravan site to a municipal housing estate. They are a rotten group, living by thieving, prostitution and so on. Their only possession seems to be an old-fashioned phonograph and a couple of worn out records.

Apart from the vigor and imagination with which he has presented an exceptionally sordid slice of life, it is hard to see what motivated John Arden to write a play of this kind. It paints a grim picture, but offers no hope or solution. Maybe he's trying to prove that people brought up to behave like wild beasts cannot be helped by a change of environment. The acting is consistently vivid from a cast headed by Wilfrid Lawson and Anne Manahan. Myro.

The Risen People

Dublin, Sept. 30.

Abbey Players presentation of three-act (nine scenes) drama by James Plunkett; staging, Ria Mooney; setting, Thomas McCorn. Abbey Theatre, Dublin, Sept. 29, '58.

Joe Somerville ..... Vincent Dowling
Timothy Keever ..... Philip O'Flynn
Mrs. Kerrigan ..... Doreen Madden
Mr. Hegarty ..... Geoffrey Golden
Jim Larkin ..... Eddie Golden
Policeman ..... Ray McAnally
Rashers Tierney ..... Patrick Layde

This documentary story of a labor row in Dublin in 1913 started out as a successful radio play, but bears no traces of its origin in stage version. It is excellent theatre.

James Plunkett locales the action in a tenement apartment, and skillfully portrays dreary atmosphere and depressing situation. Although the events presented in the play are familiar in Ireland, the appeal seems much broader than that.

The basic plot is historically accurate, but the reality of the characters adds a valuable element. There are expressive performances by T. P. McKenna and Maire O'Donnell as a husband and wife, and Brid Lynch, Maire Kean and Harry Brogan as other tenement-dwellers.

Liam Foley's portrait of a glibly trite Socialist and Vincent Dowling as his loud-mouthed companion are also persuasive, and Eddie Golden is both historically and dramatically convincing as the labor leader.

Thomas McCann's settings are realistic, with imaginative use of a gauze for the Greek chorus sequences, and Ria Mooney's staging has enough vitality and pace to remove the sense of reportage from the play. This looks a good bet for permanent place in Abbey repertoire and, despite its Dublin background, should stand up for production outside Ireland. Mac.

There was great excitement in Brussels when the cast of "Time of Your Life" appeared on the playbills at the American Pavilion Theatre. With Franchot Tone, Ann Sheridan, Susan Strasberg, Dan Dailey and Rita Gam heading the cast, here was something the playgoer couldn't afford to miss. Brussels seemed suddenly like a gateway to Broadway.

However, the excitement at opening night fell rather flat. Lack of sufficient rehearsal, or coordination of time, or perhaps something else, was at fault. William Saroyan's play requires fantasy and imagination. When the play was first produced here eight years ago by a local company, that quality came through in spite of the inability of Continental actors to portray American characters.

But there was enthusiasm and belief and sincerity in those performances. Perhaps there is the same feeling in the people assembled by Jean Dalrymple, a company that sounds like a producer's dream come true. Nevertheless, the impression is that nobody's heart is really in the venture, that what the actors are doing and saying is of little importance.

The stage is not Nick's bar, as depicted by Saroyan, but a place where, instead of real beer and whisky, only cold tea and lemonade is served. If a lady overheard saying, "I've never been so bored in my life," probably put it a little too strongly, it nevertheless appears that the shortcomings of this production, its standard too, were not up to par.

Many of these faults probably stem from loose direction. People are pushed into the background and reduced to dummies as soon as they had delivered their lines. Lighting is dimmed at the wrong moments. Kitty Duval's bedroom scene is almost laughable because of the impression of taking place in an alcove in the middle of the bar. Actors muffle their lines and behave awkwardly.

In the acting, credit should go to some of the less-known people who have little to do but do it well. Billy M. Greene is a picturesque drunk, George Mathews a believ-

Oops, Sorry!

Following rehearsals the other night of Maxwell Anderson's drama, "The Golden Six," the author and off-Broadway producer Warner LeRoy dropped in for supper at the Algonquin Hotel, forgetting that they were wearing sports shirts and no neckties.

In justification of refusing to admit them to the dining room, the headwaiter explained, "This is a very formal room—we get a good many theatre people here."

TWO'S A COINCIDENCE, BUT THREE'S A TREND

London, Oct. 7.

Is there a new trend toward offbeat entertainment in the West End? That is suggested by the current success of two productions, one a musical and the other a comedy.

The musical is "Expresso Bongo," which opened at the Saville Theatre last April and has now earned its investment of around $70,000. The backers, however, have not yet been repayed in full as a proportion of the earnings is being kept back for operational costs.

Presented by Oscar Lewenstein and Neil Crawford, with a book by Wolf Mankowitz and Julian More, "Bongo" is currently playing 75% capacity and is grossing around $11,700 weekly. It was voted best British musical of the year by London critics in a VARIETY poll.

"Brouhaha," which is presented by the International Playwright's Theatre and Robert L. Joseph and Lester Osterman, preemed on Aug. 27 and, after a slowish start, is now playing to capacity with a weekly gross of around $14,500. Although it is still some considerable way from paying off its $33,000 production cost, the management is confident that, on present performance, this will be accomplished very quickly.

Parisian 'Thunder Rock' Set for Moderate-Run

Paris, Oct. 14.

"La Tour d'Ivoire" ("The Ivory Tower"), Jean Mercure's adaptation of Robert Ardrey's "Thunder Rock," opened last week at the Bouffes-Parisiens for its first French-language presentation. It drew mixed reviews but generally favorable word-of-mouth, and should have a moderate run. The adaptor also produced.

The drama was originally done on Broadway in the early fall of 1939. The production was a failure, but the play was a hit in London in the spring of 1940 and was subsequently filmed in England, with the late Robert Donat repeating his West End starring role.

There's Jack in All Trades

The shift this week of Robert Downing from stage manager of "Say, Darling" to a similar assignment with the upcoming Archibald MacLeish drama, "J. B.," involved more than the usual adjustments. That was because Downing also doubled as an actor in "Darling," portraying the stage manager in the backstage scenes of the musical comedy about the production of a musical comedy.

As production stage manager of the show, Downing has been succeeded by David Clive, who was previously stage manager. As an actor playing a stage manager, he has been succeeded by Jack Waldron, who previously played a walk-on and sang in an ensemble number. (Incidentally, as a gag comment on his vocal effort, Waldron called himself "the oldest living chorus boy.")

Henry Velez, formerly assistant stage manager of "Darling," has moved up to stage manager, succeeding Clive, and James Kerr has been engaged as the new a.s.m. Daniel S. Borun will be stage manager of " J. B." under Downing. Besides his stage managing and recent acting stints, Downing keeps busy as a freelance book reviewer for VARIETY, a critic for Films in Review, published by the National Board of Review, show biz columnist for several papers in his native Iowa and prolific letters-to-the-editor writer.

'ROBBINS BALLET U.S.A.' $185,100 GROSS IN N.Y.

"Jerome Robbins Ballet: U.S.A.," which closed last Saturday night (11) at the Alvin Theatre, N.Y., racked up a total gross of $185,100 for the five-and-a-half weeks' run. It just about recouped the $35,000 cost of bringing the production to the U.S. following its initial appearance at Spoleto, Italy, and the Brussels Fair.

The 1,331-seat Alvin had a $6 top evening and $4.80 matinees for the dance engagement. The weekly grosses ranged from $20,000 for the five-performance opening stanza to $35,900 for the fourth.

Dance Review

Roberto Iglesias Ballet

Sol Hurok presentation of Spanish dance company of 20; Stars Iglesias; features Ana Mercedes, Rosario Escudero, Rosario Galan. Dancers: Esperanza Galan, Rosalia Loren, Manola Galan, Charles Vega, Juan Tapia, Carlos Camara, Maria Del Carmen. Singers: Maria Fabregas, Pepe Sekundo. Guitarist, Felix De Utrera; conductor, Silvia Masciarelli; accompanist, Marina Alonzo. Choreography by Iglesias and Guillermo Keys Arenas. At Broadway Theatre, N.Y., opening Oct. 7, '58. $0.00 top.

Spanish dance with a difference, that difference being his personal and virtuosic showmanship and shoemanship, sums up the Roberto Iglesias Ballet Espanol. A lover but no slave of the flamenco, this newcomer to the American bigtime concert stage is first of all an individuality-motivated artist. His own dancing style shows it and his own supporting cast and development of material extend it overall.

The evening is solid with color, entertainment and several audience-has-just-gotta-go-crazy crescendos of sheer sockeroo. The comments of the present reviewer when Iglesias gave his original "sneak" at Carnegie Hall (May 10, 1957) and was promptly "discovered" not only by the critics but by Sol Hurok still apply: "elemental, dynamic, earthy, sexy . . . marked by special and ardent showmanship."

At Carnegie the climaxing number, "Soledad Montaya," came last. For the Broadway showcasing it's in the first half to assure boff impact with the reviewers. This is the Gypsy-style "courtship" dance, and, again to quote last year's VARIETY review: "The crescendo is orgiastic, the girl being artistically brought to a frenzy of desire." Iglesias joins one of the two twins in his company, Rosario Galan, to create this many-faceted, shimmering study in passion.

For his present next-to-closing the star partners with the Argentinian, Ana Mercedes, in an absolutely sensational point-and-heels executed to equestrian motif. Here, as in earlier examplings, Iglesias demonstrates his amazing, seldom equalled "trembling control" and it is a stunning tribute to Senorita Mercedes that she keep up all the way.

Necessarily the evening varies from the half-dozen peaks to the diverting but necessarily lesser "filler." The stylized Mexican comedy interlude of Esperanza Galan and Antonio Espanol is expected to earn and does earn and give an encore. Rosario Escudero worthily supports the sheer flamenco dance technique in solo.

Provocatively, Iglesias not only improvises his material, loosely derivative from sullen, Spanish and gayer Latin sources, but has been wide-ranging in his selection of talent. While the Galan twins and their brother Manola are, like Rosalia Lorca, Juan Tapia and Carlos Vega, from Spain, Maria Del Carmen comes from the Ballets de Puerto Rico, the guitarist Felix De Utrera from the Canary Islands and the conductor, Silvio Masciarelli, like Senorita Mercedes, from Argentina. Special note may perhaps be taken of Carlos Camara, so-called, a Spanish dancer out of New York's High School of Performing Arts, down 46th St. from the VARIETY office. If that suggests that "Spaniards" are nowadays pretty universal, Iglesias himself was born in Guatemala, educated in Mexico, trained in San Francisco and enjoys U.S. citizenship.

At Cargegie the company had only piano accompaniment. For the Sol Hurok (born in Russia) N.Y. showing there's an orchestra. It seemed a little under-rehearsed opening night but improved. The musical support includes Maria Fabregas and Pepe Segundo plus Marina Alonso on the piano beside the important guitar of Utrera. Some 20 persons constitute the company.

Present bookings amount to 12 weeks with a probable return engagement for Broadway thereafter. It is a safe bet that notices and money will be good everywhere. The break-in week for Broadway as part of Hurok's 1958-59 "festival" is a sellout. Land.

B'way Strong; 'Drink' $21,600 in 6, 'Goldilocks' $37,700 (5), 'Angel' 31G, 'Poet' $42,200, 'Visit' 32G, 'Say' 46½G

Broadway was solid again last week, as business jumped for practically all shows. There were only 14 entries on tap, of which two were newcomers. The number of sellouts spread to five, including "My Fair Lady," "Music Man," "Sunrise at Campobello," "Touch of the Poet" and "Two for the Seesaw."

The production roster this week climbs to 17 with the addition of the French Theatre National Populaire. "World of Suzie Wong" and "Girls in 509."

Ivanov

Daniel Hineck, in association with Harlin Quist, revival of four-act tragedy by Anton Chekhov, as translated by Elisaveta Fen. Features Paul Stevens, Jacqueline Brookes, Jack Bittner, Sada Thompson, Roberts Blossom, Anne Fielding, Albert Quinton, Marian Reardon, Harlin Quist, Mary Van Fleet, James Goldsmith. Staged by William Ball; settings and lighting, Will Steven Armstrong; costumes, Poppy Lagodmos. At Renata Theatre, N.Y., Oct. 8, '58; $3.60 top ($ 50 opening).

Cas.. Paul Stevens, Jack Bittner, Jacqueline Brookes, Roberts Blossom, Harlin Quist, Sada Thompson, Mary Van Fleet, Ezra Howard, James Goldsmith, George Barry, Marian Reardon, Albert Quinton, Anne Fielding, Phil Jacobus, Claude Woolman, Yafa Lerner, Hugh Whitfield, Vivian Neuberg, Robert Diehl, Joan Kugell.

The revival at the Renata Theatre of Anton Chekhov's first important full-length play is an admirable addition to the burgeoning off-Broadway season. Among the finely-drawn production's virtues is its revelation of the Russian playwright in process. For "Ivanov," like its more eminent successors, is an introspective study of a group of late 19th century Russians who are living lives of quiet desperation.

A Chekhov contemporary, the director Nemiorvitch-Dantchenko, considered "Ivanov" as "merely a rough draft for an excellent play." It is a credit to those involved with this revival that it seems something more than that. To a large extent, virtues have been exploited to gloss over weaknesses, and although the production notably austere, room has been allowed for temper and passion.

Much of the credit must go to director William Ball, who has attended to minutest detail without losing sight of essential rhythms and fervors. From the careful timing of a book's closing to the fearsome moment when the distracted husband shouts at his tubercular wife that she is about to die, Ball has made each instant meaningful to itself and to the total effect.

The large cast is paced by shrewdly-wrought performances by the principals. As the husband of the title role who cannot find himself in life, Paul Stevens has asceticism as a man of intellect, and robust temperament when the civilized veneer has been scraped away. As his doomed wife, Jacqueline Brookes again reveals herself an actress of presence, fine sensitivity and sure instinct. To her small but crucial role, she brings a scope that dominates the play.

As a petty official who is also a victimized husband and tender father, Albert Quinton has excellent humor and definition. Roberts Blossom, though palpably not aged 62 behind the white whiskers, is quaintly pathetic as an impoverished count, Harlin Quist's earnestness as the wife's physician doesn't quite save him from being victimized by the part's single-track thought, while Sada Thompson is pert and coy as a wealthy, title-seeking spinster.

As a steward of the estate, Jack Bittner cavorts with a forced zest that is at odds with the basic mood. Less transparently, Anne Fielding has similar difficulty as the councilman's daughter whose determination to marry the widowed Ivanov forces the play's unhappy denouement.

Will Steven Armstrong's two sets make superior use of the small stage, and first-rate design, while his lighting has carefully enhanced the play's fluctuating moods. Elisaveta Fens' translation is unobtrusively colloquial, while producer Daniel Hineck, and his associate, actor Quist, rate nods for their discernment in making this seminal Chekhov locally available.

Deathwatch

Garen, Greene & Smith presentation of two-act tragedy by Jean Genet. Staged by Leo Garen; setting, Jack Youngerman; music, David Amram. At Theatre East, N.Y., Oct. 9, '58; $4.05 top ($5 opening).

Cast: Vic Morrow, George Maharis, Harold Scott, Stefan Gierasch.

Jean Genet is one of the current crop of cryptic French playwrights whose apparent whim is to keep audiences guessing. The fact that Genet has done considerable time in prison has evidently been useful in providing source material for his harrowing tragedy, "Deathwatch," which takes place in a cell.

In this brief two-act play, the author is either saying something important that he wishes to be ferreted out, or he has penned a literary exercise on the misfortunes of incarceration. At a guess, he seems to think that man is an inconsequential creature, a victim of circumstances he cannot possibly control, and that his instincts are inherently evil.

If this is not the import of his play, however, that Genet is telling the short chronicle of three mis-mated cellmates. One is guillotine-bound and concerned about the fidelity of his girl on the outside. Another is in a torment of anguished loneliness and inadequately, and yearns for the solace of friendship and love, even within this crawling cell. The third is a sadistic homosexual whose loose-tongued taunting leads to his murder.

In the small confines of Theatre East, the fighting, scratching, pawing and grovelling is virtually in the audience's collective lap. Similarly, the hatred infesting Genet's violent tract spews itself into the mind with vindictive precision. That it is distasteful is hardly a fault, but that it seems relatively unimportant is well-nigh fatal.

Vic Morrow and George Maharis are the two convicts who could find a common bond in each other but are separated by the gulf of suspicion, distrust and loathing. Harold Scott has the tasteless part of the Negro catalyst who makes life for all three a living hell. Each has the vigor, spit and tension required by the play, with Maharis bringing the intellectual content into sharpest focus.

As the guard, Stefan Gierasch draws a self-consciously mannered portrait that occasionally has the distinction of being inaudible 12 feet away. Leo Garen has provided unsparingly naturalistic staging, while even the bluish-red theatre exit light adds to the eeriness of this verminous study in pessimism.

Light Up the Sky

Equity Library Theatre, Inc. revival of three-act comedy by Moss Hart. Staging, Jerry Adler; setting, Bill Ritman; lighting, Hugh E. Lester. At Lenox Hill Playhouse, N.Y., Oct. 11, '58; admission by contribution.

Cast: Nancy Lester, Harvey Korman, Carol Southard, Brent Sargent, Peggy Fenn, Jim Dimitri, Salem Ludwig, Gil Fields, Julie Christy, Richard Marr, Don Burns, Vincent J. D'Anca, Andrew Lawrance.

Whatever Equity Library Theatre may or may not achieve during its 15-play fifteenth season, it has set itself a high standard with its opening bill, a sparkling revival of Moss Hart's "Light Up the Sky." Since ELT is a showcase for Actor's Equity members, it might seem unnecessary to call this production professional, yet it is one of the most thoroughly pro jobs to turn up at Lenox Hill Playhouse in recent years. Jerry Adler's staging is expertly slick, his casting has been sound and he has wrought, with his company's exuberant help, a revival of this comedy ode to show business that deserves longevity beyond its East 70th St. seven-performance stand.

Particularly outstanding in the sharp cast are Salem Ludwig, as the bellicose producer who emerges from every sewer dripping with honey, and Jim Dimitri as the youthfully impressionable playwright who learns about show people the hard way. The performances of these two proficient actors are remarkably instructive by contrast, Ludwig's for its free-swinging attack, Dimitri's for its deceptive simplicity.

Among the distaffers, Julie Christy, as the star actress, draws an observant portrait of temperament at work. As her hard-bitten mother, Peggy Fenn is acidulously brittle, while Carol Southard, as the producer's flashy wife, capitalizes on the sardonic relationship between a mismatched couple who were made for each other.

In support, Nancy Lester is attractively direct as the secretary, Harvey Korman keeps the off-beat humor implicit in the director's character under control, while Brent Sargent as a successful author, Richard Marr as the actress' husband, and Andrew Lawrence as a star-bedazzled Shriner make significant contributions to the production's high standards.

Bill Ritman's solid setting of a Boston theatrical hotel suite is another positive contribution to the re-lighting of Lenox Hill.

ANN TODD BEATEN UP; VIVIEN LEIGH RETURNS

London, Oct. 14.

Vivien Leigh returned ahead of schedule last Thursday night (9) to the cast of "Duel of Angels," at the Apollo Theatre. She had previously been due back last night (Mon.), after a week's holiday in Italy.

The actress moved up her return to the Jean Giraudoux-Christopher Fry comedy upon learning that her costar, Ann Todd, will be out of the cast several days longer because of injuries received last week when she was assaulted by thugs armed with coshes (blackjacks) at Brighton, where she was vacationing.

Sylvia Kay subbed for Miss Leigh and Sally Home is appearing in place of Miss Todd, who recently took over the costarring role from Claire Bloom.

Opera Review

The Silent Woman

N.Y. City Opera Co. presentation of three-act opera based on a Ben Jonson comedy; music, Richard Strauss; adaptation, Stefan Zweig; translation, Herbert Bedford; conductor, Peter Herman Adler; staging, Margaret Webster; setting and costumes, Andreas Nomikos; makeup, Michael Arshansky; chorus master, Gino Smart. At N.Y. City Center, Oct. 7, '58; $3.80 top.

Housekeeper ..... Ruth Kobart
Barber ..... Paul Ukena
Sir Morosus Blunt ..... Herbert Beattie
His Nephew ..... John Alexander
Company Singers ..... Arnold Voketaitis, Arthur Newman, Joshua Hecht, Jacquelynne Moody, Regina Sarfaty, Joan Carroll
Others: Edson Hoel, John Dennison, William Zakariasen, Peter Sliker, George Del Monte, Marshall Stone.

If the opening night performance of "The Silent Woman" is anything to go by, the N.Y. City Opera is in fine fettle for its fall semester at the City Center. The American premiere of this Richard Strauss opera has been made a rollicking occasion, with conductor Peter Herman Adler, stage director Margaret Webster, the singers and orchestra combining to let the town know that, whatever its past woes, this is not an opera company to be discounted.

Stefan Zweig adapted the Ben Jonson play into German a couple of decades ago and the modified story has become the framework for ingratiating Strauss. To make the premiere here thoroughly American, however, the opera has been sung in English, in a translation by Herbert Bedford from Zweig's German text.

The original conceit of the ancient man of wealth who craves a young, but silent, wife, has been used by Zweig to introduce a troupe of itinerant singers into the venerable one's household. The jest concerns the mock marriage of the nephew's wife to the quiet-craving retired admiral, the girl's subsequent "plotted" shrewishness, a "divorce" and subsequent revelation of the truth.

A slight difficulty of the adaptation is a conflict in mood. The old man has been made understandably pathetic, so much so that the girl feels genuinely sorry for him. So does the audience, which has been led into farce. Japery and sentiment seldom blend well.

But Strauss was feeling felicitous when he composed this opera. More successfully than the story, he has contrasted rambunctiousness with tenderness, and throughout his score there is a useful touch of mockery. Adler's conducting at the Center has been perceptive and his melding of orchestra and voice has served Strauss excellently.

Miss Webster, a familiar hand with Elizabethan staging, has infused vigor, style and feeling into the visual production, and she has elicited from the performers a relaxed comic flair. In rehearsal it was necessary for her to do some tampering with phrasings that just wouldn't fit, but the end result is harmonious flow.

Herbert Beattie uses a good crusty voice as the old admiral, Joan Carroll's vivacious soprano, coupled with a nice sense of mood, enables her to make the "bride" unhackeyed and charming. Paul Ukena, as the barber who plots the inner play, is bustlingly alert as he patters his zany role, and the Center's familiar romantic tenor, John Alexander, is in spirited voice as the legacy-interested nephew.

Andreas Nomikos has provided a light-hearted setting, before which the entire company gives evidence of having a fine time in a capital romp. Not coincidentally, the results are infectious. Geor.

Shows Out of Town

flowingly constructed, but these also slow the essential story movement. Ferrer's staging on the exciting Zvi Geyra set produces scenes that are visually inspiring, but more like tableaux, as graphically lighted by Geyra.

Booth is painted as a fated man, the actor who craved love but relinquished it for the foot-loose existence inherent in the theatre. He lived under the shadow of his actor father and the madman his father became, and he turned to alcohol when there was little else to grasp. New York drama critic William Winter, vividly portrayed by Lorne Greene, provides the narrative passages, and Ferrer follows through to portray them. The most effective sequence involves the effects of President Lincoln's assassination by Edwin's brother, John Wilkes Booth.

Ferrer switches smoothly from Booth the man to Booth the actor and is convincing whether with subtleties or grandiose elocution. In addition to Greene's fine performance, there is a fiery one by Richard Waring as notorious murderer-brother and a moving one by Jan Keith as Junius Brutus Booth, the father.

Lois Smith, as Edwin's wife, Mary Devlin, is sensitive and tender, better as the woman than the actress. Marion Ross is excellent as Asia, the sister, turning in a brief but moving portrayal. Stephen Franken, playing Booth as a boy, is very good, as are Sydney Smith, as brother Junius, and Patricia Kane, as Edwin's daughter.

Costumes, an artistic assist to the play, are faithfully and tastefully created by Edith Head.

Twelfth Night

Los Angeles, Oct. 10.

Old Vic Trust Ltd. & Arts Council of Great Britain presentation (under management of S. Hurok) of Old Vic Co. revival of two-act comedy by William Shakespeare; staging, Michael Benthall; decor and costumes, Desmond Heeley; musical arrangements, Gordon Jacob. Features John Neville, Barbara Jefford, Richard Wordsworth, Dudley Jones, John Humphry, Joss Ackland, Gerald Harper, Jane Downs, Judi Dench. At Philharmonic Aud., Los Angeles, Oct. 10, '58; $5.50 top.

Sir Toby Belch ..... Joss Ackland
Maria ..... Judi Dench
Sir Andrew Aguecheek ..... John Neville
Clown ..... Dudley Jones

Antonio ..... Oliver Neville
Fabian ..... James Culliford
Page to Olivia ..... Simon Fraser
Officers ..... Harold Innocent, James Mellor
Priest ..... John Gay
Others ..... Peggy Butt, Ursula Jenkins, Michael Culver, Peter Hodgson, Dyson Lovell, James Mellor, Crispian Woodgate

The Old Vic is playing a rollicking "Twelfth Night" into a flawless, zestful production, second in the troupe's three Philharmonic selections. Set before a single arbor and quickened into two flowing acts, the revival is a triumph of zany buffoonery, most effective in the hands of John Neville as Sir Andrew Aguecheek and in the direction of Michael Benthall. Once past the initial scenes of exposition, the action is painlessly clear, so the show should be as enjoyable to the unfamiliar as to the Shakespeare addicts.

Barbara Jefford is impressive and poignant as Viola, and Neville gives a witty, sensitive performance as Aguecheek. There are also excellent portrayals by Jess Ackland as Toby Belch, Dudley Jones as Feste, Jane Downs as Olivia, Richard Wordsworth as her steward, John Humphrey as the duke, Judi Dench as Olivia's maid, Gerald Harper as Sebastian nad James Culliford as Fabian.

Decor and costumes by Desmond Heeley and musical arrangements by Gordon Jacob add to the illusion.

Two for the Seesaw

Baltimore, Oct. 6.

Fred Coe production of three-act comedy-drama by William Gibson. Staging, Arthur Penn; settings and lighting, George Jenkins; costumes, Virginia Volland. Stars Ruth Roman, Jeffrey Lynn. At Ford's Theatre, Baltimore, Oct. 6, '58; $4.95 top.

Gittel Mosca ..... Ruth Roman
Jerry Ryan ..... Jeffrey Lynn

What Anne Bancroft did for the Broadway production of this William Gibson hit, Ruth Roman does for the road company. The screen actress is a surprise and delight as the Bronx girl with too much heart and not enough judgment. Except for an opening night incident when she had an uncontrollable cough and couldn't find her voice, the star was expressively brash, uncomprehending, sincere and then wise as the girl who doesn't know what she wants out of life or how to go about it.

Jeffrey Lynn is limited by the less colorful part, but he manages to do well by the attorney from Omaha who finds in the New York girl not only an escape from loneliness, but also a balancing influence in his life. In sum, this touring production stacks up as a money-maker, with Miss Roman the major draw.

Summer theatre operators Lee Guber, Frank Ford and Shelly Gross have put together a more than respectable bus-and-truck touring production of "Li'l Abner," the Broadway musical hit based on the Al Capp comic strip. They've spent money and the show looks it. The costumes and sets are fresh and bright, and the general atmosphere is professional.

Just as in the Broadway original, the dancing remains the long suit. George and Christy Meeder, who duplicated the original Michael Kidd choreography, have done a first-rate pob, and the ballets, especially the Sadie Hawkins high spot, are fast and flashy, altogether satisfactory counterparts of the Kidd craftsmanship.

For the lead, Robert Kaye, fits the part like a custom-made glove. He's big, gangling, good-natured and friendly, with a nice voice, a pleasant manner and the air of having stepped right out of Al Capp's inkwell. Patricia Northrop is first-rate as Daisy Mae, too, all peaches and cream, but handicapped somewhat vocally opening night by a bad cold. However, she'll do, with plenty to spare. Among the lower echelons, Charlotte Nolan as Mammy Yokum and Henry Norell as General Bullmoose are by far the best. Dean Dittman should be an okay Marryin' Sam just as soon as some of his coyness wears off—or it could be nervousness.

There are certain vocal weaknesses which need repair. For instance, one of the best lyrics in the show, the satirical "Oh, Happy Day," is practically lost in the male quartet that's currently doing the numbers. But on the whole, the road version is an okay offspring, and the boys who put "Li'l Abner" together so industriously on Broadway won't be ashamed of it either.

New York 19, New York

Dear Mr. Schang,

Last night we opened our 1958-59 Civic Music Association concert series with the first performance on any stage of DANCE JUBILEE, starring Bambi Linn and Rod Alexander. And what an opening! Both for them and for us! It was truly a "world premiere", because this show is certainly going places!

Our audience of 1800 persons was overwhelmed by the gaiety, speed, color, youth, tunefulness, variety and originality of the production. We were entranced by the graceful vitality and precision of this amazingly versatile company of dancers, singers, and musicians headed by that incomparable team of Linn and Alexander.

Being a capsule history of American song-and-dance as it has developed in vaudeville and musical comedy, this show has a most delightful quality of nostalgia which is not sad, but which is young, joyous, at times extremely funny, and always beautiful. A rare accomplishment.

We feel that we were the most favored audience in America last night. Your organization deserves a vote of thanks for making possible the appearance (in communities like ours) of a production of such scope and quality.

Cordially yours,

Harold Power

'Goldilocks' Mixed Press

Coleman, Mirror. (In his own dramatic criticism, Kerr has always been a forthright commentator on a show's staging. This has been a facet of his work that has tended to net him respect, if occasionally individual resentment, in the legit profession.)

"Walter Kerr has been wise in pacing the frolic with the speed of a hungry steed on the way to the oats in his stable. That's all to the good," was Coleman's comment. Said Atkinson, "Acting as his own director, Kerr has everything organized and has established a lively pace. But, like the book, the direction is not vigorous or versatile."

The two favorable reactions to "Goldilocks" were from John Chapman, of the N. Y. Daily News, and Coleman. While Chapman shied away from the staging issue, everything else impressed him "as a funny musical comedy, and they don't hardly make them no more." Coleman said that, while "no gem of a show," he found it "in the black in our ledger."

Despite extra time available to them due to the Saturday opening, two reviewers had difficulty reaching a definitive conclusion for their readers. Frank Aston, of the N. Y. World-Telegram, allowed that, "Its parts surpass the whole" and "it never develops a personality of its own." However, he registered no specific opinions about the book, staging or lyrics, although the Kerrs provided "thickets of witticisms."

Herbert Whittaker, of the Toronto Globe & Mail, who's guesting on the Tribune during Kerr's absence, turned in a "yes-no" summary. He wrote that the show, "although admittedly dislocated at times in book, sounds and looks like a big Broadway musical."

Richard Watts, of the N. Y. Post, and John McClain, of the N. Y. Journal-American, both admitted that this was a task they'd rather duck After an outspoken "No" review, Watts wound up, "I hate to be so sullen about 'Goldilocks'."

McClain's notice started: "Here is a time when I wish I had realized my childhood ambition of becoming a soda jerk (Shouts from the balcony: 'Well, you're half-way home.') For then I would not be faced with the chore of reviewing 'Goldilocks'."

Atkinson opened his review with a succinct paragraph: "'Goldilocks' is a bountiful, handsome musical comedy with an uninteresting book." His closer recapped with, "Apart from the spectacle and the music, 'Goldilocks' is an unexciting show." (In some quarters it was immediately intimated that perhaps Atkinson was leaning over backward to prove his incorruptibility, so apparently a critic can't win whatever the circumstances.)

Ironically, Atkinson's review brought another verbal spitball barrage from Richard Kollmar, the occasional legit producer who, with his wife, columinst-television performer Dorothy Kilgallen, conducts an over-the-coffee-cups gab series weekday mornings on WOR, New York. With Miss Kilgallen currently out of the country, Kollmar was teaming with his father-in-law, former Hearst feature writer James Kilgallen.

There was little suggestion in Kollmar-elder Kilgallen spiel that Atkinson had written a kid-gloves review of the Kerrs' show. On the contrary, they renewed the "Dorothy and Dick" attacks of last season on the Times critic's alleged negative attitude. In this connection, it's recalled that the senior Kilgallen has several times in the past advocated a newspaper policy of "rotating" critics as a method of avoiding bored and blase reviews.

Edinburgh Ballet Cuts London Stand, May Fold

London, Oct. 14.

Because of the skimpy advance sale, amounting to only 4% of the prospective gross, the Edinburgh International Ballet postponed the opening of its London engagement from last Thursday night (9) at the Sadler's Wells Theatre. The preem is now set for next Thursday (16), and the booking is for three "token" performances. The troupe may then disband unless new financing is obtained.

The company had offers from the U. S., South Africa, Vienna and Monte Carlo to follow its appearance here.

D.C. Music Lover Group Lines Up Busy Season

Washington, Oct. 7.

Opera Society of Washington—a local music-loving group without a resident company—opens its third season Nov. 20 in Lisner Auditorium with a three-nights of Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro."

Donald Gramm, here last year for the Opera Society presentation of "Cosi fan tutte," will sing the title role. John Reardon and Irene Jordan will portray Count Almaviva and the Countess. Eva Wolff, a Fulbright scholar in Germany, will come from Europe to play Cherubino. Judith Raskin of the NBC Opera Co. will sing Susanna. Others in the cast include Nadja Witkowska, Phyllis Frankel, Lee Cass, Frank Poretta and Jan Rubes.

Ralph Herbert, Metropolitan baritone, will direct the production. Paul Callaway will conduct the chorus of the Opera Society, the only local group involved, and the National Symphony Orchestra. Frederick Franklin, co-director of the Washington ballet and former Ballet Russe star, will be choreographer.

William Pitkin will design the stage settings. James Waring of Catholic U. will handle lighting and technicalities.

The season planned by the Opera Society will also include the first Washington performance of Stravinsky's "The Rake's Progress," Feb. 12, 13 and 15, and Verdi's "Falstaff," April 10, 12 and 13.

dent Eisenhower has never been to the National since he has been in the White House, although he came occasionally while an Army general. Mrs. Eisenhower has averaged attending about two or three Wednesday matinees during the legit season. With her almost always are her mother, Mrs. Elivera Doud; her sister, Mrs. Gordon Moore (who is a regular National customer); and her Washington friend, Mrs. Reva Clark Miller.

Although Vice President Richard M. Nixon evidenced an early interest in the theatre (he and Mrs. Nixon met while working in a Whittier (Cal.) Little Theatre production of "The Night of January 16") he and his wife seldom attend the National. Among members of the Supreme Court, Chief Justice and Mrs. Warren and Justice and Mrs. Tom Clark are steady legit patrons. Justice Felix Frankfurter and his wife were also, before her prolonged illness.

Washington still talks about Chief Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes forgetting his judicial cares as a constant patron of the old burlesque house, the Gayety, now transformed into the Shubert legit house (which is dark most of the year, unlike the National). Although the Holmes story survives, it is considered by many to be apocrypal, or exaggerated.

The current Cabinet has no theatre devotee. But several of Cabinet wives sometimes attend Wednesday matinees, usually as a group with Mrs. Arthur Summerfield, wife of the Postmaster General, making the arrangements. The British and Belgian ambassadors are among the diplomatic corps' most faithful theatre followers, although a number of other envoys are good customers, too.

A Day In The Life Of . . .

London, Oct. 2.

How does a man look to six other people in his life? That's the idea Jack Popplewell has conjured up for "A Day in the Life of . . ." and, while it's not strictly original, it is sustained largely by Alfred Marks' considerable flair as a character actor.

There is a repetitive quality in the treatment, and the humor, lively enough at first, shows signs of sagging before the final curtain. Nevertheless, with the marquee names to help it along, it should hold for a profitable run.

Apart from Marks' one-man triumph, the production also stars Naunton Wayne in the role of a narrator. He takes no part in the action, but is on before each scene to explain what is to be next unfolded. He has an affable and ingratiating manner and makes a substantial contribution to the entertainment.

The play is more like six elaborate revue sketches, although there is a slender storyline connecting them all. Marks plays a music publisher. To his mistress he is a doddering old fool who ought to be food for a mink. To his business rival he's a sly, shifty and crafty operator. To his secretary he's a gay man-about-town. To his mother he's still a little boy. To a barmaid he's a drunk who can't hold his liquor. To his wife he's a husband she can't trust but is prepared to accept.

For all six parts Marks effects changes in style and manner. He adapts himself fluently to the various guises and is always in character. Therese Burton, best known here for her recent appearance in a tv panel show, makes a modest appearance as the mistress, but her unusual voice is quite a gimmick. Kenneth Warren makes the rival publisher a bold and vigorous personality. Gabrielle Hamilton shines in her one big scene as the secretary lunching with her boss, while Roy Hawkesworth as a songwriter. Pamela Lane as the wife and Jessica James as the barmaid round off an able cast.

A racy production staged by Charles Hickman keeps the action rolling and Peter Rice has designed six attractive, simple sets. Myro.

La Hobereaute
(Bird of Prey)

Paris, Sept. 30.

Roger Dornes & Lars Schmidt presentation of three-act drama with musical accompaniment; script by Jackues Audiberti; music, Yves Claoue; staging, Le Poulain; sets and costumes, Jacques Noel. Stars Daniel Ivernel, Francoise Spira, Jean Le Poulain; features Christiane Lasquin, Camille Guerini, Jacques Marin. At Theatre Vieux-Colombier, Paris, Sept. 23, '58; $3 top.

La Hobereaute ..... Francoise Spira
Lotvy ..... Daniel Ivernel
Baron Massacre ..... Jean Le Poulain
Aldine ..... Christiane Lacquin
Mont Vimer ..... Camille Guerini
Rasibus ..... Jacques Marin
Garon ..... Jacques Dannoville
Maitre Parfait ..... Leo Peltier

Although this is billed as a spoken opera, the musical background is not essential. The tragi-comedy, with a flamboyant mixture of the bawdy, supernatural and grandiose, has a fluent story and excellent physical production. It would probably provide the basis for an effective opera or ballet, but is good theatre on its own.

The opera-type story, laid in 9th century France, involves a femme spirit and her Druid master, and the young knight with whom she falls in love. The verse play ends with wholesale deaths. The piece would be difficult for translation and export, but should be a Paris success.

Although the production is done in the small Vieux-Colombier Theatre, the scenery, costumes and staging have impressive sweep. Francoise Spira is delicate but expressively feline in the title role, while Daniel Ivernal as the young knight and Jean Le Poulain as the Druid are excellent. Le Poulain has also staged skillfully, Jacques Audiberti's poetic text is meaty and vital, and the Yves Claoue musical background is an asset.

George Roy Hill will direct "The Gang's All Here," the Jerome Lawrence - Robert E. Lee drama, which David Merrick and Leland Hayward will co-produce on Broadway.

National Press Club's "shrdlu"

To celebrate the National Press Club's 50th anniversary, an affectionate chronicle of the half century of good times and bad, solemnity and shenanigans, sentiment and cynicism is to be published Nov. 15. The $5 book's tricky title, "shrdlu," is the traditional "word" employed by linotype men to test equipment or identify columnar material for editing. The committee putting the book together say it's rich with anecdotes involving the world famous as well as the Washington famous, including Presidents, kings, diplomats, jurists, show business personalities, business titans and the like. It tells about the time Warren G. Harding came over from the White House for lunch and won $1.80 playing hearts afterward. Another President, Harry S. Truman, played the piano while Lauren Bacall stretched out across the top of it —a location she obtained because of the fast thinking of a press agent. Among those present for the first meeting of the club was Buffalo Bill Cody.

Although basically written for the club's 4,600 members, it will be sold generally.

Papers Upping Prices

Stauffer Sells 'Household'

Stauffer Publications, Topeka, Kans., announced last week the sale of its monthly Household Magazine to the Curtis Pub. Co. Price was not disclosed. Household is reputed to have a circulation of about 2,650,000.

Household will end with the November issue, and Curtis will fulfill subscriptions with their own magazines. The sale ends a 40-year publication tenure for Household, and is the latest move by Stauffer in a series of shifts since it bought out Capper Publications couple of years back. Household was a Capper publication, originally.

Oscar Stauffer, head of the publishing house, said the company is withdrawing from the shelter field because "it is out of our sphere," and the company will stick to the farm field, continuing Capper's Farmer, Capper's Weekly, and a string of five state farm magazines. Household had not been profitable for many years, he said.

Stauffer properties now also include 13 dailies, four radio stations and one television station. All of its properties are in the states of Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma.

64G Loot Subsidizes Book

Frances C. DeBerry, Bible teacher from Louisville, Ky., who won $16,000 on the "$64,000 Question" for her knowledge of Shakespeare, has a book coming out next month tagged "All the World's a Stage for Shakespeare's Comedies: A Modern Interpretation of the Bard's Humor." Publisher is Exposition Press, a "vanity press" outfit in Gotham. Dust wrapper shows the author in front of the Revlon isolation booth discussing the Bard's humor with Hal March, quiz program's emcee.

Mrs. DeBerry reportedly paid $2,200 for the "subsidization" of her book.

Cincy's 'Obscene' Mag Drive

Crusade of Cincinnati police against smut literature has been extended from dealers to the distributor.

In a raid Oct. 2 nearly 1,700 copies of 30 different alleged obscene magazines were confiscated at the J. L. Marshall New Co., Cincy's largest distribs.

"We want to cut off the source," said Lt. Carl Lind, who conducted the raid with six members of the vice control bureau squad. The firm's manager was cited on a charge of having indecent publications in violation of a city ordinance.

One of two retailers arrested after the raid had been fined $100 and costs early this year on a charge of possession for sale of alleged obscene literature.

Stylish As Was

Men and women and what they wore back to the Egyptians are laboriously and fascinatingly set forth in a third edition of "The Mode in Costume" just re-issued in updated version after 10 years by Scribners at $8.95. Comprising 49 chapters, 463 pp and 1,200 of the author's line drawings this is a life's work. The lady who did all the work pioneered in 1910 as fashion editor of Women's Wear, hence her use of the masculine-sounding signature, R. Turner Wilcox.

The text and illustration form an obbligato to human history and pack a remarkably vivid array of data in imagination-teasing exposition. It is instantly apparent that any historical novelist, any costume director for screen, legit or television ought to have this book close by, to pick up thumb-marks from frequent practical consultation.

If many civilizations ar covered, not surprisingly France dominates in the end. Though a serious work it may also be added that the book provides many a chuckle. Oh, those old petticoats for men, and those old drawers for dames!

Vancouver Shifts

Jack Scott, daily columnist for around a decade, has been upped to editorial director of the Vancouver Sun, no longer signs a column, at latest in changes made since the paper merged with Vancouver Daily Province, which controls, since last summer. Deal is under probe by Restrictive Practices Commissioner C. Rhodes Smith.

There's a glut of Vancouver newsmen locally since the Sun-Province alliance and the morning News-Herald foldo last year. It was absorbed, in part, by newcomer Family News-Advertiser, 142,000 circulation weekly, published by Metropolitan Press Ltd., prez Les C. Way, v.p. J. F. Magor, with former News-Herald columnist John Ray as editorial topper.

Big Literary Heist

A "big" robbery was reported at the Atlantic Monthly in Boston last week. An estimated four men got away with $1.98 from one of the Atlantic's many safes which they ripped open, an estimated 12c an hour apiece if they worked from midnight to 4 a.m. "We do all our business by check," Charles Morton, associate ed., pointed out. "I don't suppose there's a building in Boston that could be a worse selection for burglars."

The thieves opened five safes and quit on the sixth after knocking off the combination. The robbers were evidently so discomforted they threw $100 worth of stamps on the floor. In the safes opened were non-negotiable ledgers, contracts and assorted records. The robbers did not deign to steal any copies of the Atlantic Monthly.

Editor since 1915, Marvin will continue as member of the board, but will spend much of his time in Tyron, N.C., where he has bought a new home. He is a former president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

Joseph R. Snyder, city editor of the Troy Record (morning), has been appointed associate editor of it, and also of the Times-Record (evening). City editor of The Record for 11 years, he is succeeded in that post by George C. (Tommy) Thomas, one-time Denver newsman.

Pierre Berton's Berth

Pierre Berton, six years m.e. of Maclean's Magazine, now associate editor of Toronto Star, Canada's largest daily, whose editor is Beland Monderich. N.Z.-born Leslie F. Hannon moves up to m.e. at Maclean's, whose management is understood to have insisted that if Berton kept doing so much radio-tv interviewing he'd have to be identified with the mag henceforth. Canadian Broadcasting Corp. took position that they used him as an individual, not a mag rep.

Five or six years ago Yukon-born Berton, onetime Vancouver Sun reporter, did a Maclean's two-parter on Toronto Star, its founder, J. E. Atkinson, and its famous m.e. and later president H. C. Hindmarsh. Latter liked the story so much he commissioned Berton to do his obit for the morgue. When "HCH" died last year the more-than-full-page obit was used, and it was a natural that if Berton ever returned to newspaper work it would be to the Star.

Universal Copyright Conv.

In cooperation with the Copyright Society of the U.S.A., R.R. Bowker Co. has just published Arpad Bogsch's "Universal Copyright Convention (An Analysis and Commentary)" ($12), with special eye to the American literary and other copyright property values. Some 29 of the 50 countries which have pledged themselves to the original international copyright conclave in Geneva, Switzerland, dating from Sept. 16, 1955, have ratified the Universal Copyright Convention. Plinio Bolla sparked the idea of this book and Arthur Fisher, U.S. Register of Copyrights, encouraged the actual writing of this work in English. Walter J. Derenberg, president of the Copyright Society of the U.S.A., wrote an introduction accenting the rapport between UNESCO and the conclave.

It is fitting, as Frederic G. Melcher, president of the R.R. Bowker Co., observes that the company founded by Richard Rogers Bowker should also publish this work as it did "Copyright, Its History and Its Law" (1912), by Bowker, who had worked tirelessly for the development and passage of the Copyright Act of 1909. This book is a comprehensive exposition of all facets of the universal copyright convention, its formalities, rights, etc., obviously a must for copyright attorneys and all interested in the protection of property rights to copyrighted works.

SCULLY'S SCRAPBOOK

By Frank Scully

Hollywood, Oct. 14.

Walt Disney, the eminent zoologist who seems to have made a most profitable study out of the private lives of domestic and wild animals, recently released the news that the wolf is a nice, family-loving homebody. If this thing gets around, it will take one of the most picturesque sex epithets out of the so-called human race.

But long before Scientist Disney made his belated discovery there was a songwriter who dared to sign his lyrics "L. Wolfe Gilbert." I haven't the slightest idea whether that was his real name, and don't intend to ask him, as he has been using the split billing for at least 50 years. He is now 72 and full of joie de vivre as ever, and his friends —he seemingly has them everywhere—call him "Wolfie." It is difficult within a matter of minutes after knowing him to resist being drawn into this cozy syndrome.

Gilbert & Sullivan, American Version

The number of Gilberts in this country alone, if laid end to end, would reach from Hollywood to the Gilbert Islands. But Wolfie, a father of five, the youngest a doll of 16, is not related to many other Gilberts, least of all to the waspish Sir William Schwenck, the Gilbert of Gilbert & Sullivan. However, at one time Wolfie was a great friend of John L. Sullivan and often Gilbert & Sullivan were booked on the same vaude bill.

The Gilbert that Wolfie has to disavow most often, and that reluctantly, is Joanne Gilbert. It so happens her father is a songwriter, too—Ray Gilbert. He wrote "Zip-a-Dee Doo Dah," a simian sound-effect that won an Academy Award.

Wolfie has a brother and a niece or two in show business, and I believe his wife Rose, whose capsule beauty is what George Keats Jessel would call "a joy forever," got up and sang once. Considering that Wolfie is no Tony Martin, even when singing almost any of the thousand songs he has had a hand in, her voice must have reminded them of the gentle lark.

The Gershwin Bit

Though he has written the lyrics of all-time hits like "Ramona," "The Peanut Vendor," "Waiting for the Robert E. Lee," "Down Yonder," "Marta" and "I Miss My Swiss," in "Without Rhyme or Reason" he lists for several pages songs of his contemporaries which he wished he had written. This is as good an index to the charity of his lovely character as one can find, because it's on old story in Tin Pan Alley that when one is asked if a certain songwriter's tunes will be sung 25 years later, the answer is, "Yes, if he is still alive."

Wolfie's book is still selling in a homeopathic way and has gone into four editions. They were not big editions, and Wolfe carried the nut for the first edition. He has since come up with a nice profit. Any standard publisher who had a chance to sell a book which had a sure-fire sale of 12,000 copies and passed it up ought to have had his head shrunk. It is a good book, an honest biography, and explains in good humor what makes a songwriter tick.

Too Old To Retire

Apparently by now he is too old to retire, for he is still devoted to his craft and even more to his fellow-craftsmen. He is western rep of ASCAP, not on salary, but on call to hop to New York whenever a crisis develops among the men and women in the oddest union of them all, for ASCAP has a board of 12 publishers (bosses) and 12 songwriters (working stiffs), and its job is to see that every time you play you pay.

Wolfie started life in Philadelphia but at 19 he had a hole in the wall overlooking Broadway, his "office," and was listing himself as a songwriter. His first good one, oddly, was call "All Alone on Broadway." From there, he worked himself as a replacement into an act that was well established—Jolson, Palmer & Jolson. Al Jolson was pulling out and Harry had already gone when Wolfie took up partnership with Palmer. Palmer was a cripple who worked from a wheelchair, so his partner had to be a part-time nurse. They got booked into a house in New Jersey. The first three acts were "novelty" acts—all cripples! Before being fired himself as an idiot, the booker cancelled Palmer and Gilbert to restore some balance to this entertainment bill.

Palmer's Dutch Act Pancakes

They went back to their hotel. Wolfie stepped out to get some food for his handicapped partner, but returned to see if Palmer wanted anything else. He caught the cripple just as he was climbing out the window to end it all.

Wolfie couldn't begin lower than this, and obviously there was no way to go but up. After Palmer, he teamed with Pitzy Katen who later changed his name to Katz. At first they went up like an iron balloon, but it was in the days when a bad act could be booked and work up to something better, which presumably does not exist today.

Between the acts, Wolfie kept writing songs. "My Mother's Eyes," "Jeannine, I Dream of Lilac Time," "Mama Inez," "Lucky Lindy," "Take Me to That Swanee Shore" and "When I'm Alone With You, I'm Lonesome" were a few of the better-known ones. Between times he roamed, in song at least, as far as Hawaii, the French Riviera and Latin America, did some cowboy songs and indeed covered the whole field of popular music. In 45 years he has averaged at least 20 songs a year.

Last summer he took a tour of Europe and in Paris was to go on a tv show with a guy he was told had written "Ramona." Wolfie thought he and Mabel Wayne had written that one, but he was assured this guy not only wrote it, but had been honored for it. "In fact," his informant told Wolfie, "he is now a marquis."

"You mean they hung him outside the theatre?"

"No, they made him a real marquis." It subsequently developed the guy had merely translated Gilbert's lyrics into French.

Dukes, Marquises—All Songwriters

Wolfie reached in his bag of memory and explained that America went out for that sort of thing, too. "In fact, the composer of 'April in Paris' was a duke." They may have found out by now that the Duke's name was Vernon.

In Rome, Wolfie was invited by the Vatican to see the canonization of a Spanish saint, and this impressed him greatly. Then he went on to Israel and, like everybody else who has seen the transformation of that flock of desert rocks and sand dunes into a modern industrial and agricultural country, he was awed by what his people could do if given half a chance in their own native land.

Recently, back in L. A., he guestarred on Larry Finley's new television show "Music is My Beat" and the press reaction was unanimous in the belief that Wolfie made all the difference between just one of those things and a great show.

Buck's Own Follies

He has glowing and wonderful things to say about his friends and, most of all, about the late Gene Buck, who was his mentor in ASCAP. Wolfie has stacks and stacks of Gene's letters and telegrams wrapped in oilcloth in the garage of his Beverly Hills home. He says he never saw Gene take a drink, but he sure could get drunk on telegrams. Gene wrote or co-produced several Ziegfeld Follies, but the only frailty of Ziggy's that rubbed off on Gene, according to Wolfie, was Buck's determination to keep the telegraph companies solvent singlehanded. He would send Wolfie wires two and three hundred words long. Here is a typical non-telegraphic opening: "As I was lying in bed last night, I got to thinking of you and thought I ought to tell you," etc., etc., etc.

It is a matter of record that Postal Telegraph folded shortly after Gene quit writing telegrams.

No Dull Moments in Todd 'Lives'

the Showman of the Year. His untimely death at 51, 49, 47—his "statistics" got shorter on the count as his ebullience in battling middle-age grew stronger—will not diminish that honor. A legend in his own time, his showmanship has already taken its place with Barnum and Ziegfeld. Future spaceshowmanship will see him cast as the Diamond Jim Brady of this era, such was his personal flair for the lavish living.

From Avrom Hirsch Goldbogen, the poor Minneapolis urchin, to Mike Todd, the showman, the third-of-a-century of his mature life plays like a fictional script. A floating crap game operator, a millionaire at 19 building Hollywood soundproof studios, his active enterpreneurship touches on the life and times of the contemporary "greats" in all walks of the lively arts. He also was Big Business in action but concluded that when he put over a sharp deal he was voted a "con man"; when the industrialists, who were in with him on Cinerama and Todd-AO (and eased him out of both), put over a similar deal, they were called "astute business men."

Bootleg Reading

Todd lived his nine lives to the fullest. They were replete with melodrama and mellowness. A hustler, yet he was "an Oxford scholar disguised as a mugg," in George Jean Nathan's opinion. His "bootleg reading," as Nathan called it, gave Todd an erudition denied him through conventional scholastic pursuits. A tough trader, he was a softie to pals—and particularly in his relations with Michael Jr. In the opinion of one of Todd's most veteran angels, Jack Dietz, "If it wasn't for Junior, Mike would be a bum."

His legit show business career embraced the production of 16 ventures which grossed $18,000,000. In one year he had four shows concurrent, and his take-home profit was $20,000 a week. He was elected Abbott of the Friars and that theatrical retreat, already his second home, became his home-base for gin rummy gambling at $10 a point and losses of $50,000 a session. He was Broadway's prize pigeon at cards. When he wound up a bankrupt for $1,105,616.78, he observed, "What do you want me to do, cut down on my cigars?" While broke and owing he entertained lavishly at his Irvington-on-Hudson estate, with John Blondell, his second wife, and promoted $200,000 to float further theatrical ventures.

Barouches & Broughams

He took his "Up in Central Park" first night audience from the Century Theatre to the Tavern-on-the Green in barouches, fiacres, broughams and carriages for a champagne-and-caviar party, just to top Billy Rose's post-premiere champagne shindig in the basement of his Ziegfe'd Theatre on the occasion of "7 Lively Arts." He was almost the victim of a Chi "snatch" because he refused to work with the "mob" (yet his throwaway line for some Broadwayite that "He's one of the mob" was the complete accolade).

He "promoted" astute business men, and also Mrs. Lorraine Manville Gould Aldao Dresselhuys, with whom he was romantically linked. His life touched intimately on Muriel Page, Chicago "flame dancer," whom he payrolled at $65-a-week and sold to the Casino de Paree, N.Y., at $750. Later it was Joan Blondell, Mae West, Gypsy Rose Lee, Marlene Dietrich, Evelyn Keyes—and "Meet Miss Lizzie Schwartzkopf," as he kiddingly introduced Elizabeth Taylor to pals in Hollywood, New York, London and Paris.

Down the Middle

This is no glorified obituary. His Boswell has maintained a scrupulously detached perspective. To those who knew Todd over the years, certainly longer than did Art Cohn, the biographer rates a posthumous salute for his keen perception, although it is not surprising considering Cohn's rich newspaper experience.

Cohn has made the blog a curiously contemperaneous work about a recently demised subject; it's as living and vibrant as if both were still on earth. The publisher wisely left it that way. The saga fades out on the Acapulco honeymoon cottage Feb. 2, 1957.

Cohn seemingly had a photographic word mind and memory. His reportage of Toddisms is phenomenally faithful.

He has captured the flavor of the flamboyant showman in every faithful detail. His reportage gives "Nine Lives" a fictional bounce which should make the book timeless in its appeal. It is compelling reading.

Showman By Instinct

The sideline observer will emerge with mixed emotions about Todd. He was, of course, an instinctive showman. He was sharp, betimes bordering on the illegal but no matter the degree of his aggressive resourcefulness, he was never dull.

Todd was a stimulus and, more important, he was stimulating unto himself.

From his lowly carnival pitch days, through the N.Y. World's Fair, to Broadway, to his abortive Hollywood film production span, until he finally hit the jackpot with Todd-AO and eventually his monumental "Around the World." Todd was lavish in everything he did. When, in a single week, in June of 1957, he bought a half-million dollars worth of jewels and paintings in Paris for his bride, his son Michael Jr. admonished, "Dad, you're going now like you did when you didn't have it."

For almost 10 years since "Up in Central Park," his last big hit in 1945, Todd had parlayed himself into the poorhouse. In that span Bertha Fleshman Todd, his first wife, died under tragic and quasi-mysterious circumstances which further badgered the beleaguered producer. He had lost his Del Mar (Calif.) Racetrack, fiascoed his film production opportunity, had gone into bankruptcy, had been eased out of Cinerama and Todd-AO.

Birth of '80 Days'

Then he saw "Around the World in 80 Days," in Sir Alexander Korda's office in London. Latter told him to back away from it; that he had even had Orson Welles shoot some test footage; it was too tough, expensive, etc. The rest is history.

In the Welles-Todd imbroglio as to how the idea of filming the Jules Verne classic was spawned, biographer Cohn plays it down the middle by paralleling each of their version.

In like manner, he quotes a cross-section of Todd's pals (including this reviewer), but perhaps the shrewdest closeup on the showman is that of Evelyn Keyes: "He has a strong persecution complex working against him. It's unworthy of him and infuriates me."

Todd's aphorisms and colorful speech are already part of the Broadway legend. A square was a "civilian." Todd's lingo made him automatic good copy and he knew it.

"Money is only important if you haven't got it." was a favorite axiom and Todd lived by it. "Do you hear me good!" was his admonishment for emphasis. The menu was the "scratch-sheet." The items thereon "the entries." To him "the groceries" always had to be good.

Advice to a Commissar

"Educate me," he told an associate, "and we'll both be out of work." When he was on the USSR cultural kick he told Vladimir Surin, the Vice-Minister of Culture, whom he entertained at his Park Ave. penthouse where the Broadway bunch got a closeup on the vodka kid, "You Russians have the wrong attitude. Be a man, Vladimir, but also treat others like men. Learn to say 'Can I?', not 'I want.'"

Slogans like "In Todd we trust" and "Uncle Todd's Cabin" were Broadway naturals. Latter had to do with the time he was touring Bill Robinson in "The Hot Mikado."

Todd's production career wasn't all "tall dames and low comedy." He was on a "problem play" kick with an ill-fated "Pick Up Girl." When he produced the Maurice Evans "GI version" of "Hamlet," Tooks Shor declaimed, at intermission, "I'm the only crum-bun in the theatre that don't know how it ends and I'm going back to find out."

Censorship—World Complex

Local censors were having their innings last week on widely-separated fronts.

In Spain, permission to dub "A Farewell to Arms" was given only after David O. Selznick had agreed that the Spanish-language version would indicate that Rock Hudson and Jennifer Jones were secretly married throughout the film, thus giving moral sanction to their love making.

In South Africa, the censors pulled a surprise re "South Pacific." They didn't touch the "You've Got to be Taught How to Hate" number, but objected to the "There's Nothing Like a Dame" bit. Reason: It's sung by a Negro while mingling with whites.

Gambling Bill Finds Fla. Hotels On the Fence; See Shorter Junkets

Miami Beach, Oct. 21.

Efforts by Florida interests to legalize gambling in this state, or at least to get an unofficial go-ahead on casino activities, is drawing some head scratching among the hotel gentry. Not all are agreed that it would be good for the resort.

Fear is being expressed that legal greenfelts would soon reduce overall stays in Miami Beach, just as it has done in Havana and Las Vegas. In the latter, the average stop comes to about three days, and in Havana the mean stand is about four days. Many bonifaces fear that it would be the death of longterm hotel occupancy.

The Florida innkeepers hold that anyone who hankers for a go at the cubes need only hop a plane to Havana, just a little more than an hour away, win or lose his wad, and then return, his gaming instincts having been satisfied. Proximity and constant exposure, it's seen, would, in the long run, reduce the overall bankroll to the point where those coming down for What's a Critic Worth?

How much value does one put on a tv critic's life? NBC has arbitrarily chosen the figure of $100,000. That is, if anything happens to him while he's flying. (If he's got his feet on the ground the valuation is pared to $20,000.)

In flying some 80 tv critics and editors in to N.Y. this week from all parts of the country, NBC enclosed (with the plane tickets) notification of NBC—paid insurance, setting the above-mentioned ceilings. There's no discrimination. Everybody rates equal payoff.

Dancers, Hurt En Route To Date, Sue AGVA for 17G; Spot 'Unfair' Is Defense

Dancers Bobby & Ginger Joyce have filed a $17,000 damage suit against the American Guild of Variety Artists and the AGVA Welfare Trust Fund, along with the union's officers and national board in the N.Y. Supreme Court. They're seeking damages as the result of an auto accident sustained three years ago on their way from a nitery in Canada. They haven't worked since.

The Joyces allege that they should have been insured under terms of the AGVA Welfare Trust Fund. However, the union countered with the statement that the cafe was on the "unfair" list and shouldn't have been played. Team stated that the spot wasn't included in the union's publication as being unfair, and there was no way of knowing its status.

James C. Bruscia is representing the Joyces.

Heap Big Praise & Coin Loss (75G) On Astaire TV'er

Fred Astaire's reluctance to do another spec this season (it's natural that NBC would overture him pronto in view of his last week's click) reportedly stems from the fact that the hour show, according to "inside sources" resulted in a loss of $75,000 to the packagers. This includes the many weeks of painstaking rehearsals, etc.

Astaire and producer-director Bud Yorkin had a cut of the MCA package. However, in view of the fanfare accrusing to NBC for turning in the spec of the year, it's more than likely that the network would go for any coin rap.

JOHN SHUBERT ON REALTY REALITIES

By ABEL GREEN

John Shubert, as son of J. J. Shubert and only direct-descendant of the legit dynasty of showmen, has some firm views on the current facelifting of the Broadway legitimate theatres in which, as owners of 19 (it was originally 23) playhouses, his company has vital concern. He endorses the enterprise and good taste of Robert W. Dowling and his colleagues in City Playhouses and what they have done with the Helen Hayes (nee Fulton), the Lunt-Fontanne (nee Globe), plan to do for the Martin Beck, and have manifested in their other theatres (Coronet, ANTA, etc.). But, punctuates the younger Shubert, "there are certain realities, especially with the present situation of Lee Shubert's estate, and the basic economics, which may not meet the eye." It also ties in with the Shubert Foundation as detailed below.

For one thing, he explains, it would require a basic $80,000-per-theatre for complete facelifting, overhaul, airconditioning, etc. Multiply this by 19 and it's a $1,500,000 cash outlay or thereabouts.

In the Shuberts' inner circle there lies too vividly still the memory of three depressions which they experienced and the economic turmoil encountered.

"Somehow we are inculcated with the idea that if it will do, then let it alone although, don't forget, we have a permanent staff of painters, decorators and handymen that is never less than eight and is 12 in the summer when theatres are dark and we can do some facelifting.

"Now it becomes a problem of where do we start and where does it end? No. 1, Mr. Lee's estate is still in the flux of appraisal and the referee, Ed Weisl, were to decide it should be paid off in cash instead of shares any one can see

Brussels Jury ('The Young in Heart') Can't Choose All-Time Greatest Film

Brussels, Oct. 21.

The big quest for "the greatest motion picture of all time" has produced only a cipher here. The "young" jury voted not to make a designation or give the award which was to have been a memory of the 1958 Brussels World's Fair. Some 117 film historians around the world had sifted 12 nominations. Their labors were put aside, the jurors deciding that too many styles of production and too broad a time-span (1895 to 1955) was involved. Preponderance of silent films and absence of Japanese also prejudiced the decision in favor of no decision.

Though later heckled for abdicating its assigned function to select the all-time great, jury would only state the six films still held "value" for young film-makers. These are:

"Potemkin."
"Grande Illusion."
"Mother Passion."
"Jeanne d'Arc."
"Gold Rush."
"The Bicycle Thief."

Brussels picked its jury on basis of their being youthful and themselves winners of festival prizes. They were Robert Aldrich (U.S.); Satjajit Ray (India); Alexander Atruc (France); Michael Cocayannis (Greece); Juan Bardem (Spain); Francesco Masselli (Italy); Alexander Mackendrick Britain).

Jack Buchanan's Biog

London, Oct. 21.

Herbert Wilcox is to film a musical biography of the late Jack Buchanan, as seen through the eyes of his widow, who will work on the screenplay. Possible title, "There's Always Tomorrow."

Mrs. Buchanan will insist on approving the artists chosen to represent her husband and herself, and Wilcox talks of a world search for players of top roles as well as imitators of Beatrice Lillie, Gertrude Lawrence, C. B. Cochran and Anna Neagle. Wilcox expects to start the film early next year.

MCA's $10,000,000 Offer Reported For Univ. Studio

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

In at least a partial liquidation, Universal reportedly has placed its 480-acre studio on the block at an asking price of $10,000,000. Most interested, at present, in taking over the San Fernando Valley lot is Music Corp. of America.

Conversations concerning the takeover have been carried on between Milton R. Rackmil, president of U, and Lew Wasserman, head of MCA, but these were suspended when the latter went to Europe. He's due back Thursday (23) and it's expected the talks will resume shortly thereafter.

Significant angle is that such an unloading would not mean the end of U's film-making. The company reportedly is asking for leaseback space at the studio for its own feature production program.

The U lot generally is regarded as the most valuable in the San Fernando Valley area. Most of it is situated on the Hollywood Free-

Menshikov to Keep Date With B'casters Despite Soviet Rap of CBS Show

More than ordinary attention will be paid to USSR Ambassador Mikhail Menshikov's upcoming appearance at the Radio-TV Executives Society luncheon on Wednesday, Nov. 19 at the Roosevelt Hotel in view of Moscow's recent protest of CBS' telecast of the "Plot to Kill Stalin" and the Soviet Union's order closing down the CBS Moscow Bureau.

Ambassador Menshikov's agreed to speak at the monthly "Newsmaker Luncheon" before CBS had broadcast the much-disputed drama. However, Donald H. McGannon, prexy of the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. stations, and the Radio-TV Executive Society; Joe Baudino, WBC veep and Michael R. Santangelo, public relations director of WBC as well as chairman of the public relations committee of the RTES, met with the Russian ambassador in Washington last week to discuss details of the luncheon.

Ambassador Menshikov said he would speak for 20 minutes and answer written questions submitted from the audience. The q&a period would be 10 minutes. The Russian diplomat will discuss the USSR-

Coast's Beat Generation Whips Up B.O. Medley of Coffee, Culture, Comics

By RON SILVERMAN

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

As the night clubs go out of business, the coffee houses are going into business. And much of the jump and excitement that has put this area's coffee house trend into night-time orbit is being given an extra shove by live entertainment. Just as the nitery shutterings detract from Los Angeles' talent showcase, so these little coffee houses are adding to it.

The effect, thus far, is small. Only a few of the houses have booked fullscale shows, while the majority thrive on small combos and impromptu entertainment. The swing to coffee houses and a new concept in entertainment is up, and there's every indication this newly created L. A. atmosphere will become an important spawning ground for new show business entries. It already has happened in San Francisco where a young comedian-satirist named Mort Sahl first found an audience.

Cosmo Alley

One of the more extensive bookings takes place at Cosmo Alley, located, oddly enough, on Cosmo Alley just off the heart of Hollywood. As most coffee houses, this one was launched in trade by the Beat Generation, but publicity that brought in the "squares" has driven out most of the Beatniks. The crowd, nonetheless, is a "hip" one and one that demands top offbeat entertainment. Currently holding forth is Theodore Bikel, an actor of no mean talent and a foreign-tongue folk singer of fair exuberance. His songs are American, Hebrew, Russian, Yiddish, Italian, Greek and Spanish. His voice breathes enthusiasm, as does his guitar, and particularly for the

Now once again the house lights fade,
The actors take their places;
And the same old odds are being laid
By the guys with seamy faces.

It's seven-to-one that you cannot win,
Yet suckers crowd the layers;
But taking their money ain't no sin—
They love to mix with players.

So spin the wheel or roll the bones
In this tinseled gaming place:
Winning cheers drown losing groans—
We're back in the Old Rat Race.

Hilton Hotels International is in a spot with its soon-due link in Cairo, slated for a December opening. It will be preceded by the unveiling of the new Hilton Berlin in Western Germany which hasn't the same politico complications attendant to the Hilton Nile.

While it's being built with Egyptian capital, some of Hilton's colleagues reportedly have urged scrapping that venture "because all it will be able to draw on for patronage are East Europeans, the Arabs themselves and Oriental travelers; Nasser's regime must alienate patronage from the western bloc." However, Hilton is going forward on all plans.

Offspring of two show biz names, Lorraine Bendix and Harold Lloyd Jr. (who prefers the Duke Lloyd billing) have combined in a new vaude-nitery act. Femme is the daughter of William Bendix. They got a sporadic showcasing on the "I've Got A Secret" tv show last week along with Sam Levenson and his six brothers and sister (who do a gypsy orchestra "act") and David (Dana's son) Andrews, who plays the organ, under a category of "things in common."

Bendix & Lloyd are being handled by Lee Shepherd of MCA. Act is awaiting the return of her parents, Tess and Bill Bendix, who flew to London for a 10-day quickie holiday.

Edith Piaf, now recovered from injuries suffered in an auto accident, will fill her date in the Empire Room of the Waldorf-Astoria, N.Y., opening Jan. 26. She was originally slated to open the Waldorf's fall season.

Miss Piaf follows Eartha Kitt who is playing the Christmas and New Year weeks in the Empire Room.

Rodeos Hungry For Names, Even Scout TV Heroes

Problem of rodeo headliners has become so acute that it's contemplating use of cowboy names from television. Rodeo promoters know that most of them haven't an act worthy of exhibition on bigtime. However, they believe that they are good for one time around on the basis of the name value. As long as the vogue for westerns continue, they will have a steady supply.

However, the promoters are hopeful that some of the videoites will come along with sufficient talent to become a staple on the horse circuit.

It is known that the rodeo regulars have been shown too often to bring in maximum returns. For example, Roy Rogers didn't hit maximum response at the Madison Square Garden, N.Y. on his recent trip. Top business was done weekends only. It's anticipated that next year's rodeo will have a shorter stay than this year.

The forced reliance on names that do not have commensurate talent isn't figured to do the rodeo industry much good, in the long run. However, the entrepreneurs feel that they have no choice in the matter at this time, with so little to choose from. They have the idea that inasmuch as the shows are pitched at youngsters, the kids may be satisfied with autographs, a handshake or tossing of souvenirs to the assemblage. Just how many years they'll go for this remains to be seen, but they hope that it won't be too long before some sock new tanbark talent developes.

Curb Soldiers As TV-Pic Actors

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

The Dept. of Defense hereafter will be guided by a set of recommendations drawn up by the Screen Actors Guild, in granting Hollywood producers the use of military personnel for both motion picture and television work.

As a result of a series of complaints by the performers union and AFL Hollywood Film Council over the use of uniformed military personnel in roles actors might otherwise have played in, James W. Platt, special assistant to Assistant Secretary of Defense Charles C. Finucane, sessioned here last week with reps of various Hollywood guilds.

Conclusion arrived at was that the SAG would make certain recommendations for Defense Dept's guidance. These will apply particularly to use of the military overseas in film work.

Ashkenazy's Dad a Jazz Pianist

By JAY LEWIS

Washington, Oct. 21.

Vladmir Ashkenazy failed to wow them at his American debut in Washington. But blame it on Chopin. The undeniably brilliant 21-year-old Muscovite opened the National Symphony's season here with Concerto No. 2 in F Minor.

Ashkenazy's masterful interpretation of the demanding work drew warm applause and three bows from the near-capacity crowd at Constitution Hall. But no one stood up to demand an encore.

Ashkenazy at 19 copped first prize at the "Davis Cup" of the keyboard—the nightmarishly difficult Queen Elizabeth competition in Brussels. But he's a cloistered artist—discovered and nurtured by protective Kremlin culturecrats—with none of Van Cliburn's flair and showmanship.

Nestled among Soviet officials, the fragile, boyish Ashkenazy faced newsmen at the Russian Embassy before his debut performance Tuesday (14). About the only startling thing to emerge was that his father is a touring jazz pianist. When asked how he liked his father's art, Ashkenazy, showing amused astonishment, replied he didn't—"no pleasure" in it.

Steinberg's Death Recalls Old Cafes

Veteran of Volstead Days Close to Sime Silverman—A Great Fav at Hillcrest

By ABEL GREEN

Part of a chapter in the saga of Broadway's brightest nights, from just before pre-Prohibition and throughout the Volsteadian era, was recalled with the death on Saturady (18) of John Steinberg, 72, at Cedars of Lebanon Hospital in Hollywood. He was a heart victim. Almost immediately upon his return from an extended European trip, in company with a retired manufacturer, Gene Friedman, he complained that "the pressurized plane cabin over the polar route" had effected his heart. Intensive two-month journey, covering virtually every capital of Europe, apparently taxed him too much.

Nitery host who, for the 15 years until his retirement three years ago, was managing director of the Hillerest Country Club, L.A., became a widower two years ago. Berlin's Festival Of Arts Dullish

By HANS HOEHN

Berlin, Oct. 21.

This year's (eighth) Berlin Cultural Festival (17 days) was less imposing than other years but the main point, showcasing of the free countries' art "within sight" of the Communists' sector of Berlin and Germany, is to be considered. The festival retains a free world propaganda value.

Of the five last presentations, the American "Look Homeward, Angel" was perhaps the most cheered. Boleslaw Barlog, getting the jump on London, Vienna and Hamburg, led his Schiller Theater ensemble in a fine performance. Adaptor Ketti Frings attended. Cast headed by Lucie Mannheim, Alfred Schieska, Klaus Kammer (who had a personal triumph with John Osborne's "Look Back in

CRITICS CRITICIZE EACH OTHER

Archer Winsten Re 'Pressure'

Archer Winsten, film critic of the N.Y. Post, devoted his space Monday (20) to the "pressure" issue. After setting the scene for public understanding of the problem Winsten stated that his own paper gives him no word when pressure is attempted.

Commenting on the broader problem: "The very essence of such pressure's effectiveness lies in its being hidden from public view. It is a slow poison working steadily to soften the critical approach, to weight the balances in favor of high budget (big advertising campaign), American (patriotic argument), pure entertainment (are you an egghead?) pictures."

After detailing other subtle pressures, Winsten concludes "I have never heard of a critic losing his job because he was wrong. Two did lose theirs because they were too harshly right."

Wall St. Dreams of TV Selloff Which Will End-Run Guilds

Possibility exists that the post-1948 production of a major company may go to television without any clearances with the various Hollywood guilds. These latter groups haven't come to terms with any studio so far on the extent of their cut in the event of disposal of "modern" product to video.

But they want a percentage that's substantial—this is for sure—and this has served as a deterring sale factor. Actually, the unions of producers, directors, performers and writers have no contractual guarantee of participation in tv money except in sporadic instances.

However, they have a bargaining weapon in the potential threat of work-stoppage reprisals against any lot which unloads the pictures to the home-screen medium without "sharing" the revenue.

As for the aforementioned possibility of a sale without dividing the loot with the guilds, this is the subject of conversation among some influential Wall Streeters and it concerns Loew's.

There has been no decision as yet as to which of the two after-divorcement Loew's companies is to take title to the backlog—whether the studio or the theatre end. But if the theatre division does take over the post-1948's, and decides to sell them to tv, a significant question arises as to what action the guilds could take.

Specifically, Loew's Theatres, on the surface, at least, would be in the position of being able to divest these film properties, would be under no contractual obligation to the guilds, and would have no retaliatory maneuvering on the part of the guilds to worry about.

Whether there's any such intention of doing this or not on the part of management, this is the way the talk is going in some Wall Street quarters and clearly it has some significance.

There's another angle being given consideration. On the overall, the Loew's-Metro product has lost money and this can be interpreted as accounting for the corporation's indebtedness of $24,000,000. United Artists already has sold 20 pictures to tv without any payment to the guilds, and for the reason the pictures wound up in the red.

If independent producers, via UA, can do this, why not Loew's? This point, too, is part of the downtown conversation.

Put This in Bronze!

Chicago, Oct. 21.

In all of filmdom, it's claimed by 20th-Fox prexy Spyros Skouras, it's the grey-flannelers who have it the worst.

"If a picture is successful the exhibitor, distributor and producer take the credit. If a picture is a failure the exhibitor absolves himself of any blame; the distributor abdicates his responsibility; and the producer, of course, refuses his share entirely. And they all point the finger of blame at the advertising department."

United Artists' Buyout of Oldies For Syndicating

United Artists Associated Inc., subsidiary of United Artists, over the past weekend completed total acquisition of all assets of Associated Artists Productions. Negotiations had been going on for more than a year.

Properties taken over by UA under the deal include the Warner film library consisting of 800 sound and 200 silent features, 60 "Looney Tunes" cartoons, 277 "Merrie Melodies," 234 "Popeyes," about 1,400 straight shorts and numerous other pictures.

Total amount of money involved in the transaction comes to around $30,000,000. This is in the form of payments to AAP stockholders, by UA, of $11 for each share of AAP stock held in addition to pro rata amounts for AAP debentures and stock warrants.

The pictures are for television licensing and the AAP method of operation, and this outfit's personnel, will continue as before. Eliot Hyman is head of AAP.

Wrapup of the deal was disclosed by Hyman and Robert S. Benjamin, UA board chairman.

HEATED DEBATE OVER EINFELD

Is it "unethical" of film companies to pressure newspapers for good reviews? And is such pressure the legitimate concern of a Film Critics Circle as a group?

These matters developed heated discussion at a meeting in Manhattan last week. With everyone talking at once, only one thing was crystal clear last week: The N. Y. film critics, easily the most influential bunch of reviewers in the country, can't get together on anything beyond the voting for their annual awards.

It's not only that several leading critics prefer to lonewolf it, but the meeting last week "discovered" that the loosely-organized group doesn't even have any by-laws to define its scope and set the voting procedure.

There'll be other meetings, but meanwhile Alton Cook of the World Telegram & Sun was appointed as a committee of one to draw up a belated constitution for the group.

The ethics question was raised via two incidents as reported in last week's VARIETY: (1.) Justin Gilbert, critic for the N. Y. Daily Mirror, complained that he had been excessively "pressured" by Charles Einfeld, ad-pub v.p. of 20th-Fox, who complained about him to the publisher of the Mirror in a cablegram. Gilbert wanted the critics as a unit to censure Einfeld. (2.) William K. Zinsser, former critic of the N. Y. Herald Tribune, stated in a piece for Esquire Magazine that the film companies were bringing undue influence to bear on publishers in an effort to get favorable reviews.

At the meeting last week, called to act on the Gilbert complaint, it turned out that the critics are a highly individualistic lot. There were two distinct points-of-view. There may have been a third one, but neither Rose Pelswick nor anyone else from the Journal-American showed up, and the Daily News' Kate Cameron and Wanda Hale were absent, though Dorothy Masters attended, being an official of the group. The N. Y. Herald Tribune men came instructed to talk all they wanted, but not to vote.

Main Trends

Opinions sounded at the meeting were:

(a) The critics had a responsibility to themselves and to the public to not only resist film company pressure beyond normal complaints, but also to air the facts about such tactics as widely as possible. This group takes the position that newspapermen have standards and must speakup for them—as a group if necessary—if the ethics of the profession are threatened, and regardless of whether that threat comes from the advertiser or the publisher.

(b) Contrariwise, the question of reviews is between a critic and his

'Wilful Contempt' of Schine Circuit Upheld by Court of Appeals

Conviction of the Schine Circuit and four of its officers for flouting provisions of a 1949 consent decree it entered into with the Government was upheld Mon. (20) by the U. S. Court of Appeals. Defendants were cited for contempt in March, 1957 by Federal Judge Harold P. Burke in Buffalo district court and were hit with fines totalling $73,000.

Terms of the 1949 decree called for the Schine chain to divest 39 theatres before a June, 1953 deadline. When the circuit failed to comply with the judgment, the Government brought suit in 1954 to cite the loop and its officers for contempt. Following a trial Judge Burke found that the defendants "wilfully disobeyed by omitting certain theatres from published advertisements of sale." He then levied the fines.

In upholding the lower court, the opinion of Chief Judge Charles E. Clark of the Appeals Tribunal said in part: ". . . the evidence shows a continuous scheme to thwart the court's decree and offers to sell by ignoring and discouraging inquiries from brokers and prospective purchasers and by refusing to provide them with theatre operating figures."

The $73,000 in contempt fines meted out by Judge Burke was imposed as follows: president J. Myer Schine, $25,000; Schine Chain Theatres, $25,000; Donald G. Schine, Howard Antevil and John A. May, $5,000 each, while eight subsidiary Schine corporations were slapped with a $1,000 bite apiece.

Hoot Gibson Thisaway

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Hoot Gibson, one of the screen's early western greats, returns to films for a role in Mahin-Rackin's "The Horse Soldiers," starring John Wayne and William Holden.

Director John Ford, who megged Gibson during his palmy days at old Universal, flew to actor's ranch home outside Las Vegas to personally sign him for part.

Darryl Zanuck's Boxoffice Score As-Independent

With Darryl F. Zanuck's "Roots of Heaven," his third for 20th-Fox as an independent, now launched at the Palace, N.Y., as a roadshow (to mixed reviews but a good advance sale), the Zanuck scorecard at 20th now reads:

"Island in the Sun": Domestic—$3,700,000, 10,000 dates, 67 weeks in release. Foreign (when played off)—$3,500,000.

"The Sun Also Rises": Domestic—$2,011,000, 9,800 dates, 56 weeks in release. Foreign (when played off)—over $4,000,000.

Total worldwide for the two: Over $13,000,000.

"Sun Also Rises," being Hemingway, is showing better gross abroad than "Island." Same will probably be true of the allegorical "Roots of Heaven."

Zanuck, who was in N.Y. for the opening of "Roots," left for London Monday (20) but expects to return within 10 days to two weeks to huddle with Irwin Shaw who's scripting "DeLuxe Tour." Shaw also is polishing "Patate," the Gilbert Miller production of the Marcel Achard play. If show opens well, Shaw will probably meet Zanuck in London or Paris.

ADAPT 'THE ENTERTAINER'

Not Sure If Larry Olivier Will Repeat Title Role

London, Oct. 21.

Nigel Kneale, better known for his science-fiction, is to write the screenplay of John Osborne's play, "The Entertainer," which is skedded to be shot next spring.

It is not certain that Sir Laurence Olivier, who starred in the play in London and on Broadway, will be in the film version. Olivier is said to have doubts as to whether the play can be turned successfully into a film.

Any 'Late' Shows Are Opposed

Regina, Sask., Oct. 21.

City council has decided there will be no Sunday midnight films in Regina.

A bylaw amendment which would have permitted shows between midnight and 2 a.m. Monday was refused a third reading after several letters of protest—mostly from Protestant churches—were read.

The request for Sunday midnight shows had been made by Hilliard Gunn, manager of the Capitol theatre. He pointed out that such movies are offered by drive-in theatres outside the city.

Church organizations were concerned with the effect late shows would have on the "health" of children, their ability to concentrate on studies during school hours, and their moral welfare.

"Late shows are to be discouraged, whether indoor, outdoor or on television," said one letter.

One alderman said he couldn't see what purpose the late shows would serve and another said they would require extra transport and police services, thus adding to the city's expenses.

Joe Vogel to Woo Stock Analysts

Joseph R. Vogel, president of Loew's, appears set to make a pitch for the Wall Street vote. At any rate the chief exec will appear before the Society of Security Analysts at a luncheon-meeting in New York tomorrow (Thurs.).

Vogel thus is to expose himself to what undoubtedly will be some intensive probing about the financial condition of Loew's at the present time and the future prospects. The analysts, who appraise stocks for their respective brokerage and market advisory compa-

Studio Overhead Ever The Curse; Hecht Reveals Production Modesty

"Blockbuster" may be the magic word as far as the picture industry is concerned, but there are indications that certain elements in the business, particularly well-placed independent producers, are becoming disenchanted with a steady diet of the king-sized entries. This does not mean that they have any thought of abandoning the multi-million dollar spectacles, but there is an undeniable feeling that more concentration should be placed on the so-called medium budget films.

One of the chief proponents of this theory is Harold Hecht, of the eminently successful firm of Hecht-Hill-Lancaster, just back from London where he supervised the production of the company's film version of George Bernard Shaw's "The Devil's Disciple," with Burt Lancaster and Sir Laurence Olivier, Hecht declared that his company, which plans to make fewer features than heretofore, would at the same time pay more attention to medium budget offerings. By medium budget, he said he meant pictures that could be made with the expenditure of below-the-line costs ranging from $200,000 to $350,000. In some instances, he noted, the entire picture would be completed in the $200,000 to $350,000 range.

According to Hecht, the concentration will be on the story value and efforts would be made to save on the actual production costs. For example, he noted that HHL's film version of the legit play, "Summer of the 17th Doll," which will be filmed in Australia, would involve an expenditure of $550,000 for the cast and the story while only $250,000 would be spent on the physical production, a situation made possible by selecting Australia as the production site.

A pioneer among the latter day indie producers, HHL is now marking its 10th anni as a production company. During that period, it made 18 pictures, all of which with the exception of "Sweet Smell of Success," a critical but not a financial click, emerged as b.o. winners. Hecht agreed that HHL, which has mushroomed almost to the status of a major company, had inherited some of the problems inherent in the operation of a major company. Because of contract commitments with stars, writers and

NEPAL STUDIO TALKS OF HUDSON OR GRANGER

New Delhi, Oct. 21.

Rock Hudson or, alternatively, Stewart Granger is to be offered the lead role in an upcoming feature to be directed by Indian film actress Protima Das Gupta for Nepal Studios.

Feature, "Jung Bahadur," a biopic on a monarch of the Himalayan kingdom of Nepal, will be photographed in Eastman Color. Nepalese prince-producer is making the film in both English and Hindi language.

Miss Das Gupta will start negotiations later this year with star to play male lead.

Wanted: Cure For Exhibs' Melancholia

It's convention and stock-taking time for American film exhibitors and the big, anxious question in the showmen's minds today is: Where is the industry going?

The question is not asked idly, and the answers, despite some seemingly obvious straws-in-the-wind, cannot be simple, if given at all. They are rooted as much in the over-all American economy as they are in the industry's present uncertain state-of-mind.

Exhibitors realize that the problem is no longer one of having to overcome just another crisis. It is not even one that answers to the old cliche that "there's nothing wrong with the business that good pictures won't cure." The immediate and pressing necessity is one of trying to gauge a shifting future, of adjusting to it realistically, and of seeking ways and means of protecting a business which, in its former established form, is no longer a fixed value.

Those who deal with exhibitors, and who are familiar with their attitudes all over the country, say they are deeply concerned over the theatremen's apparent "resignation to the inevitable." Beneath the traditional and almost instinctive optimism of the showmen they perceive a lack of "fighting spirit," an almost paralyzing concession to the negative, which virtually precludes drastic and effective counter-action.

Slackening Confidence

"They no longer have the faith," said a N.Y. distributor last week. "With things the way they are, they don't believe in the future, at least not in the future of the theatres."

Exhibs, in turn, place the blame for a good many of their problems squarely on the doorstep of production—distribution, arguing that the companies have paved the way for the decline of the business.

While the theatres charge production with pulling in its horns, and distribution with gouging them, they are in turn accused of being the "weak link" in the industry structure, making on the whole no more than a minimal effort to turn the tide and lacking that aggressive spirit needed to hold the established audiences and attract new ones.

There are the exceptions, of course, and this was emphasized in Robert J. O'Donnell's keynote speech at the Theatre Owners of America convention, in which he outlined the measures his Interstate circuit had taken to stimulate attendance. If it is true, however, that showmanship at the exhibition level isn't dead, it's also true that a large majority of theatremen never seem to have gotten over the war years, when business was lush and the boxoffice thrived on virtually anything with no additional push needed.

The spirit of exhibition today is characterized by an intense feeling of frustration and confusion tinged with a touch of helplessness in the face of audience unpredictability. With television still a heavy competitor, though its impact has worn off slightly, some of the pictures which—by the rule of the book—should have done well, have disappointed. Others have been surprise hits. The staples are no longer staples and the offbeat isn't necessarily a cure.

Avalanche of New Conditions

Audiences have moved to the suburbs, but not all of the neighborhoods are doing well. The film companies, once tied so strongly to exhibition (still their major customer) have sold their libraries to tv and over the theatres' heads, like the sword of Damocles, hangs the possibility of the sale of the post-1948s by companies for which that revenue may spell the difference between red and black, continuity or ruin.

On the one hand, exhibitors are being told—as Spyros P. Skouras told the Allied convention in Chicago last week—that they must modernize and serve convenience and comfort along with well-projected films. On the other, business fortunes have fluctuated so much that few operators feel justified in laying out large sums on renovation.

The exhibitors, who once turned to the Government for relief, again look to Washington, but the Justice Department isn't too kindly if proposals sound "radical" and some exhibition leaders doubt that even the restoration of showcases to the distributors would motivate greater production volume at the studios.

Finally, exhibitors are somewhat disgusted with their own kind, their lack of unity, their inability to take effective common action in their own interest, though the fight to reduce the admissions tax can be cited as an exception.

To a considerable and quite significant extent, exhibitors already have acted—individually—to meet new conditions. Chains have trimmed "marginal" theatres and prospects are for a considerable contraction of the whole exhibition plant. Ernest Stellings, the outgoing president of Theatre Owners of America, estimated recently that, if current conditions continue, there may be no more than 15,000 or so hardtops and drive-ins in the country by next year.

Are There Too Many Seats?

A lot of theatremen, primarily the chains, are frank in their belief that the U.S. today is overseated. There aren't enough pictures to go around, nor is there enough of an audience. In many instances there are theatres in the wrong locations. The considerable changes in the ownerships of houses during recent months are indicative of the fact that exhibitors aren't waiting for the ax to fall. That's a lot harder on the independents than it's on the circuits, which—on top of it— have the wherewithal for diversification into other fields.

Most exhibitors today have little quarrel with the product itself, though they deplore lack of volume (knowing that the shortage will grow much worse in 1959) and complain about the terms at which it's sold. The theatremen talk about the bunching of blockbusters during the last quarter of 1958, and yet they are puzzled and apprehensive about the public's failure to respond in adequate numbers to the top pictures.

They know they are missing a rather large section of the audience, but little if anything is being done by way of re-attracting that group. Nor are the theatres going out of their way to stimulate attendance of the subteens, who eventually must make up the bulk of the patronage. "There are a million things that should be done, but—if they're active at all—the exhibitors are concerned with little more than to maintain the status quo and head off the 'dangers,' fancied or real," commented a top distribution exec in N.Y. last week.

One of these dangers, and most showmen consider it a real one, is pay-as-you-see television. They feel this the more so since they can no longer count on either production or distribution to be on their side. One of the reasons that exhibition is so adamantly set against toll-tv is that it knows its (theoretical) appeal for production. "Let the producers smell enough money, and they'll throw us overboard tomorrow," observed a Boston theatreman recently. "They'll think nothing of knifing us in the back."

Exhibitors are resigned to the coming changes, though they oppose and deplore them. They're more willing to fight rearguard action (like the projected purchase of the post-'48s) than to become the aggressors themselves, as was envisioned for them via the business building drive which bogged down in exhibitor indecision and lack of response. Like distribution and, to an extent, production, their roots are in the past, conditioning a thinking which, of necessity, should be bold and imaginative to cope with a difficult future.

Need To Educate Stars Not To Overload (And Sink) Industry!

Miami Beach, Oct. 21.

The thought that an "educational approach" might possibly convince stars, producers and directors to lower their demands on salaries and participations "so that more good pictures could be made and sold by distribution at terms under which the exhibitor can make sufficient profit to remain in business" was advanced here today (Tues.) by Robert J. O'Donnell, head of the Interstate Circuit of Texas.

O'Donnell, keynote speaker at the opening of Theatre Owners of America's 11th annual convention at the Americana Hotel, acknowledged that his suggestion had all the aspects of a "Utopia" and that he could conceive of no way of convincing the creative personnel to believe "that the future of our industry depends upon their taking more modest terms." However, he emphasized that that he is "thoroughly convinced that something like this must come into being," although he frankly admitted that he had no knowledge "of how it could be put into effect."

O'Donnell devoted the major portion of his address urging theatremen "to venture, gamble, explore and above all to be receptive to any new idea or format" during what he termed "this period of flux, and trial and error, and self-examination." The circuit chief declared that he was optimistic about the future of the industry, but that his upbeat feeling did not imply that he was happy about the present state of the industry. He said he believed that the nation's motion picture theatres would "adjust, bend and compensate" to meet the new conditions that confront them. He envisioned, however, fewer theatres. But, he emphasized, "they will be better proportioned, they will be more attractive, and I would hope and expect them to be more healthy and fully packed."

O'Donnell cited chapter and verse of various experiments undertaken by his circuit to combat the declining boxoffice. "We deliberately achieved a frame of mind amongst ourselves," he said, "that no policy or format of however many years standing was sacrosanct from change or overthrow." The result, he admitted frankly, consisted of both successes and failures. However, he noted that it was important that the effort was made "to venture, gamble and explore."

During the course of his speech, O'Donnell called attention to the high terms demanded for pictures and he noted that "less and less concern is evidenced about what happens to the exhibitor." He urged exhibitors to formulate a plan to keep post-1948 films off television. O'Donnell expressed disappointment about the failure of exhibitors to support the proposed industry business building campaign and he hoped that out of the convention would come some enthusiasm for the campaign, particularly the radio portion of it.

Washington, Oct. 21.

Dividends paid by film companies picked up in September but are still running about $1,500,000 below 1957 when the first nine months of the two years are compared, the new Commerce Department report released Thursday (16) discloses.

Cash dividends paid in September amounted to $3,795,000, against $2 900,000 in the same month of 1957. But the cumulative nine-month total for 1958 was $18,431,000, while it was $20,977,000 last year.

Companies paying dividends during September, with the 1958 amount first and that of 1957 listed second, are as follows:

Allied Artists Picture Corp., $21,000 both Septembers; American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres, $1,126.000 and no dividend; Consolidated Amusements Co., Ltd. (Hawaii), $88,000 and $55,000; Paramount Pictures Corp., $1,904,000 both years; 20th Century-Fox Film, $1,058,000 both times; United Artists Corp., $400,000 and $350,000; United Artists Theatre Circuit, $8,000 each time; and Universal Pictures Co., Inc., no September 1958 dividend, but $314,000 in 1957.

H. G. WELLS' 'MACHINE' PAL-BOGEAUS ISSUE

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

George Pal and Benedict Bogeaus are principals in the latest hassle over a story property. Both have "announced" plans for H. G. Wells' "The Time Machine." Pal already is in Europe scouting locations for a Metro release of tome, and Bogeaus reported last week he has set Joseph Cotten for star role.

To Bogeaus' claim that property is in public domain, a Metro official pointed out that while this is true in the U. S., in Europe it still is copyrighted and Pal owns these rights. Pal also has a prior registration with MPAA Title Registration Bureau.

'HOMAGE' TO LOUISE BROOKS

Former Screen Star Flies to Paris For Revival of Her Old Vehicles

Louise Brooks, film ingenue of the 1920s, will get the nostalgic treatment Nov. 5-6-7 in Paris when the Cinematheque Francaise via its archivist, Henri Langlois, organizes one of its "homages" to stars of yesteryear. "Love 'Em and Leave 'Em" (1927), "Box of Pandora" (1928), "Diary of a Lost Girl" (1929) are among other old features to be unspooled.

Miss Brooks will fly to Paris Oct. 27 to personally participate in the "discovery" of herself 30 years later. For past two years she's been living in Rochester, N.Y., and researching old films at Eastman House there for her book, "Women in Films."

Harry Sachs has taken over his former position as general manager of the I. D. Adelman Theatres in Texas in charge of buying and booking.

Sam Goldwyn Answers Kirsch

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Samuel Goldwyn had a flat answer to statement made last week in Chicago by Jack Kirsch, prexy of Allied Theatres of Illinois, that he was an apostle of the doctrine of industry prosperity through fewer theatres.

"I am not producing 'Porgy and Bess' at a cost of $7,000,000 which in Todd-AO will have to get back $15,000,000 to break even, in order to close theatres," he said tartly.

Bristling at remarks made at Allied States Assn. convention, in which Kirsch remarked that second to possible selloff of post '48 pix to tv, "the greatest menace to our business is the attitude . . . in high places that there should be fewer pictures shown in fewer theatres," Goldwyn had another reply. Hollywood, he pointed out, is risking millions of dollars in an effort to make quality films, while the exhib's only contribution is a shower of convention speeches and resolutions damning the producers.

Say It Ain't True, Sam

Miami, Oct. 21.

Emulating the behavior of the Allied States Assn. convention in Chicago last week, the Theatre Owners of America has called upon Samuel Goldwyn "to deny reports" that he was selling his personal backlog of theatrical films to television syndication, as and when a suitable deal is negotiated.

Neither exhibitor body wan's to believe his news. (It wasn't invented.—Ed.)

Radio End of BB Now Nears Gun

Miami, Oct. 21.

To get the show on road—that is, the radio portion of the business building campaign — the Board of directors of TOA has agreed to guarantee any deficit between present sum now in hand for radio drive and $165,000 necessary for exhibitor's share of campaign. TOA limited its cover guarantee to $5,000. But since $160,000 has already been collected, action of exhibitor organization practically assures launching of radio portion of stumbling industry business building campaign.

Since it's certain that distributors will ante up their share of drive—also $165,000 — via comp and MPAA, it's expected that radio campaign will be started in about six or eight weeks. Executive committee of biz building drive will set exact start of radio campaign.

Thus it appears that portion of industry business building campaign, which for all intents and purposes seemed doomed, appears to be taking on new life as result of action of TOA at opening of 11th annual convention here.

According to Ernest G. Stellings, outgoing TOA prexy, indications are that radio campaign will be launched about Christmas.

REPENT OR RELENT CONSENT

Columbia Taking 49% Bray Share

London, Oct. 21.

Columbia has a deal set to purchase a 49% interest in the Bray Studios at a price of $1,000,000. Under the terms, James Carreras, head of both Bray and Hammer Films, is to give Col the distribution rights to three Hammer features per year.

This British production company retains the right to make one picture annually for Universal.

Also as part of the deal, three reps of Col are to join the Bray Studios board.

'Loans at Low Interest' Skouras Idea of How Government Aid Works

Chicago, Oct. 21.

Though opposed in principle to government participation in business, 20th-Fox' Spyros Skouras feels time is ripe for federal financial aid to the picture industry. Showman told last week's National Allied States Assn. convention that help should be in the form of loans at low interest to modernize theatres.

"We must revive the luxury and comfort of theatre hospitality which was responsible for the motion picture's popularity in the old days."

JULES DASSIN HITS U.S. SHORT & QUIET

Jules Dassin, director, made a surprise and largely unnoticed visit to New York last week. It's believed it was his first trip back to the States, from his Paris base, since he was among the "Unfriendly 10" witnesses before the House Unamerican Activities more than 10 years ago.

Dassin's newest picture is "He Who Must Die," which is to open shortly at N.Y.'s Fifth Avenue Cinema. While in Gotham (he came in last Thursday and went back to France Saturday) he also had discussions about an indie production of an adaptation of James T. Farrell's "Studs Lonigan."

This property was acquired some time ago by Lew Kerner, who was to make the picture for United Artists release. It appeared to have been dropped from the schedule, but now it looks like Kerner still will produce it with Dassin doing the script, and directing. Dassin had a hit last year in "Riffi."

DEBORAH KERR'S HONOR

First of Sex To Be TOA 'Star of Year'

Miami, Oct. 21.

Deborah Kerr has been chosen "star of the year" by Theatre Owners of America. Miss Kerr, the first actress to receive the honor in the five-year history of the award, will be presented with a scroll and a trophy at the President's Banquet on Saturday (25), an event which winds up the five-day annual convention of the exhibitor organization.

Previous award winners have been Danny Kaye, James Stewart, William Holden and Rock Hudson.

Other personalities scheduled to attend this year's TOA convention include John Gavin, who starred in Universal's "A Time to Love and A Time to Die" and in the upcoming remake of "Imitation of Life," and Jacques Tati, French comedian known in the U.S. for "Mr. Hulot's Holiday. Tati is currently on tour for his most recent film, "Mon Oncle," which Continental Distributors is releasing.

Tommy Reynolds, actor-producer, plans to film a new series of shorts to be titled "The Model T Parson," in which he will portray the title role. Production is scheduled to get under way shortly at his Pipe Creek ranch in Texas' Bandera County.

TOA Back As Friendlier Exhib Body

By HY HOLLINGER

Miami Beach, Oct. 21.

One of the largest turnouts of distribution and government representatives in perhaps a decade will be on hand for the 11th anni convention of Theatre Owners of America which opened today (Tues.) at the Americana Hotel here and will conclude with the President's banquet on Saturday (25) evening.

The presence of so many production-distribution and government reps is interpreted as an indication of the state of the troubled motion picture business and the realization of both exhibition and distribution of the necessity for a closer liaison to solve the problems of the sagging boxoffice.

Historically, there has always been a closer relationship between TOA and the film companies, since TOA has, for the most part, avoided the uncompromising belligerency of its rival organization, Allied States Assn., which concluded in Chicago last week, returning to—its time-honored no-holds-barred combatting of the film companies. TOA, although it underwent a period of coolness toward the film companies when it joined Allied in appealing to Congress for reforms, is again back on a friendly basis with the distributors.

Both TOA and the film companies realize that the industry continues to face difficult times and there is a feeling among both segments that only through close, cooperative efforts can the problems of the business be solved. On Thursday (23), sales chiefs of five major companies will take turns on the speaker's dais here to tell "distribution's plan for better business." They will participate in a forum session entitled "Better Business Through More Quality Product," which will be chaired by Walter Reade Jr. Participating sales chiefs will include Loew's John P. Byrne, United Artists' William J. Heineman, Allied Artists' Maurice Goldstein, 20th-Fox's Alex Harrison, Jerry Pickman, Paramount pub-ad v.p. who will represent sales topper George Weltner, and Columbia's Abe Montague.

A forum on "Better Business Through Better Selling," set for Friday (24), will find a panel consisting of producer Jerry Wald, UA pub-ad chief Roger H. Lewis, 20th-Fox sales chief Alex Harrison, Seymour L. Morris of Schine Theatres, Harry Greene of Welworth Theatres, Henry G. Plitt, of Paramount Gulf Theatres, and Mrs. Margaret Twyman of the Motion Picture Assn. of America, and Terry Turner, exploitation chief of American International Pictures.

One of the highlights of the convention will be an address tomorrow (Wed.) by Spyros Skouras, president of 20th-Fox. Skouras also addressed the recent Allied convention in Chicago. Another key address will be that of Victor R. Hansen, assistant attorney general and head of the antitrust division of the Dept. of Justice, who is set to speak on Thursday (23). Hansen is expected to discuss the motion picture consent decrees.

Other representatives of distribution scheduled to attend the convention include David A. Lipton, Universal's pub-ad v.p.; Kenneth N. Hargraves, president of Rank Film Distributors of America; Foster M. Blake, the Rank general sales manager; James H. Nicholson and Samuel Z. Arkoff, president and veepee respectively of American International Films.

Another government representative to appear before the convention is Nathan D. Golden, of the U.S. Dept. of Commerce, who discussed the proposed motion picture theatre census today (Tues.). In addition, Gov. A. B. (Happy) Chandler of Kentucky will address the convention.

Kerasotes Re 'Consent'

Miami, Oct. 21.

George G. Kerasotes, Springfield, Ill., associated with his father and brothers in operation of Kerasotes Theatres, has been elected prez of Theatre Owners of America, succeeding Ernest G. Stellings, who is retiring after two-year term. In accepting post, Kerasotes pledged that during coming year one of main objectives of this administration would be to secure revision of consent decrees so that formerly affiliated theatre circuits could re-enter production.

Modified Consent Decree Petition Sent to Justice

Miami, Oct. 21.

Continuing its drive to get more product on the market, Board of TOA has petitioned Dept. of Justice to amend existing consent decrees so that formerly affiliated circuits would be permitted to produce and release pictures "with pre-emptive rights to show these pictures in their presently-owned theatres."

Resolution, although similar to ones passed by exhibitor organization in past, differed in that it limited pre-emptive rights to "presently-owned theatres." This distinction, TOA hopes, will carry more weight with Dept. of Justice than previous requests for pre-emptive rights for present theatres and houses that might be acquired in future.

Asked what TOA expected to gain from repetition of similar resolutions when justice has refused to accept stipulation, Ernest G. Stellings, outgoing prexy, declared: "We have to keep trying."

BITING THE GUEST WHO CAME WITH GIFTS

Chicago, Oct. 21.

Major film companies came in for their lumps last week at National Allied States' parley. Exhibs were quite vocal in denouncing 20th-Fox.

Irony: Fox supplied the convention with most of its luminaries, including stars Joan Collins and Jeffrey Hunter, and studio prez Spyros Skouras. Plus a 30-minute clip from Jerry Wald's "In Love and War" pic.

TOA Pushing Idea of Exhibs' Buy Of Post-1948 Video Residuals; Might Then Sell Non-Blockbusters

Miami, Oct. 21.

Board of directors of TOA at meeting prior to opening of annual convention here, approved in principle proposed trust plan to buy up post-1948 films from film companies. Although no specific plan has been developed as to how this can be accomplished, board appointed committee to develop proposal and to follow up on idea.

According to outgoing prexy Ernest G. Stellings, various meetings between TOA officials and film companies, with exception of one unnamed major, indicated that major film outfits "would be interested in any plan which would justify their selling of post-1948 films to us."

Stellings acknowledged that it "would be matter of dollar and cents" if majors received better offers from non-exhibitor sources, but he stressed that from standpoint of boxoffice he felt that it would be advantageous for film companies to sell to exhibitors.

Committee assigned to develop plan, Stellings stated, will take into consideration problem—and he admitted it was major one—of raising coin to buy up films. Stellings pointed out that trust would be non-profit one and that therefore exhibs anticipated that there would be no difficulty with Dept. Justice on any count, including one involving possible monopoly in restraint of trade. He added that any final plan would be cleared with dept. of justice.

For first time, Stellings conceded that exhibitors might conceivably favor selling certain of post-1948 films—if they gained control of them—to television. He did not spell out specifics, but it was indicated that trust officials might be charged with task of determining which of films would be approved for sale to tv, but he stressed, it would not include any of the blockbusters.

Committee assigned to investigate trust plan included Mitchell Wolfson, S. H. Fabian, new TOA topper George Kerasotes, Sam Pinanski and Stellings.

Bill Danzinger, the film exploiteer from way back, currently hitting 40 towns in U.S. for the March of Dimes, with which enterprise he's now linked.

TOA's New Officers

Miami, Oct. 21.

As foreseen the new president of the Theatre Owners of America is George Kerasotes. Other officers of the exhibitor organization incoming:

Albert M. Pickus, chairman of executive committee; Ernest G. Stellings, chairman of board; Sam Pinanski, honorary board chairman; Roy Cooper, Nathan Greer, Philip F. Harling, R. M. Kennedy, Henry G. Plitt, J. J. Rosenfield, John B. Schuyler, assistant presidents; Robert R. Livingston, secretary, S. H. Fabian, treasurer; Herman M. Levy, general counsel; Joseph G. Alterman, administrative assistant; Albert Floerscheimer, public relations director.

In addition 15 veepees were named and 33 members of executive committee.

Commerce Dept.'s Popcorn Census

Miami Oct. 21.

Asking for cooperation of theatre industry for upcoming Federal government census of business, Nathan D. Golden, of dept. of commerce, told TOA convention here today (Tuesday) that form to be used for film business would seek following information:

Total receipts during 1958, how much merchandise was sold in theatres, annual payroll during year, weekly payroll and personnel for period ending Nov. 15.

It will also seek data on receipts from admissions, amount of federal, state, municipal admission taxes received from patrons; sales of popcorn, candy, food, etc.: Total number of shows during year, seating capacity or car capacity and information on concessions operating in theatres.

Census, first since 1954, will basically seek same data solicited before. Golden pointed out that separate forms must be filled for each theatre operated during 1958.

SKOURAS' WOES AT ALLIED MEET

By JACK PITMAN

Chicago, Oct. 21.

Last week's annual convention of the Allied States Associations here was pretty much a convention to plan action rather than one which took action — resolutions apart. Broadly the convention solved nothing. Perhaps it could not. There was no magic powder with which to dust the air and work transformations.

Many of the film theatre operators rendered a convincing demonstration of the posture known as back to wall. Their serious attitude, and their absences—they stayed away in droves, writing convention chairman Jack Kirsch, "we simply can't afford to come" —all spelled out the predicament of the little exhibitor in the present economy.

Attendance was so slim that empty tables greeted even the appearance, at the windup luncheon, of 20th-Fox topper Spyros Skouras, notwithstanding lotsa "papering" of the Morrison Hotel's Terrace Casino with local 20th-Fox exchange personnel and pals of the studio chieftain.

Bravest Man In Biz

A sympathetic Skouras sought to conciliate the theatre men by getting the delegates to see all sides of the issue, but the exhibs, though courteous, weren't having it. 20th, in fact, had taken the most verbal lumps before Skouras arrived in town, nor did Skouras know he was also preceded by cries from the confab to "cut off their revenue," referring to the villains in point—the majors.

The smaller exhibs were almost all for a "boycott," in effect, to economically force producers' compliance with the consent decrees. Several delegates rose to urge a solid front to freeze out from Allied theatres product from offending companies anywhere from three months to a year. Reminded by organization head Horace Adams (the Cleveland ozone operator) that boycotts are illegal, a smalltown exhib fired back a charge of hair-splitting and demanded, "Do you want us to die legally?" A confrere chimed in to observe that a "freeze" would hurt rather than help. "What we need is more product, not less." Generally, though, there was broad support for a "get tough" policy—anything, almost, to ameliorate the plight of the indie exhibs.

Earlier, Abram F. Myers, Allied's board chairman and general counsel, articulated the organization's stand on the decrees as contained in its now-famous "White Paper." In his judgment, he said, the U. S. Supreme Court's edicts are quite specific, and he doesn't see how the Attorney General can interpret otherwise.

Skouras, the following day, didn't touch directly on Justice Dept. implementation of the court, but simply blamed the decrees for the current plight of exhibitors. They were cutting their own throats when they plumped for them, said the exec. Revised clearances and elimination of block booking have harmed instead of helped by pushing up costs and depressing production. "You created a seller's market," Skouras charged, "which operated against you, because as pictures became scarce, film rentals increased and you had to haggle over each booking."

Divestiture of the circuits, he stated, was wrong, and the results have proved "more devastating than I predicted . . . It was only logical that if the producers lost their theatres, there would be no necessity for them to produce as many pictures." Current clearance system is a liability to the entire industry and should be revised.

"Today too many theatres are playing a picture at the same time. We are overpricing ourselves in many theatres, and most of the general public stays away because of this."

"The Roots of Heaven," Darryl F. Zanuck's production for 20th-Fox, has striking pictorial aspects, some exciting performances and builds to a pulsating climax of absorbing tension. Unfortunately, these plus factors almost all come in the second half of the picture. Director John Huston has let most of the first half dawdle and meander. Interest seriously suffers. The elusive theme is likely to remain obscure to many. "Roots of Heaven" will probably be good at boxoffice but not the blockbuster 20th-Fox hoped for.

The locale of the screenplay by Patrick Leigh-Fermor and Romain Gary, from Gary's novel, is French Equatorial Africa and the time is the present. Trevor Howard, whose presence is never completely explained, is launching a campaign to save the elephants of Africa. He believes they are threatened with extinction from big game hunters, ivory poachers and the encroachment of civilization.

When he tries to get signers of his petition to outlaw the killings, he is rebuffed on three fronts. The governor of the territory, Andre Luguet, points out his concern is with the health and welfare of his human charges. A missionary priest, Francis de Wolff, reminds Howard the Church is interested chiefly in men's souls. A native leader, Edric Connor, informs him the Africans don't want their continent to remain a giant zoo.

Howard gets only two signatures. One is from Errol Flynn, an alcoholic British ex-officer, and the other is from Juliette Greco, a prostitute. So Howard decides on a campaign of harassment of the hunters and his counter-attack attracts the attention of a safari-ing American tv personality, Orson Welles; a Danish scientist, Friedrich Ledebur; a German nobleman, Olivier Hussenot, and some of Connor's native followers who propose to use Howard as a symbol of their own resistance to colonial law and practice. Howard is finally joined by Eddie Albert, photographer-correspondent for an American news and picture syndicate.

Howard fails in his crusade, defeated by the inertia of public opinion and the rigidity of officialdom. In the end he marches off into the desert brush with those of his followers who survive the government's repression and attacks from the hunters. Flynn has been killed and Miss Greco is so ill she must be left behind.

Although Howard movingly describes the elephants as "the biggest and most powerful of man's company on earth" and a symbol of "all that's beautiful—all that's free," the crusade to save them does not particularly stir the spectator. It seems laudable, like a super-Audubon Society, but not the kind of effort that would impell men to fight and die.

Perhaps one reason is that while the slaughter of elephants is graphically described, it is never shown. It is hard to respond with the fervor the film attempts to elicit when the horror to be fought is never displayed. Especially when it is something so removed from the ordinary frame of reference. One single shot of an elephant being deprived of his life for evil reasons would have helped. Since such shooting goes on all the time in Africa, it would not have been difficult or inhumane to obtain such a scene. Location shots of the great herds are impressive, so much so, in fact, they make it hard to believe beasts are threatened with decimation or extinction.

Huston has staged his exterior scenes superbly. Full advantage is taken here of the arduous African locations. Howard gives a fine performance and is responsible for conveying as much as comes across of the tricky theme. His performance is undercut somewhat by an irritating tendency, apparently on Huston's part, of excessive use of reaction shots, when the story would be better served by keeping the camera rooted on Howard.

Errol Flynn plays the drunken officer competently but without suggesting any latent nobility or particular depth. Miss Greco is interesting without being very moving. Eddie Albert sparks the screen with bubbling vitality and humor in his scenes, and Orson Welles in a brief bit (reportedly done as a favor to Zanuck) is a pinwheel of flashing vigor, his exit to be lamented.

In the supporting cast, Paul Lukas has an engaging world-weariness; Friedrich Ledebur a moving dignity; Edric Connor, splendid and baffled grandeur as the native leader; Gregoire Aslan an amusing knave; and Francis de Wolff, in one scene, etches a memorable character. The rest of the cast, largely European, is competent but allowed little scope for subtleties of characterization. In principal roles are Herbert Lom, Olivier Hussenot, Marc Doelnitz, Alain Saury, Bachir Toure and Andre Luguet.

Oswald Morris was the director of photography, which is excellent, with second unit work by Skeets Kelly, Henri Persin and Gilles Bonneau. Art direction by Stephen Grimes effectively carries through the African feeling from the authentic exteriors to the French-shot interiors. Malcolm Arnold has done a notable score, one that avoids the "tom-tom" cliches. With a theme for Miss Greco, by Henri Pattison, that is going to get single-record exploitation, it is going to be a good promotion item for the film.

Editing, by Russell Lloyd, is first-rate, and the sound by Basil Fenton Smith preserves the African sounds unobtrusively but tellingly. Powe.

Bell, Book and Candle

Strong cast and lavish production values strongest points of offbeat comedy. Good b.o. despite bad miscasting of Kim Novak.

Hollywood, Oct. 17.

Columbia release of Phoenix production. Stars James Stewart, Kim Novak; costars Jack Lemmon, Ernie Kovacs; features Hermione Gingold, Elsa Lanchester, Janice Rule. Produced by Julian Glaustein. Directed by Richard Quine. Screenplay, Daniel Taradash; based on the play by John Van Druten; camera (Technicolor), James Wong Howe; music, George Duning; editor, Charles Nelson. Previewed in Hollywood, Oct. 9, '58. Running time, 106 MINS.

"Bell, Book and Candle" is a good example of casting for box-office rather than story. The result, in this Julian Blaustein production for Columbia, is that story suffers at the expense of marquee value. The novelty comedy has a brace of good names, headed by James Stewart and Kim Novak, and it will depend on them for its success but it does not come off as a whole, and the chief reason is Miss Novak. This star is clearly not equipped for light comedy.

Richard Quine's direction gets everything possible out of the screenplay and the cast. But with Miss Novak the central figure, the picture lacks the spontaneity and sparkle written in by John Van Druten.

The off-beat story is concerned with witches and warlocks (male gender of the broomstick set) operating against today's world of skepticism and realism. Stewart is the straight man thrust by chance into a group of people, headed by Miss Novak, where encantations, spells and sorcery are accepted as realities as commonplace as processed foods. Miss Novak literally weaves a spell on Stewart to make him fall in love with her. But she becomes bewitched by her own magic, and loses her powers of the supernatural when she breaks witchcraft rules and falls in love with the object of her devotions. When a witch falls in love, so the theory goes, she ceases to be a witch.

There are some wonderfully wierd proceedings here, including Elsa Lanchester and Hermione Gingold as rival witches, and Jack Lemmon as a clean-cut, bongo-beating warlock. Ernie Kovacs is a comedy standout as a perpetually booze-soaked author, investigating witchcraft for a book.

The hazard of the story is that there is really only one joke. This is the humor of surprise and startled acceptance of the fact that the bizarre occupations of these witches and warlocks could exist in contemporary Manhattan.

This was sustained in the play by Van Druten's witty dialog. It is undercut in the picture by the fact that the backgrounds are too often as wierd as the situations. The contrast—and the basis for humor—is therefore softened or lost.

Biggest laugh in the picture is provided by Stewart attempting to drink a horrible mess concocted by witch Gingold, a magic potion guaranteed to free him from Miss Novak's spell. The laughter springs from Stewart as a modern man indulging in ancient mumbo-jumbo and plays superbly. Conversely, when Miss Gingold's headquarters is shown as all too obviously a house where only a witch would live, the joke is telegraphed and lost.

As if realizing this, producer Blaustein and director Quine have assembled a great comedy cast. Stewart, adept at light comedy as at drama, gives a fine performance. Lemmon is an able farceur, too, and Kovacs drapes his character with dozens of fussy, funny touches. Hermione Gingold and Elsa Lanchester are perhaps the greatest witches to brew a stew since "Macbeth." In lesser roles, Janice Rule, Philippe Clay, Bek Nelson and Howard McNear, are helpful and often laugh-getters.

James Wong Howe's Technicolor camera work is artistically creative and often imaginative, although the tricky use of color does not always seem in the comedy mood. George Duning's music, however, helps by counter-pointing the mood and action. Art direction by Cary Odell is rich, matched by Louis Diage's set decoration. Sound by John Livadary and editing by Charles Nelson are both firstrate. Powe.

Party Girl
(COLOR-C'SCOPE)

Straight gangland melodrama, well done.

Hollywood, Oct. 17.

Metro release of Joe Pasternak Production. Stars Robert Taylor, Cyd Charisse, Lee J. Cobb. Directed by Nicholas Ray. Screenplay, George Wells; based on a story by Leo Katcher; camera, Robert Bronner; music, Jeff Alexander; editor, John McSweeney. Previewed at Academy Awards theatre, Oct. 17, '58. Running time, 99 MINS.

Thomas Farrell	Robert Taylor
Vicki Gaye	Cyd Charisse
Rico Angelo	Lee J. Cobb
Louis Canetto	John Ireland
Jeffrey Stewart	Kent Smith
Genevieve	Claire Kelly

Danny Rimett	Lewis Charles
Lou Forbes	David Opatoshu
Joev Vulner	Dem Dibbs

Tall Blonde	Barbara Lang
Joy Hampton	Myrna Hansen
Showgirl	Betty Utey

"Party Girl" is a straight melodrama of gangster days in Chicago, played straight. There is none of the currently fashionable effort to understand the phenomenon or to relate it to the times. The Joe Pasternak production for Metro is apparently an attempt to duplicate on a class scale the success of lower budget pictures similarly concerned with the hey-day of the rackets. It is an interesting picture and will be satisfactory for routine playdates, but it is not going to do any extraordinary business.

Robert Taylor plays a crippled lawyer, mouthpiece for gangster boss Lee J. Cobb. Taylor uses his disability to play on the sympathies of juries to get the mobster underlings, such as John Ireland, free of murder and mayhem charges he knows they are guilty of.

He begins to be disturbed about his way of life when he meets Cyd Charisse, a dancer at a nightclub who picks up a little money occasionally at parties. Taylor sees he cannot censure Miss Charisse for making money out of the mobs when he is doing the same thing himself.

Taylor's breaking point comes when he is called on by Cobb to defend a psychopath mobster, Corey Allen. In somewhat curious philosophy, Taylor tells Cobb that the difference between Cobb and Allen is that the former is a predictable (and hence, presumably, more acceptable) outlaw, while Allen is not. Taylor breaks with Cobb; spills all he knows to the cops, and in the end escapes with Miss Charisse as the gangsters are wiped out by the police.

George Wells' screenplay, based on a story by Leo Katcher, is intelligent and convincing, and Nicholas Ray's direction is good within the limits of the action. But the production seems old hat. It seems to promise revelations about the character or nature of these period monsters that are not forthcoming. As a result its effect is rather flat, unsatisfying.

Taylor carries considerable conviction as the attorney, suave and virile. Miss Charisse's character has little background to supply her with any acting exercise, but she is interesting and, in two fine dance numbers, exciting. Lee Cobb contributes another of his somewhat flamboyant characterizations. Although it seems a sentimentalized approach to such a character—until the end—Cobb makes it vivid. The others are stock roles, well done by Ireland, Kent Smith, Claire Kelly, Allen, Lewis Charles, David Opatoshu, Kem Dibbs and Patrick McVey. Barbara Lang, Myrna Hansen and Betty Utey are decorative additions.

Robert Bronner's CinemaScope photography, in Metrocolor, is handsome, and other technical credits are equally good. Art direction by William A. Horning and Randall Duell is especially fine in a courtroom that actually looks like one and not like a set. There is a title song by Nicholas Brodszky and Sammy Cahn sung by Tony Martin that will be a welcome exploitation assist. Powe.

Torpedo Run

Topnotch submarine meller with Glenn Ford and Ernest Borgnine names to attract.

Hollywood, Oct. 17.

Metro release of Edmund Grainger production. Stars Glenn Ford, Ernest Borgnine; costars Diane Brewster, Dean Jones; features L. Q. Jones, Philip Ober, Richard Carlyle. Directed by Joseph Pevney. Screenplay, Richard Sale, William Wister Haines, based on stories by Sale; camera (Metrocolor), George J. Folsey; editor, Gene Ruggiero. Previewed Oct. 15, '58. Running time, 86 MINS.

Lt. Comdr. Barney Doyle	Glenn Ford
Lt. Archer Sloan	Ernest Borgnine

Lt. Jake "Fuzz" Foley	Dean Jones

Adm. Samuel Setton	Philip Ober
Comdr. Don Adams	Richard Carlyle
Orville "Goldy" Goldstein	Fredd Wayne
Ens. Ron Milligan	Don Keefer
Lt. Redley	Robert Hardy
Lt. Burl Fisher	Paul Picerni

U. S. Navy's submarine action in the Pacific during World War II gets further graphic enlightenment in this well-made Edmund Grainger production. Story of a commander's relentless trackdown of biggest aircraft carrier in the Japanese fleet is handled realistically through full cooperation of the Navy, with performances to match. For the general market film is an exciting entry, and names of Glenn Ford and Ernest Borgnine add to its bright chances as a coin-getter.

Director Joseph Pevney unfolds the Richard Sale-William Wister Haines screenplay at a suspenseful pace, capitalizing on an unusual story twist to draw highly dramatic portrayals from both Ford, as the commander, and Borgnine, his executive officer. Ford, who has caught up to the flattop being screened by a transport carrying 1,200 American war prisoners from Manila to Tokyo, among them his wife and daughter, misses the Japanese carrier and instead sinks the transport. Thereafter, with this tragic circumstance preying on his mind, the hunt and ultimate sinking of the carrier takes on a personal aspect for Ford.

Ford returns to straight dramatic acting after a year or more in comedy roles, for both characterizations as a man plagued by what he was forced to do. Borgnine is very effective not only as his closest friend but his exec who helps him through his ordeal, relinquishing an offer of his own sub to remain with his commander. Diane Brewster, is briefly in flashbacks as the wife: Dean Jones, a junior officer; Philip Ober as the admiral, lend strong support.

Lost, Lonely and Vicious

Lightweight "Hollywood" drama; may have some teenage appeal.

States rights release of a Bon Aire production presented by Howco International. Produced by Charles Casinelli. Features Ken Clayton, Barbara Wilson, Lilyan Chauvin. Directed by Frank Myers. Screenplay, Norman Graham; camera, Ted and Vincent Saizis; editor, Herb Hoffman; music, Frederick David. Previewed N.Y., Oct. 17, '58. Running time, 73 MINS.

Johnnie	Ken Clayton
Preach	Barbara Wilson
Tanya	Lilyan Chauvin
Walt	Richard Gilden
Pinkie	Carole Nugent
Darlene	Sandra Giles
Buddy	Allen Fife
Father	Frank Stallworth
Young Actor	Johnny Erben
Reporter	Clint Quigley
Psychiatrist	T. Earl Johnson

Reminiscent of the career of the late James Dean is "Lost, Lonely and Vicious." A Howco International presentation, it's being sold as a package with the same company's "My World Lies Screaming." With a cast of relative unknowns, "Vicious" will have to depend upon exploitation angles purporting to expose the Hollywood "inside."

Both performances and direction are shaky in this Charles Casinelli production. Basic idea of the Norman Graham screenplay had merit, but it seldom becomes credible most due to the writer's own unimaginative treatment. Here the filmgoer is confronted with a promising actor who can't resolve an inner conflict.

His problem is a morbid one—a continual thought of death that becomes an obsession with him. Fortunately he meets a pretty drug store clerk who straightens him out before he can commit suicide in his famed sports car. Ken Clayton is fairish as the "crazy, mixed up" actor while Barbara Wilson is winsome and pert as the femme saviour.

Providing for what passes as Hollywood atmosphere are Lilyan Chauvin, Clayton's drama coach; Carole Nugent and Sandra Giles, as a coupla busty blondes, and Richard Gilden, an aspiring actor envious of Clayton's success. None is particularly convincing. Frank Myers' direction is mechanical as are most of the technical credits. Sports car scenes and a few fisticuff sequences may stir some teenage interest. Otherwise, this is a lightweight filler at best. Gilb.

The Restless Years
(C'SCOPE)

Youth-angled story, well handled, for easy acceptance by younger and family audiences.

Hollywood, Oct. 17.

Universal release of Ross Hunter production. Stars John Saxon, Sandra Dee, Teresa Wright, James Whitmore; features Patsy Kelly, Margaret Lindsay, Virginia Grey. Directed by Helmut Kautner. Screenplay, Edward Anhalt; based on the play, "Teach Me How to Cry," by Patricia Joudry; camera, Ernest Laszlo; music, Joseph Gershenson; editor, Al Joseph. Previewed at the studio, Oct. 14, '58. Running time, 86 MINS.

Will Henderson	John Saxon
Melinda Grant	Sandra Dee
Elizabeth Grant	Teresa Wright
Ed Henderson	James Whitmore
Polly Fisher	Luana Patten
Dorothy Henderson	Margaret Lindsay
Miss Robson	Virginia Grey
Bruce	Jody McCrea
Alex Fisher	Alan Baxter
Mr. Booth	Hayden Rorke
Laura	Dorothy Green

A touching account of adolescence and some of its problems as compounded by adult density, "The Restless Years," has strong appeal for younger audiences and will also fit into programming aimed for the family trade. Ross Hunter's production for Universal has good, young stars for marquee value, John Saxon and Sandra Dee, and plenty of strong, longer-established players, to give them solid backing. Helmut Kautner's American directorial bow shows a talented hand.

Edward Anhalt's screenplay is based on Patricia Joundry's play, "Teach Me How To Cry." In almost the first line of dialog, Miss Dee is described as an illegitimate child: Her problems arise out of this and the fact that her unwed mother, Teresa Wright, has never recovered from the desertion by the father.

Everyone in town, apparently, knows the story except Miss Dee. She believes what her mother has told her; that her father died when she was an infant. But she feels set apart, nevertheless, because her mother is obviously unstable, and by the effect this has had on her life. Miss Wright, a dressmaker, keeps her garbed in creations too frilly for today's streamlined youth, and too young for her budding womanhood.

The girl begins to grow up when a new boy in town, John Saxon, who doesn't know or doesn't care about local gossip and prejudice, meets her and falls in love. His life is complicated by his luckless father, James Whitmore, who has come back to his home town in the Trade Turns Uneven; 'Cat' Again Champ, 'Defiant' 2d, 'Geisha' 3d, 'Gigi' 4th, 'So. Pacific' 5th

Absence of enough new, strong product continues to make an uneven b.o. picture in current session. Following the recent pattern, there are a few big, new entries but hardly enough to go around in main key cities covered by VARIETY. The politco campaigns and early fall outdoor competition also are contributing to make many exhibs unhappy. Yet in toto, over-all coin from major keys is running even to ahead of last year.

"Cat on Hot Tin Roof" (M-G) still is in No. 1 spot, just as it was last stanza. "Defiant Ones" (UA) is pushing up to second place. Pic was third a week ago. "Barbarian and Geisha" (Par) will finish third.

"Gigi" (M-G) is landing fourth place money. "South Pacific" (20th), long high on list, is winding up fifth. "Big Country" (UA) is climbing from eighth spot to sixth. "Onionhead" (WB), not too promising last round, is showing enough to finish seventh.

"South Seas Adventure" (Cinerama) is winding up eighth. "Damn Yankees" (WB) will capture ninth position. "Windjammer" (NT) is landing 10th position. "Me and Colonel" (Col) will be 11th and "Search For Paradise" (Cinerama) is 12th.

"Man of West" (UA), comparatively new; "Reluctant Debutante" (M-G) and "White Wilderness" (BV) are the runner-up pix.

"Houseboat" (Par) shapes as standout newcomer, being big in Philly and socko in Washington. "Roots of Heaven" (20th), on initial playdate at N.Y. Palace, did highly satisfactory trade the first six days.

"The Blob" (Par), a bit uneven this round, shows some future potential. It's swell in Cincy, stout in Buffalo, good in Providence and nice in Cleveland. Pic is very disappointing in Philly and only okay in Boston.

"Streetcar Named Desire" (20th) looms okay in St. Louis, good in Pitt and big in N.Y. "Imitation General" (M-G) shapes okay in St. Louis.

"The Hunters" (20th) is nice in Chi. "China Doll" (UA) is rated brisk in Buffalo. "Dunkirk" (M-G) looks lean in Omaha.

"La Parisienne" (UA) is socko in Balto. "Saga of Hemp Brown" (U) looms good in Chi. "Badlanders" (M-G) is okay in Chi.

"Tale of Two Cities" (Rank), okay in Chi and L.A., is nice in Toronto. "Time of Desire" (Janus), fancy in Washington, shapes fine in Chi.

"Around World in 80 Days" (UA), for many months a champ or high in the ratings, is torrid in Chi and sockeroo in L.A. These are the only two keys in which it is playing the big first-runs currently. "Mississippi Gambler" (U) is rated okay in Indianapolis.

"Blue Murder at St. Trinians" (Cont) looks good in Boston. "Law and Disorder" (Indie) is nice in Minneapolis.

MPEA Talking 3d Loan To Jap Interests; See Deal Up to $10,000,000

Another large "commercial" loan by the American film industry to semi-governmental interests in Japan is in the offing. About $10,000,000, including a portion of the companies' "resident" funds, are involved.

Talks have been carried on for some months now between Irving Maas, the Motion Picture Export Assn. rep in the Far East, and Japanese government officials. While no details have as yet been worked out, the principal of such a loan—the third for MPEA—has been established.

The first deal was signed in late 1955 and involved $7,000,000. At 3.3% interest, it was repayable over a six-year period starting within three years of the deal, i.e. this year. A lump sum was remitted at the time of signature in '55. The second loan, like the first given to Japanese hydroelectric power development, was for about $7,000,000, but split into two parts.

Part one, involving monies from the resident accounts, i.e. funds accruing to the local subsidiaries of the companies, was loaned for a seven year period at 3.3% interest and with repayment again to start three years hence, i.e. in 1960. Part two, taking in non-resident funds (like the first loan), was repayable in six years. Again, a lump sum was remitted at the outset by way of an incentive.

Degree to which resident funds can be included in the now pending loan arrangements remains to be determined. Generally speaking, conditions probably will be the same as before, i.e. a lump sum remittance at the start and repayment over six or seven years three years from signature. The companies are now permitted to remit from Japan 22% of their earnings.

The Yank outfits are generally opposed to loans, the reasoning being that they tie up earnings abroad which are needed to keep production going at home. However, the Japanese arrangement works considerably to their advantage inasmuch as repayment of the loan is in dollars.

Nostalgia Rebuffed

Pittsburgh, Oct. 21.

J. P. Harris Theatre here had a peculiar experience last week with Metro's "Andy Hardy Comes Home" which may be a tip-off for exhibs playing the picture in the future. Management was struck by number of patrons asking for refunds a few minutes after going in.

Inquiry revealed that all of them had no idea that it was a brand new feature, thought they were buying the reissue of an old Hardy Family film.

Frisco Festival Set to Go But U.S. Snubs Its Own

San Francisco, Oct. 21.

Outlook for this year's San Francisco Film Festival, scheduled to open Oct. 29, is gloomy as of now. Though festival's director, Irving M. Levin, is keeping a stiff upper lip, others connected with event, first in America to have "sanction" of International Federation of Film Producers Associations.

What may be worse, from the standpoint of making the festival a national or international attraction, this fete so far lacks the glamor necessary for important exploitation.

Program is pretty well lined up, with films from Iron Curtain countries having cleared customs late this week. But there is a gaping

HOW 'SERIOUS' IS COPY CRITICISM?

The advertising-publicity directors of the companies met for the second time in N.Y. yesterday (Tues.) to discuss reports of rising resentment against "objectionable" film ads. Powwow included representatives of the large theatre chains, but not the men from the Motion Picture Assn. of America.

The original meeting on the topic had been called last week by MPAA. At that time, Gordon White, the advertising code administrator, delivered a report and T. Manning Claggett, MPAA's legislative contact, followed up with a summary of threatening moves in the various state legislatures, including of course the pending hearing on "obscene" ads by a N.Y. State legislative committee.

The ad-pub directors, before deciding to mull the issue again on their own and away from MPAA, concluded that one of the most pressing and immediate problems was the finding of a method whereby the film ads of the majors could, in some fashion, be distinguished from those of the independents releasing foreign and exploitation pictures.

Reasoning was that the newspapers, which have begun to "censor" ads, and the public tend to treat all ads alike and to blame all of Hollywood for what may be the practice of only a minority.

Committee nixed a proposal by Jerry Pickman, Paramount's ad-pub v.p., to the effect that the majors' ads carry a "seal" for identification purposes. However, it heard United Artists' Roger Lewis be adamant in demanding that the companies fight the attempt to censor the ads.

Comment was made that, in the light of the rising tide of complaints, it might be wise to use more than usual caution in the ads to counteract the criticisms. It was pointed out at the meeting that the protests against the ads for once appeared not to come from an organized group, but were spontaneous. As for newspapers demanding the right to censor ad copy, the ad-pub directors say it's a bad situation, but in a small way has always gone on.

"If we submit an ad, and the paper doesn't like it, we usually change it," was one comment. "One effective way of handling that is to cut out what the paper objects to and re-submit a much smaller ad. The message will come through very soon." The exec added that some of the papers were being unreasonable. In one town, a paper objected to a line in the copy of an ad. It was changed. The second paper also objected, but to a different line. The company pulled the ad.

One of the reasons why the ad-pub directors group decided to meet outside the MPAA frame was a desire to evaluate within itself just how serious the situation is. There are some among the companies who suspect that MPAA at times has a tendency to become over-concerned on negative aspects, which is a trait most trade associations have in common. Group also felt that White, who after all has to pass on all the ads, presented a report in which too many factors got mixed up where—properly—they should have been separated.

BERNARD E. SMITH JR. OFF REPUBLIC BOARD

Bernard E. Smith Jr., who a couple of years ago appeared heading for a proxy fight with Herbert J. Yates over differences in the management of the Yates-controlled Republic, has resigned as a director of the film company.

Showmen Can't Bow to Pressure; Theirs the Selling Responsibility, Asserts United Artists' Lewis

'Rosemarie' & Her Pals

The German film, "Rosemarie," which has a prostitute as its principal character, now is being shown in Germany with a plus and a minus—an insert identifying a certain hotel as "the Palace" (rather than the Frankfurter Hof) and a cut in which a porter assures a guest that providing girls is part of the hotel "service."

This was done to satisfy the complaints of a Frankfurt hotel magnate who objected (1.) because his place appeared several times in the film, and (2.) because the picture gives the impression that doormen have handy lists of girls.

While the Motion Picture Assn. of America is clearly concerned about criticism from outside the industry anent film advertising, United Artists, for one, intends to refrain from any "policy of appeasement."

Roger Lewis, UA ad-pub director, said this week there would be a firm nix on any attempt to depart from the status quo in bally copy and layouts regardless of the feelings of newspaper publishers, critics, censorship groups and others.

Blasts against pic ads have been the subject of MPAA ad-pub meetings over the past week. No conclusions have been reached as yet, but on the basis of Lewis' statements it's a cinch there's to be no all-industry promise to tone down "earthy" displays.

Lewis makes the point that the picture business too frequently, and without justification, is the subject of attack. Censors, he underlines, have lost most of their authority so far as picture content is concerned. So now they have taken to hitting the ads which tell about that content.

As for the publishers, says Lewis, they traditionally join in the fight for freedom of the screen but tend to reject ads about films made under that freedom.

Too, the ads for motion pictures say no more—usually far less—than lurid news stories which many papers print in their up-front pages. Outstanding in this regard are such dailies as New York's News and Mirror.

If the public objects to film ads on the theory that they might corrupt children, why are the papers brought into the home in the first place, considering the nature of the news stories? asks Lewis.

Warn Art Houses Their 'Sell' Clouds Foreign Growth

Miami, Oct. 21.

Art theatre operators were warned here today (Tues.) that some of their colleagues are giving the specialized film field "a black eye" via objectionable advertising.

Walter Reade Jr., prez of the Foreign Film Committee, told the Theatre Owners of America convention that some of the fringe operations have "seized on this (foreign) product solely for its sex exploitation possibilities, and advertise in a near-blatant manner—certainly in questionable taste." Reade said the committee strongly urged exhibs to stop shooting for "the quick buck" in that manner and to exercise good judgment so as not to invite trouble.

Trend towards more playing time for foreign films "continued at giant's pace in 1958," Reade said, has helped to a degree to alleviate some of the product shortage problems . . . and there has been a great increase in the number of theatres which have converted to a complete or major time specialized film operation, giving the industry an ever-growing solid core of theatres operating profitably in this field.

"These theatres take little or no product away from houses playing commercial pictures . . . and throw off enough money to a circuit operator to appreciably help the rest of his operations. Reade quoted the N.Y. Herald Tribune to the effect that specialized film theatre grosses (after taxes) in 1957 ran to $32,000,000. Figure, published in the Tribune in April, actually was an estimate based on the VARIETY survey (published in February) of foreign film grosses and was credited accordingly at the time.

Reade said the committee felt that, in 1958, the theatre gross should run to $50,000,000. He said the most spectacular personality to appear in the foreign film field in 1958 was Brigitte Bardot. Noting the transition of foreign players into Hollywood films, Reade opined "It may well be that the specialized film theatre will be the proving grounds from which will emerge the Hollywood stars of the future—stars which Hollywood with its reduced studio staffs and lesser number of pictures can no longer develop itself."

Walter Winchell is still taking potshots at Hecht-Hill-Lancaster—since this indie outfit turned out "Sweet Smell of Success," which was about an unsavory columnist. Latest printed Winchell barb is that H-H-L will have three losers in a row if "Separate Tables" fails.

9 New Ones, 4 Reissues; U Marks Lana Turner's 'Imitation' for Easter

Releasing and promotional plans for Universal's first quarter of new year starting in November, as well as details of the company's new coproduction program, were discussed in Manhattan Monday (20) by U's sales and ad-pub executives. Sessions were presided over by Henry H. Martin, general sales manager.

Out of meeting came the decision to make "Imitation of Life," a CinemaScope tinter starring Lana Turner, John Gavin, Sandra Dee, Susan Kohner, Robert Alda and Dan O'Herlihy, Universal's Easter release. Also skedded ahead was "Never Steal Anything Small" as a pre-release for Washington's birthday.

Altogether, nine new films and four reissues will be released by U during the first quarter of the 1958-'59 season. David A. Lipton, U v.p., outlined promotional plans for the sked.

Martin said Universal's program "consisting of an important group of record budget multi-million dollar productions, is designed to meet the entertainment needs of today's motion picture audiences."

Record heat wave is cutting into local first-runs here this week. This coupled with the absence of any particularly sparkling newcomers will hold prospects down to modest to pleasing figures. "Barbarian and Geisha" is pacemaker with a pleasant $26,000 or close likely for four theatres. "Onionhead" is heading for nice $17,000 or thereabouts in three houses.

"Gun Runner" with "I Bury the Living" looks slim for three spots. "Hot Car Girl" shapes sad in two locations.

Minneapolis, Oct. 21.

With Radio City's demise last Wednesday (15), there currently are 4,100 fewer seats and one showhouse less. However, it remains to be seen how other remaining cinemas will be affected. Reduction of the number of houses finds only one new major standout, "Gigi," and it was downtown before for four weeks as a hard-ticket attraction, but in that fancy at pop scale at Orpheum after moderate four weeks at $2.25 top.

It's the 34th and 17th weeks, respectively, for the hard-ticket "Search for Paradise" and "South Pacific" which continue to hold stoutly. Fourth week for "The Defiant Ones" looks okay. Third for "Big Country" looks socko. "Barbarian and Geisha" is okay in first holdover round.

Hotel Strike Sloughing Pitt Albeit 'Country' Lively $16,000 for 2d

Pittsburgh, Oct. 21.

Concentration on football over weekend and the hotel strike are probably hurting, but can't be blamed entirely for sharp downgrade in business. Only "Big Country" at Penn is doing much. Elsewhere in downtown, "Missouri Traveler" at Harris. "Onionhead" at Stanley and holdover of "Barbarian and Geisha" are sinking. "Windjammer" at the Warner shows no signs of building in sixth session. Third stanza for "Streetcar Named Desire" at Squirrel Hill still is okay.

"Mister Roberts" and "High and Mighty" combo, out of reissue, is rated fine at Orpheum.

'COLONEL,' 'GIGI,' 'DEFIANT' AGES

Detroit, Oct. 21.

Downtowners still are rolling along at a good clip currently. "Onionhead" looks good at the Michigan. "Me and the Colonel" shapes great at the Madison. However, holdovers and longruns are doing the best biz. "Defiant Ones" is having a tremendous second week at the Palms. "Gigi" shapes whopping in first week at Trans-Lux Krim after moving from the Adams where it enjoyed terrific biz in a long run.

K.C. OKAY; 'LAURENT' FAT 8½G, 'CAT' 5G, 8TH

Kansas City, Oct. 21.

Fine fall weather and annual American Royal Live Stock and Horse Show and attendant activities with a flock of out-of-towners are some help to biz which is on firm side this session. Among the new films, "Case of Dr. Laurent" at the Uptown, is fine, and may hold. Banning this film by Kansas censor board caused a scrambling of Fox Midwest situations, eliminating the usual first-runs. "Onionhead" at Paramount is just okay. "Fearmakers" in four Dickinson houses looks fair. Big news continues to be holdovers, "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" being unable to get away from Roxy as planned and had to be held over. "Gigi" is providing a strong second week at Midland.

Estimates for This Week

N.Y. Offish But 'Roots' Lofty $23,000; 'Senechal' $6,700, 'Sea' Lusty $26,400, 'Country' Big 26G, 'Cat' $130,000, 5th

Absence of many new pictures plus competition including new tv fall show preems and heightened concentration on the fall state elections are being blamed currently for the spotty business at Broadway deluxers. Weather conditions favored an upbeat at the wickets but this was only in evidence Saturday night at the bigger first-runs.

Lone major newcomer is "Roots of Heaven," which hit a lofty $23,000 in the first six days at the Palace. "Senechal, the Magnificent" looks best of arty house entrants with a smash $6,700 opening week at the 55th Street Playhouse. "Seventh Seal" did a fine $7,800 in initial session at the Paris, but wasn't as strong as expected in the light of critical raves.

Second-weekers are topped by "Old Man and Sea," which wound the initial holdover week at the Criterion with a fancy $26,400. The moveover run of "South Pacific" at the Rivoli is landing a torrid $29,000 in second stanza. "Decks Ran Red" is heading for a slow $10,000 at the State in second.

Still money champ is "Cat on Hot Tin Roof" with stageshow, with a fine $130,000 likely in current (5th) round at the Music Hall. It stays on. "Damn Yankees" plus stageshow is heading for a good $49,000 in fourth (final) week at the Roxy, where "Last Hurrah" moves in tomorrow (Thurs.).

"Barbarian and Geisha" looks to hit a good $30,000 in third week at the Paramount. "Big Country" likely will land a great $26,000 in current (3d) stanza at the Astor. "Onionhead" is down to a lean $11,000 in third at the Capitol where "Torpedo Run" opens Friday (24).

"Defiant Ones" held with smash $20,500 in fourth week at the Victoria. "Streetcar Named Desire" looks to do a big $16,000 or over in second frame at the Mayfair.

"South Seas Adventure" pushed to a sock $34,900 in 13th session at the Warner where it now is in the 14th week. "Gigi" climbed to a capacity $22,400 in 22d round at the Royale, now being in its 23d week. "Night Heaven Fell" opened day-date at Odeon and Fine Arts yesterday (Tues.).

Yank Industry Joins Mexican Fest

'The Defiant Ones' Scores After Earlier Anti-Americanism Stands Out

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Hollywood was officially repped by American players at current Mexican Film Festival in Mexico City, following Assn. of Motion Picture Producers about-face. Decision to send thesps was reached after Mexican fete authorities and Robert Corkery, v.p. in charge of Latin American Affairs for MPEA, had communicated with Y. Frank Freeman, AMPP board chairman.

Slated to attend are Martha Hyer, Hugh O'Brian, Macdonald Carey, Julie Adams and Myrna Hansen. Eric Johnston, MPAA prexy, also will host American reception Oct. 26, following his return from Russia.

Local authorities adopted its hands-off attitude when it was learned that Mexicans had asked Hollywood agent Johnny Maschio to round up personalities, at same time they made their pitch to AMPP.

Called 'Diplomatic Triumph'

A crowd which had hooted and whistled at several American films, but had applauded the Soviet offering, reversed its attitude at the film festival in Mexico City over the weekend when it loudly cheered the presentation of the Stanley Kramer production of "The Defiant Ones."

Picture, starring Sidney Poitier and Tony Curtis, has an inter-racial theme, presenting a story in which a colored and a white man escape manacled together from a chain gang. They eventually become friends and sacrifice their freedom to help oneanother.

When entered at Berlin earlier this year, the State Dept. objected on the grounds that the theme of the film was bad public relations for the U. S.

A New York Times dispatch from Mexico City Monday (20) called presentation of "The Defiant Ones" a "diplomatic triumph." Instead of the usual chorus of catcalls and derisive whistles that have greeted anything connected with the United States in the festival thus far, the audience rose to cheer following the showing of 'The Defiant Ones,'" reporter Paul P. Kennedy wrote.

"Racial discrimination in the U.S. has been used here with increasing vigor and effectiveness over the last month by organizations obviously trying to create a widening rift between the U.S. and Mexico," the Times story said. It said publicity about the festival was badly organized and a number of journalists were unable to get tickets and had to buy their own balcony seats in the auditorium.

'New' Version of 1937 'Illusion' Scoring Hit At Paris Arty House

Paris, Oct. 21.

A case of proper merchandising of an old film property overcoming audience reluctance to pay first-run prices for a reissue is amply illustrated here by the re-release of the so-called "new" version of the 1937 French pacifistic pic, "La Grande Illusion." The Jean Renoir-directed film has been playing capacity at a small arty house (on Champs-Elysees) and on a first-run basis for over a week now. Pic has been regularly released in specialized houses of the nabe areas and at the French Film Museum.

Renoir announced he had compiled the first integral version of the pic, which had been shown everywhere with certain scenes lopped out. He found a negative in Munich last year. The film's choice as one of the 12 all-time greats at the recent Brussels Fest of All-Time Greats also helped along with regular critiques smart publicity and a shrewd play on the aspects of this humane, brilliant film.

Pacifistic pic is primarily a human document of men at war and transcends this by showing the need for liberty and respect which can exist on both sides. The stellar cast includes the late Eric Von Stroheim, Jean Gabin and Pierre Fresnay.

Proves WBZ-TV No Code

Dublin, Oct. 21.

One-time VARIETY staffer Mike Kaplan's addiction for the paper got him out of trouble with Irish telegraph officials last week. Kaplan is currently in Dublin as unit publicist on "Shake Hands With the Devil," James Cagney starrer for United Artists release.

Kaplan sent off a lengthy cable last week regarding a group of set visitors, including Mildred Albert of WBZ-TV. Irish telegraph officials, unfamiliar with the initial nomenclature of American radio-tv stations, quibbled over the use of WBZ-TV, insisting it must be a code and flatly refused to pass it.

That's when Kaplan's knowledge of VARIETY paid off. He recalled reading in the Oct. 1 issue that a WBZ-TV newscaster had received a 20-year service pin from Westinghouse and he triumphantly hauled the copy down to the telegraph office to win approval of his message.

Commies Cash In On AFN B'casts

Hoechst, Oct. 21.

The Communists, alert to any chance of taking advantage of a ready-made audience, have come up with a classic idea to take advantage of the thousands of listeners tuned in to AFN, the American Forces Network headquartered here. When AFN signs off throughout Germany at 1:05 a.m., the Soviets, broadcasting from Radio Moscow, sign on at the same frequency. And with announcers who are either Americans or Russians who spent years in the U.S. perfecting their accents, the Soviets come on with a "news broadcast" following the AFN format — but completely slanted to the party line—and interspersed with late night dreamy music of latest popular records.

The recent "news analysis" concerned an international peace conference in Tokyo attended by reps of 39 countries, talking of an impassioned prayer for peace made by a woman invalided by the Americans' atomic bombing of Hiroshima. It concluded with a plea to cease using atomic weapons and withdraw U.S. troops from Lebanon and Jordan.

Only after 15 minutes of this propaganda-loaded broadcast, did the station (heard with perfect clarity in Germany) identify itself as Radio Moscow.

While AFN is primarily designed to provide entertainment and information for American troops in Europe, its secondary function of providing unbiased information to millions of European listeners is often cited as a major public relations job for the U.S. done by the GI-network. Estimated that it has about 30,000,000 European listeners. And the Russians are now engaged in an all-out campaign to win these listeners to their way of thinking.

An American newspaper published for the military in Europe, "The American Weekend," is currently spearheading a campaign for AFN to increase its broadcasting time to a 24-hours of programming instead of the 19 hours daily which it now covers.

The Far East Network and military stations in Okinawa and Korea broadcast the whole day, partly to keep the frequency filled so that the Reds cannot take over. Cost of increasing the AFN program to 24 hours would be slight, according to AFN officials, since they could fill the added time from their extensive record libraries. A few more enlisted men and a few more German employees would be required.

Payoff in public service, of keeping the millions of European listeners tuned to AFN

Tati Due in N.Y. Oct. 23

Paris, Oct. 21.

Jacques Tati is due in N.Y. Thursday (23). He is going over for personal appearances before, as well as to be present at the opening of his third pic in N.Y., the Cannes prizewinning pic, "My Uncle." It is due to open at the Guild and Baronet theatres, Nov. 3.

Tati claims that the English version he made alongside the French would be fine for regular situations in America. In the English version, the modern people speak American with accents while the people in the old quarter speak French.

Assoc. British Revamps Elstree Studios to Fit Producer Requirements

London, Oct. 21.

A reorganization of existing studio space and the addition of new facilities is announced by Associated British at its Elstree lot. Plans have been completed to divide stage 1 into two new stages, each with a floor space area of 7,250 square feet.

One of the main reasons for the division is to help producers who need only a large and a medium sized stage; they can now be accommodated without having to occupy two full stages. They will also be economical for tv production, tests, rehearsals and process work. The work is to be put in hand immediately and is due to be completed next year.

New additions at Elstree include the provision of a second re-recording theatre, a special building to accommodate single and triple track re-recorders, 12 new cutting rooms and a new transfer suite, which contains a 35m transfer channel and 16m magnetic and optical transfer equipment. The studio is already equipped with four BNC Mitchell cameras while a new RCA 35m portable magnetic recording channel is being imported from America.

O'BRIEN VS. FOOTBALL ON TELE SAT. NIGHTS

London, Oct. 14.

Sir Tom O'Brien, M.P., and general secretary of the National Assn. of Theatrical and Kine Employees, doesn't want football matches televised on Saturday nights because of the possible effect this might have on the boxoffice. Sir Tom has lodged an appeal with the Football League, in which he said that the economic position of theatres was such that they were "fighting for their lives."

"The jobs of thousands of people are in jeopardy," he added, "and to exacerbate this serious problem by Saturday night televised football matches would indeed bring great harm to the industry and cause such great damage and far outweigh whatever advantage televised football would bring."

Deny Venice Film Fest Director on Way Out

Rome, Oct. 14.

Reports that Venice Film Festival director Floris Luigi Ammannati would be fired or would retire soon have been denied by the Venice Biennale Office, which controls all matters relating to film fests in that city.

It had been reported that Ammannati had incurred Vatican displeasure because of the selection of films considered immoral shown at this year's event. In addition, crix of the fest pointed to the Catholic Film Office's unprecedented rap of the festival in not awarding the O.C.I.C. prize this year.

One source in defending Ammannati's administration cites an article in a Jesuit publication in which the selection of (immoral) films is listed as "not the festival's fault." The church organ goes on to note that the festival's duty is to form an objective panorama (of world production). Considerable controversy this year surrounded a number of Venice selections, notably such French pix as "Les Amants" (The Lovers) and "En Cas de Malheur" (In Case of Illness), for their reputedly highly censorable aspects.

Vikings Too Violent?

Munich, Oct. 21.

Crying out against the Americans' accent on the violent, an editorial in The Overseas Weekly, American newspaper published for the military abroad, bemoans:

"Is it possible that we Americans have been fed such a diet of blood and gore that movie producers believe it takes a real overdose to sell a film? The idea occurred to us while we were viewing 'The Vikings,' a movie which had been sold as a 'historical film along the lines of Prince Valiant.'

"In a scant two hours, 'The Vikings' showed:

"1. Kirk Douglas gored and blinded by a hawk;

"2. A drunken Viking throwing axes at the head of a pinioned 'unfaithful wife';

"3. Tony Curtis chained to drown in a rising tide at the mercy of man-eating crabs.

"4. A chieftain leaping to his death in a pit of starving wolves;

"5. An angry king chopping off the hand of Tony Curtis with a sword;

"6. The king falling in the pit of starving wolves amid appropriate growls.

"We didn't mind the usual shockers, the dead king's wife being assaulted by the Viking chieftain, the sword in the second lead's belly, or the boulders dropped on warriors in the climactic battle. But the overdose left us sorta shook.

"Time to go back to Grimm's Fairy Tales and Shakespeare," the editorial concludes. "At least the deaths are clean-cut."

54,500 Yanks Visited Britain in August

London, Oct. 21.

Britain seems to be an increasingly popular place for American tourists. Out of a record total of 188,000 overseas visitors to this country in August, there were 54,500 Americans.

This constitutes an increase of 30% over last year's total for the same period (41,900) reports the British Travel and Holidays Assn. For the first eight months of this year American tourists totalled 245,000—up by 22% over the same period in 1957.

Swedish Censors Ban Horror Films

Stockholm, Oct. 14.

Swedish censors have taken a definite stand against new horror pix. During September, two such British films were banned. "Revenge of Frankenstein" and "Horror of Dracula." Incidentally, the British Hammer production, "Curse of Frankenstein" was banned a year ago. However, Universal has decided to take a chance by reissuing its 1931 production of "Frankenstein." Since the pic has been shown here before, it again passed the censors, with the same cuts as the last time the film was shown. Same company also has reissued its "Werewolf of London."

Of the new horror films, few have appeared at the cinemas here so far. Such films shown are "Monster That Challenged The World" (UA), "The Fly" (20th) and "Revenge of Creature." (U).

Of the 43 films opened at Stockholm's first-runs during September, 19 were American, 10 were British; four each came from France and Sweden; three German, two Italian and one Austrian. During same month, six films were reissued, among them "Gone With Wind," (M-G) again playing with good results here.

WELTNER LAUDS PAR'S FILM PROD. PROGRAM

Tokyo, Oct. 14.

On the first leg of his global mission to spread the word of Paramount topper Barney Balaban's "affirmation of faith" policy, company's sales manager George Weltner told a luncheon of industry and press reps here that within a year, Paramount will produce at least 20 pictures in the million-dollar category.

Acknowledging pressures from tv and straining within the industry, Weltner declared: "We say without qualifications that the motion picture will never relinquish its long-held place of leadership in the broad sphere of entertainment."

Indicating Paramount's financial resources with which to back up its program, Weltner said, "We are a company with no pressing fiscal problems, a company with no internal problem, a company that is regarded in Wall Street as 'the management company,' whose securities are selling at the highest price in our history."

Product Flood, So No Pain In Spain Anymore

By JOAQUINA C. VIDAL-GOMIS

Barcelona, Oct. 14.

The atmosphere of the cinema world in Spain has undergone a complete change, due to the fact that after three seasons of scarcity a great number of American features are on the market. The release of these started about the middle of September and at the end of December more than 30 will have been shown the public.

The present arrangement, that is, with American distributors having a maximum of three and a minimum of two, and Spanish distributors having 10 and 12 American features, creates an inferiority complex in the first, who see their trademark being exploited by other companies. The public naturally is not concerned by these inside affairs and has received with glee the ads of the Spanish distributors saying, more or less, "good American product is again in the market." Certainly it has never been absolutely away, because last season, though the worst during the "boycott," saw 30-odd American pix released.

These are films now playing in Spain:

"A Spanish Affair" (Par); "Moby Dick," "Iron Mistress," "Dragnet," "The Prince and the Show Girl" (WB); "Man of a Thousand Faces" and "Tamango" (U). Coming up are "To Catch a Thief" (Par) and "East of Eden" (WB).

Incidentally, audiences in Spain were not too much impressed by their belated introduction to James Dean, although the reviewers admitted that he had lived he might have become an actor of stature. As a rule Spanish audiences are unresponsive to dead actors. Jorge Negrete, the Mexican singer, was a great favorite in Spain, but since his death his films have disappeared from the screens.

This season, with abundance of features from all countries, will be the "year of the exhibitor."

Bullring Owner Owns 7 Barcelona Theatres; Acquires Coliseum

Barcelona, Oct. 14.

Coliseum cinema here has changed hands again. Built in 1924 and until 1936 the Paramount showcase, it has, since 1941, been operated by Empresa Cines y Espectaculos. Property has now been sold to Empresa Balana. This means that its new proprietor, is the same Pedro Balana who owns all the bull rings in Barcelona.

Sale price for the Coliseum and the building was near $2,400,000. Its acquisition increases to seven the film houses controlled by the toro tycoon. He has the Tivoli, Borras, Alcazar, Poliorama, Principal Palaccie and Avenida de la Luz.

YANK-HELPS-YANK OVERSEAS

Pakistan Cuts Imports of U.S. Pix

New Delhi, Oct. 14.

The Pakistani government is to slash in half the quota of exchange for foreign-language features imported into the country. Such film imports are mainly Hollywood product.

Simultaneously, Pakistan is ceasing issue of import licenses for Indian features; pending final decision to be arrived at after talks with Pak film industry reps. , Stoppage of import licensing will not be retroactive.

Move stems from tightness of Pakistan's foreign-exchange situation.

MPEA-Spain Pact To Change Little Through 1958-59

Madrid, Oct. 14.

Interim agreement signed in June by Spanish authorities and the Motion Picture Export Assn. will continue with modifications during 1958-59, according to Madrid sources, and a full accord will definitely not be written this year.

Negotiations between MPEA Mediterranean director Frank Gervasi and government film authorities are reported to have centered on the question of restoring U.S. parity with Spanish distribs in allocation of Hollywood product.

Ministry higher-ups and MPEA in New York are studying an acceptable formula drafted by Gervasi and Spanish negotiators after two weeks of roundtabling. Formula, it is said, would increase low Yank allotment in June pact.

Additional quota is still a negotiating secret but anything less than three more films per American company would be considered a setback for MPEA. Also sought is government permission to import foreign pix other than Hollywood product.

MPEA attitude, as seen here, is that Americans have run out of concessions after having accepted allocation inequality, waived dollar remittances and okayed Spanish percentage distribution of MPEA product in partial agreement.

Metro Sees Advantage Of Owning Own Cinemas In Germany; 3 Now Open

Frankfurt, Oct. 14.

Metro has found it a great advantage to own its own theatres in Germany because it can make experiments with films it might not otherwise release here, according to Metro's European sales manager, J. D. Berman, here on a visit. Metro is the only U.S. distributor in Germany to own a chain of houses.

"For instance, since short cartoons are entirely unknown in Germany, we would probably never have offered them for sale to another theatre. But we tried a whole evening of Tom and Jerry cartoons in our Berlin house—and it proved a huge success," said Berman.

Metro currently owns three houses in Germany, in Berlin, Hamburg and Frankfurt. House here is the only one which has played American pictures exclusively since its opening a year ago. Business has been excellent, Berman pointed out. In addition, the company has its own business offices in the theatre buildings.

Metro has no immediate plans for increasing the number of its houses in Germany at this time, Berman says. It has had to completely drop its plans for the first series of drive-ins to be built in Germany. Project was abandoned because of a recent German law setting the hour at which children must be out of a theatre (no children under six are permitted in a cinema, and older children must be out at prescribed hours). This destroyed one of the prime motives Metro had for planning ozoners for the whole family.

Scot Cinema Attendance Dipped 50% in 9 Years Indie Exhibitor Claims

Glasgow, Oct. 21.

Attendance in some cinemas here has dropped by as much as 50% in the last nine years. Herbert J. Green, indie exhib, admitted this at a cinema appeals court here. His firm is appealing against assessments of $33,000,000 for seven city cinemas.

As anti-cinema trends, he listed the lower purchasing power of potential payees, installment buying, television and long-playing disks. There was so much entertainment at the moment that people just put their feet up and stay home.

Exhib quoted declines in attendances ranging from 51% at his city center Playhouse to 33% at another big house. There is still a downward trend although there had been a slight levelling off in the second quarter of this year because of the very wet summer. Green said there is so much buying on time in the U.K. now, and so many debts to be paid, that if people have a tv still to be paid for they feel it is foolish to go out and attend a cinema.

Another cause of falling attendance, he said, is the dispersal of the population into housing schemes on the city outskirts.

Cinema attendance in Scotland 10 years ago was approximately 1,500,000,000. Now, about 700,000,000 people attend each year.

Since 1956, the fall at the b.o. here has been continual, according to Green. Nobody, he told the assessment appeal court, is now prepared to build a cinema in new development areas.

Okay Plans for Theatre To Replace Old Abbey

Dublin, Oct. 14.

Plans for the new Abbey Theatre to replace structure burned out in 1951 have now been okayed by the Dublin Corporation. Approval of the Irish government, which will put up part of finances for building, is still to come but is not likely to be long delayed.

Irish architect Michael Scott, a one-time Abbey player, and French architect Pierre Sonrel, have made designs for the new building which will incorporate a main auditorium seating about 800 with, a smaller experimental theatre. First plans ran into trouble with Dublin Corporation planners. A modified version was submitted some time ago but was just greenlighted.

Same Film Reopens Bombed-Out Theatre

London, Oct. 14.

This-is-Where-I-Came-in Department. On Jan. 10, 1941, the Ritz, Gosport, was starting to show a documentary pic called "Christmas Under Fire." Fire-bombs crashed through the roof and the cinema was burned out.

On Saturday (18) the theatre, rebuilt, opened its doors again. First film to be shown will be "Christmas Under Fire," the sole remaining copy which was borrowed from the Central Office of Information.

COS. LEND, RENT TO EACH OTHER

By HY HOLLINGER

Madrid, Oct. 14.

The internationalization of the American picture industry, with films being made in almost every part of the globe, has resulted in a gigantic barter system in equipment, personnel and information, according to producer Ted Richmond. Here to supervise the production of "Solomon and Sheba," a Copa (Richmond and Tyrone Power) and Edward Small coproduction with United Artists financing, Richmond outlined the new spirit of cooperation that exists among independents and the major film companies making pictures abroad.

This comraderie, Richmond noted, is in marked contrast to the bitter competitiveness that once existed when an American film unit abroad would rather destroy equipment than lend, rent or sell it to a rival outfit. At present, Richmond pointed out, each film unit working abroad is aware of the presence or impending arrival of another production unit and arrangements are worked out to exchange equipment, personnel and knowhow gained in making a film in a particular area or foreign studio.

For example, the producer noted that when the Samuel Bronston production of "John Paul Jones" for Warner Bros. wound up its activities in Spain, it left key personnel and sold miscellaneous pieces of production equipment to the "Solomon and Sheba" unit which is shooting at the Sevilla Studios and at various locations in the environs of Madrid. Richmond's sound crew came from Africa after it completed work on Darryl F. Zanuck's "Roots of Heaven." Additional equipment came from producer Anatole Litvak after he completed "The Journey" in Vienna and Munich.

"We're turning around and offering personnel and equipment to other companies," Richmond said. "We've already received letters from Hollywood about units which contemplate making pictures here and other parts of Europe." He added that scouts from Metro and Universal had come through the area to look over the situation for productions that might be filmed in Spain. As a concrete example of the barter system, Richmond disclosed that a moviola that left Hollywood four years ago is still being used by various production units making films abroad.

Specialists

The activity of American companies making films in Europe has developed corps of specialists who move from picture to picture in Europe. These include Americans as well as bi-lingual Europeans, with the latter serving as assistant directors, production assistants and local publicists. The presence of these people is passed on from company to company and it's not unusual for these individuals to have steady employment as one picture moves out and another takes its place.

A considerable number of ex-Hollywoodites, with various skills in picture-making, are now living abroad permanently and find their services in demand when a new American company arrives.

Another little known aspect of American filming abroad is the knowledge in both equipment and technique that the U.S. companies are passing on to the local film industry. This is particularly the case in Italy and Spain. When Metro's "Ben Hur," for example, winds up at the Cinecitta Studio in Rome, it will leave behind, via sale or as part of the production deal, equipment and sets (including a wardrobe building, a stable, and an artificial lake for sea scenes). Similarly some equipment will be left with the Seville Studios in Spain. Most important, however, will be the passing on of Hollywood production techniques which are regarded as the best in the world.

To Handle Pix Problems by Direct Decree Under New French Regime

Paris, Oct. 21.

Film people have been scanning the first printing of the new French Constitution under the Fifth Republic to try and determine the future standing of the film industry since pix are partly under national administrative and subsidy dependence. Such a scrutiny has eased worries here, for it seems that film problems can now be handled by direct decree. Also that they are not under any parliamentary control except for certain fiscal tax aspects or in the event of nationalization, not considered likely.

Film people feel that needed new pix rulings and laws can now be put through easier. The Centre Du Cinema is now working on these. An extension of the needed Film Aid law for two years is expected, when it runs out next January. Multi-weekly programming allowances plus an eventual trend towards double features are also felt to be in the offing to bolster falling film attendance.

The effect on foreign, and especially Yank film distribution, under these new laws is unclear so far. But they will probably be negligible. However, the greater power handed the CNC might make it easier for prexy Jacques Flaud to put into effect his plans on handling the remaining 1958 visas. The remaining 40 Yank visas of this year's allowance would be handled on a merit basis.

Zaiton, the Shaw Organization's Malay star, has returned from the U.S. where she represented Malaya and Singapore at the Pan American-San Francisco "Pacific Festival."

'L'Atlantide,' Super-Spec Opera-Ballet, Gets Stormy 1st-Night Paris Reception

Paris, Oct. 21.

The new big-scale, super-spec opera-ballet of the season, "L'Atalantide," got a stormy first-night reception here and fared fair to well with the press. It's at the state subsidized National Opera.

Delayed for more than a year due to strikes, ect., the work written in '54 by Henri Tomasi and Francis Didelot got into further difficulties when Ludmilla Tcherina ankled the leading role two weeks before premiere. Claude Bessy was hustled in to replace her as prima ballerina.

Choreographer Serge Lifar had also vamoosed saying there were now too many people involved in the balletic aspects and he had become merely a dance supervisor. Miss Tcherina quit for she did not agree with the "artistic conception" of the opera by Opera prexy Georges Hirsch.

Opening night led to factions getting into some slapping scrapes, but general audience re action was good. Press found that the big stage somewhat swamped the work and it was treated a bit too realistically. Tale is about a vamp-like beauty who is loved by two Frenchmen who happen on her island which is akin to the lost city of Atlantis. It is based on Pierre Benoit's famous 1918 novel, and various screen versions have been made.

Miss Bessy was found both excellent and wanting in sensual overtones by critics and the music, and the idea of having the main role of an opera only terped, also came in for discussion. But scenic values, publicity and some real musical plusses should make this a fairly lucrative addition to the Opera repertory.

Own House Full, Books The Opposition Theatre

Dublin, Oct. 14.

Because the current revue, "Home James," starring Jimmy O'Dea, is doing SRO biz and will over-run its skedded period at the Gaiety here, Louis Elliman, who controls theatre and bankrolls the show, has booked opposition legiter, Olympia, for "The Informer." This play by Liam O'Flaherty was set to be staged at the Gaiety Nov. 10.

Incidentally, Leo McCabe, joint prexy of the Olympia, played a bit part in John Ford's screen version of "The Informer" 23 years ago.

Paris, Oct. 14,

"Prima Ballerina Ludmilla Tcherina walked out of "L'Atlantis" at the National Opera, stating she did not agree with the "artistic conception" of the piece by Opera prexy Georges Hirsch.

Opera-ballet by Pierre Benoit was mounted by Hirsch to music by Henri Tomassi, with sets and costumes by Douking and choreography by Serge Lifar.

Hirsch accepted ballerina's resignation and picked Claude Bessy as replacement.

British Swing To Production Of Filmusicals

London, Oct. 14.

With growing confidence, the British film industry is turning back to the filmusical field which, since the flop of Rank's "London Town" in 1946, has largely had it baffled. "Gentleman's Gentleman," to be produced by Ben Fisz for Rank and starring Gene Kelly, will start shooting next year. Done in Todd-AO, it will be one of 1959's most ambitious British productions.

"Grab Me A Gondola" for which location shots have already been done and which is to star Diana Dors; "Lady is a Square," in which Herbert Wilcox directs Anna Neagle and Frankie Vaughan, and a Ben Fisz production of an untitled Sonja Henie ice-musical, with Michael Wilding, Stanley Holloway and Dennis Price, are other indications that musicals are on their way back in U.K. studios.

The present trend was sparked off by the production of a number of films which, without pretending to be epics, succeeded satisfactorily at the boxoffice. "Tommy Steele Story," "The Duke Wore Jeans," "Six-Five Special" and "The Golden Disk" are examples of this trend.

Powell and Pressburger's "Red Shoes." "Tales of Hoffman" and "Oh, Rosalinda" were arty prestige successes. Other postwar attempts have been made by Marcel Hellman with "Happy Go Lovely" and "Let's Be Happy," both of which leaned heavily on U.S. stars for marquee value.

Associated-British had a go with "The Good Companions" and Herbert Wilcox has most persistently explored the musical field in the years since the war with successes such as "Spring in Park Lane," and "Maytime in Mayfair."

Before the war musical films such as "Evergreen," "Sunshine Susie," "Jack's The Boy" and "Jack Ahoy" were an essential and useful part of the British film pattern. Current trend suggests that British studios are really going into the musical field.

Last week's Page One in VARIETY on film director Fred Wilcox looking for a Negro girl (meaning not a white actress) as the lead in his hoped-for picturization of "I Passed for White" seems worthy of a look-back footnote. The Sunday Pictorial, Britain's hard-hitting tabloid with a circulation of over 5,000,000, used its full front page to slam "a sinister device which is due to arrive in Britain from Hollywood next year disguised as film entertainment." The device, known medically as subliminal suggestion, enables ideas and fears to be played unseen in people's minds without their knowledge. Lionel Crane, the Pictorial's Hollywood reporter, revealed that at least 40 of these symbols, such as words like "Blood" and "Death" and drawings of such things as skulls will be used in William Edwards' horror pic, "My World Dies Screaming." Describing this as "rape of the mind" the Pictorial urged the Home Secretary to ban this device completely and censors to examine every frame of any suspect film. It is already illegal for advertisers to use subliminal suggestion on Britain's commercial tv.

BRITISH FILM PRODUCERS FRET

By HAROLD MYERS

London, Oct. 21.

Although John Davis insists that the Rank Organization's new policy was conditioned by the acute product shortage, many indie film producers fear that the elimination of one major circuit may make it more difficult for them to get playdates and hence make it increasingly difficult for them to raise finance.

At two separate functions last week, Davis indulged in frank and free exchange with Britain's film makers. On Tuesday (14) he hosted a dinner to members of the Federation of British Film Makers and the following night of the members of the British Film Producers' Assn. At each function he made a long opening statement in which he reviewed the events which led to the Rank reorganization program, and for the next two or three hours answered questions.

The prospect of diminishing screen time for the indies was illustrated by Lord Archibald, the Federation's prexy, when he pointed out that the booking pattern of the industry was such that the Rank theatres normally played the Columbia, Paramount, Universal, United Artists and part of the 20th-Fox output, as well as their own Pinewood productions. Hitherto, this product had been spread over the Odeon and Gaumont chains but now would have to be concentrated on the new major Rank circuit. In his reply, the Rank topper declared there were no firm commitments, not even with their own producers.

It was also suggested that the scarcity of play dates might well effect the British film industry's bargaining strength in negotiations with continental countries, all of whom made a pitch for circuit release. Davis described that as an embarrassing question to answer in the presence of the trade press.

Point of Agreement

During the discussion, Lord Archibald and Davis were on common ground in agreeing that the concession accorded the industry in the last budget (when the admission taxes were slashed by 50%), would be swallowed up by declining grosses by next summer. Not even total abolition, Davis stated, could have altered the situation, as product availability was the key to the problem.

At both meetings Davis slammed horror, sex and salacity on the screen, asserting that he had evidence to show that such product had lost the industry the family trade. He believed these films did a grave disserve to the industry, Davis revealed that he had discussed the matter with the film censor.

The anxiety of the independents was apparent at the second dinner and led to a vigorous exchange between James Carreras, the Hammer Films boss, and Davis. Carreras said he was speaking as an independent who made about six films a year with his own money, and he sought assurances that there would still be the same opportunities for release as in the past. He was particularly insistent in demanding the booking formula for what Davis had described as the Fox releasing circuit and which Lord Archibald, the previous night, had called an amorphous circuit. It was emphasized in the ensuing exchanges that to get a release on this outlet it would not be a case of going to just one booker, but to the bookers of the various chains that comprise the third circuit.

Davis estimated that it would take three months to put the plan into operation and he anticipated that the new major 300-strong circuit would be a reality in January. The proposed closure of 80 theatres, however, would be a long-term spreadover arrangement and the houses would not go dark until they had been sold. Many of the 80 theatres which would comprise their subsidiary chain and which would be available for specialized releases and moveovers to give extended playing time, would also be used to strengthen the Fox circuit. Davis said this would substantially strengthen the position of that group in London, which had hiterto been its weakest link.

Adjustment will bring the major circuit strength back to the 1953 level. At that time, owing to a dispute between the Rank Organization and 20th-Fox over the former's refusel to equip for stereophonic sound, 20th withdrew its output from the two Rank chains and got the backing of a group of indie circuit operators. Among the companies who are now involved in the Fox releasing outlet are Essoldo, Granada, Shipman and King and Sir Alexander B. King.

Social Affair Sours Into Forum On Albany's 'Frightening' Decline

Albany, Oct. 21.

The bantering note traditional with industry testimonial dinners suddenly took on a sombre tone at a farewell Wednesday night (15) for Norman Weitman, new manager for Universal in Cleveland. It did so when Jules Perlmutter, operating a string of theatres in the exchange district, launched into a strong criticism of the exchange closings and cutbacks that had enveloped Albany for more than two years and had been accelerated in recent months.

He received support from Joe Miller, a member of the dinner committee and present operator of the Menands Drive-in — after three decades as Columbia branch manager in Albany and in Buffalo.

Perlmutter was answered by the top distributor representative attending, Joseph B. Rosen, metropolitan regional manager for U (whose territory includes Albany). Rosen, onetime manager here for 20th Century-Fox, insisted that "these moves were necessary for the company to survive."

Another speaker, Dinner Chairman Clayton Pantages, Fox manager, said that maybe it was a good idea to bring the controversial subject "out into the open." He suggested that periodic industry gatherings, at which common problems could be frankly discussed, might be desirable.

One or two other speakers "laughed off" the "debate," but all guests realized that the testimonial dinner had turned into something more—had become, in effect, a forum. Several of them privately deplored the "introduction of business into a social affair." Others, while conceding Perlmutter's right to bring up the touchy matter, questioned that it would do any good.

"Very frightening" was Perlmutter's characterization of "the disintegration of the industry, so far as Albany is concerned." He doubted that "the major companies are doing the right thing" in relegating this key center to an interior status.

Theatre's Bowling Alleys

Ft. Wayne, Oct. 21.

Frank Benedict, vice president of Quimby Theatres here, discloses plans for his company to build a 24-lane bowling alley in the Quimby Village shopping area, to be called "Quimby Lanes." The alleys will be managed by Quimby Theaters and not leased to any other individual or group.

Project will stand near $400,000.

Dean Martin Loves Being Apart, But Not on That Dystrophy Fund 'Credit'

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Three years since the break-up of the team of Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis, Martin reports today "I'm doing four times better financially than when I was with Jerry. I'm a much happier man since the break. I can do what I want, I have more time with my family. I love working for myself. If something goes good, I know it's me; if something is bad, I don't have to wonder who's at fault."

On the set of Metro's "Some Came Running," in which he stars with Frank Sinatra, Martin said he resents recently printed reports giving Lewis solo credit for raising millions for Muscular Dystrophy. Emphasizing he was bringing it up only because of such reports, the singer-actor said "Those millions Jerry 'raised' were raised by both of us over a 10-year period, if anybody's interested. WE did it not he. I'm still doing it, and in addition I've raised $2,000,000 for the City of Hope, and they have a Dean Martin Wing at their hospital."

Martin's first of two spex on NBC-TV this season is Nov. 22, and he has as his guests on that one Bing Crosby and Phil Harris.

His next role will probably be as star in "The Beach Boys" at Columbia; then he will star in "Who Was That Lady" at Col; stars with Judy Holliday in "Bells Are Ringing" at Metro; stars with Sinatra in "Oceans of Love" at Warner Bros. In pix, he's booked through next August.

EUROPEAN FESTIVALS' YEN TO UNREEL 'PORGY'

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Venice, Berlin and Edinburgh film festivals of 1959 have officially requested special screenings of Sam Goldwyn's "Porgy." No decision has been reached whether the musical will play any European festival, but one thing is made clear—it will be shown only if projected in Todd-AO with newly devised soundtrack.

Jugoslavian government additionally requested film be screened there.

Film should be ready for screening by late summer of 1959.

Equity Scale Ends Wald Plan to Film 'Winesburg' As Future Memorandum

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Jerry Wald, who planned to put on film the little theatre stage production of "Wineburg, Ohio" as an aide memoire for his own future indie screen production of the Sherwood Anderson novel, has dropped the idea after learning he'd be required to pay additional fees to the actors involved.

Production is being produced and staged by Jeffrey Hayden at the Theatre of Arts here, and includes Darryl Hickman, Katherine Bard, Charles Aidman and Sterling Holloway.

Astors Equity intervened, informing Wald that he'd be required to pay the entire cast a week's extra salary, not at the "Winesburg" little theatre scale, but at standard Equity minimum.

Digest of TOA Committee Reports

Miami, Oct. 21.

Reports of various committees, organized to keep an eye on various activities of Theatre Owners of America, were submitted by the chairman of the groups at the opening day of the exhibitor organization's convention here.

Small Business Administration Committee Report—After noting TOA's efforts to obtain government loans for drive-ins, chairman Philip Harling said he was encouraged by the statement of SBA administrator Wendall Barnes that the SBA Loan Policy Board would "reevaluate in the near future" its policy which now prohibits loans for the recreational and amusement industry. "Such an evaluation could result in making drive-ins eligible for loans," Harling stated.

Harling calls attention to the Small Business Investment Act enacted by Congress on Sept. 5. Under this law, the government makes it possible for private investment companies to aid small business with loans for needed equity capital, for growth, expansion and modernization. Any group of 10 or more persons may prepare a certificate of incorporation and submit it to the SBA for approval.

Harling said his committee would recommend to the TOA board of directors that TOA and its various state organizations should endeavor to organize an investment company and concentrate its efforts in the exhibition field in particular areas. According to Harling, any small business affiliated with the motion picture industry, as well as any other business qualified under the SBA, could seek the aid of these investment companies. Harling said his committee feels that there is a tremendous opportunity to aid every exhibitor in the U.S. by the creation of these investment companies, as well as helping to get a rehabilitation program off the ground. He suggested that at least an initial application be made in an area selected by TOA "to launch these investment companies for and on behalf of exhibitors . . ."

Concessions Committee Report—Chairman Van Myers said the concessionaire is part of the theatre business and that he must think of himself as a showman. The concessionaire, he stressed, must use his total resources to help bolster boxoffice attendance, for only through added attendance can he expect to increase his business.

Myers makes the point that while the theatres have borne the brunt of the promotional effort to stimulate b.o. attendance, the concessionaire has benefitted from the extra wicket activity without contributing his share. "The concessionaire's fate is inextricably bound to the curve of theatre attendance," Myers noted. "The sooner he realizes this, with all it implications, the better off he will be . . . It is no question but that the concessionaire shares in the responsibility of the rejuvenation of the boxoffice."

National Legislation Report—Chairman A. Julian Brylawski points out that although some 27 bills to extend Federal minimum wage coverage were introduced in the House and Senate of the 85th Congress, no legislation on this subject was enacted. The subject of the minimum wages is open for action by the next Congress, Brylawski noted, but since all bills die with adjournment, new bills will be introduced next spring.

State and Local Legislation Committee—Co-chairman LaMarr Sarra and Robert Bryant found the threat of censorship "still real" despite the decisions of the U. S. Supreme Court. It's noted that several states and a fairly large number of municipalities have during the past year attempted to enact "a clearly drawn statute" for censorship. This effort continues, according to the co-chairman, and attempts have been intensified ("unfortunately") as a result of the so-called "art" pictures released during the year.

The committee notes that although the industry has won victories on the censorship question during the year, "the fact that such proposed legislation is offered in greater abundance should serve as a reminder to each exhibitor that we continue to have an important selling job facing us with a considerable segment of the public as well as with many of our legislators."

be another evil because it works in favor of only a few pix while others get pretty well passed over. This, he said, handicaps distribs because they are compelled to sell films singly "at enormous expense . . . which could be used to promote the picture."

And Skouras defended the way such pix as Paramount's "Ten Commandments" and his own studio's "Peyton Place" were merchandised, contending that millions spent on a picture warrants a sales policy that can recoup the investment plus a profit. How, he wondered, would the exhibs have handled such films?

It appeared he was attempting to take at least some of the onus off the producers when the 20th chief explained that Hollywood's policies are largely dictated by impatient stockholders, and he pictured himself, and other studio heads, as defending big companies from shareholders who would sooner liquidate. Such agitation, Skouras implied, forced sales of the backlogs to television, for without such revenue the majors "could not show profits or pay dividends. And we must pay dividends, otherwise the companies will liquidate."

Unpersuaded?

Exhibs gave his speech a nice reception, but the persuasive man had not persuaded them—at least not immediately. He left them with plenty of food for thought.

As for resolutions, convention: (1) Called for discontinuance of 16m release to schools and other institutions as injurious "free competition."

(2) Requested Allied's board to explore feasibility of a national buying circuit of indie exhibs "with a buying power equal to that of the large national theatre circuits."

nies, conduct such sessions on a monthly basis and their "guests," who are from all industries, are asked specified questions about earnings, dividends, etc.

Vogel doubtless is willing to discuss the Loew's situation freely, or else he wouldn't agree to appear.

Exec's only public statement since the new row with the Louis Green-Jerome Newman board-stockholder group started was limited to the information that all branches of the Loew's-Metro organization were operating in the black.

The aforementioned Wall Street "vote" is an important one—important enough to swing decisions in the event of a proxy fight develops. Brokers hold about 2,000,000 shares of the Loew's common stock.

FILM BIZ SADLY: 'WE WUZ PUSHED'

By FRED HIFT

Though they were reluctant to comment, it was clear last week that most film company executives were unable to raise much enthusiasm for the Soviet-American film deal signed in Moscow by Motion Picture Export Assn. president Eric Johnston.

Agreement called for the Soviets to buy 10 Hollywood features and for the MPEA member companies to take on seven Russian films in return. Per-picture price is $60,000 for regular-size pix and $67,000 for the widescreen releases.

So far, none of the companies know which of the Soviet films will be handled by whom. It's assumed that every company that sold a picture to the Soviets also will be asked to distribute one of the Russian releases in the States. Agreement calls for "widest possible distribution" and publicity. It is generally assumed that the Russians won't put any of the American films through the works, i.e. order its wide release, until they see the results on one of their films in the U.S.

While several foreign execs last week expressed the opinion that adequate distribution probably could be arranged one way or the other, they were nevertheless concerned over the variety of precedents set by the Johnston deal.

Awkward Aftermaths

It's pointed out, for instance, that the MPEA deals with Hungary and Poland were strictly commercial deals in which the Hungarians and Poles simply bought a given number of Hollywood pictures. They got no concessions in return. "I hate to think what's going to happen next time we have to negotiate a deal with them," was one comment. "If the Russians could get a reciprocity deal, the other Communist countries won't want to be caught napping. They'll want the same concession."

Precedent is even worse when it comes to the "friendly" non-Communist countries, several of whom have repeatedly urged that MPEA do something for them in the light of the fact that the Americans take out millions every year from the varous countries. MPEA has always nixed such proposals as being outside its power.

Said one foreign sales manager: "We look fine now, we've done for the Russians what we were never willing to do for our friends." Comment was followed by the observation that "this wasn't the industry's deal. Johnston's only doing what the Government wants him to do."

The armchair strategists now say that several mistakes were made. One maintained last week that the negotiations should never have been assigned to MPEA in the first place, but should have been carried through via the individual companies, directly with the Russians. At the time this didn't prove practical since the Soviet negotiators insisted on a quid-pro-quo which was outside the original agreement.

Another foreign manager said he felt the timing of the agreement was poor.

What it adds up to is that the industry per se has little taste for the Soviet deal and doesn't think that, from an economic point-of-view at least, it's worth all the fuss and bother. There are those who resent the role Turner B. Shelton, the U.S. Information Agency's film chief, has played in the talks so far, and others who believe that the agreement will come back to haunt the industry in many ways, one of them being the acceptance of what amounts to an exchange of film at a flat rate.

MPEA's Angle

MPEA replies to these charges that (1) it was only doing what both the State Dept. and the White House asked the industry to do, and (2) the western nations, having had some experiences with the Soviet of their own, fully understand that normal commercial considerations don't apply when dealing with Sovfilm export. Johnston himself, prior to leaving for Moscow, said he favored normal commercial contacts with the Russians at the earliest possible moment.

Soviet deal was made without the immediate approval of the companies inasmuch as Johnston had been given carte blanche to work out an arrangement while in Moscow. Whether individual company negotiations with the Russians might have produced better terms, at least for some pictures, is open to question. Few in the industry consider it right that the price MPEA is paying for the Soviet films should be the same as that which the Russians are paying for the American product, and there is concern, too, over the establishment of a fixed ratio of seven to ten which might be held against the Americans at a later date.

Metro Studio Chiefdom

Who would run the Metro studio if it's to be spun off along the lines advocated by Louis Green and Jerome Newman? (Sol C. Siegel is now the head of production.)

The question was put to a member of the G-N group and this was the answer: "We have been told that Siegel is terrific. However, we have had no business discussions with him."

Vogel Foresees MG Product in Black

Loew's prexy Joseph R. Vogel returned to his homeoffice desk on Monday (20) following a week of conferences at the Coast studio with production chief Sol C. Siegel, administrative topper Ben Thau and other Metro executives.

On the basis of the lineup of features the company has scheduled for release during the second quarter of its fiscal period, starting in December, Vogel predicted that the momentum of the first quarter, during which the company will be $2,000,000 in the black for the first time in several years, will be maintained.

First blockbuster release during the second quarter will be "Some Came Running," the Frank Sinatra starrer.

Rising Costs Alone Flaw Happy View of New England Drive-Ins

Boston, Oct. 21.

Drive-in theatres have become a $20,000,000 business in the New England states. There are 225 outdoor situations with a parking capacity of 875,000 cars.

The above data is supplied by the New England Council.

Bigger, improved recreational areas for children, snack bars and restaurants, services and equally important—the quality of films themselves are all being emphasized, per a Council report. Quote:

"There are a bushelful of other improvements and gimmicks too, such as miniature golf for the adults, more efficient individual car heaters and twin screens which provide the choice of single or double features. One such operation in Medford, Mass., can accommodate 1,000 cars for each showing, thereby permitting double capacity at the Box office."

Costs have soared, however, new report disclosed. "Where it required an estimated $250,000 two years ago to construct a 1,000-car drive-in, the same size enterprise now would cost between $400,000 and $500,000.'"

"There is some variance of opinion on the ratio of food sales to total gross but the former, all agree, account for at least 50% of receipts. Every operator provides ample intermission time for refreshments and several embellish it with various inducements. For example, some spots have adopted the promotional stunt of offering free tickets to anybody who happens to be at a concession cashier's booth when a bell sounds."

specialist in the kidpix area, said in N.Y. Monday (20).

Pointing to the circulation of Russian children's films of top calibre in Europe, Mrs. Dawson sounded the alarm stating "We have given the U.S.S.R. a sort of monopoly on peace, love and understanding among children."

Mrs. Dawson recently attended sessions of the International Centre for Children's Films in Brussels as the U.S. observer. The screenings, participated in by 20 countries, convinced her that the Soviets and the satellites were far ahead of the Americans.

To this end she proposed (1.) each major studio should make at least one children's film a year, full knowing that it wouldn't recoup its negative cost. (2.) Actors, directors and even trade unions should donate their services to turn out such pictures, stimulated into such generosity via special governmental awards and recognitions. (3.) UNESCO should set up a fund to back the international production of children's films, with each UNESCO member being assessed on a prorata basis. (4.) American companies should produce children's films with blocked currencies abroad, using U. S. talent and scripts.

Bureau of Missing Business

The Flattery of Non-Praise

By ROBERT J. LANDRY

Again is must be asked—does anyone seriously contend that newspaper criticisms make or break first-runs? All the evidence is to the contrary, with the single exception of certain art situations in certain markets. Moreover, the film critics themselves are modest in estimating their own power over the ticket-buying public. It is not the critics, but the publicity chiefs of the distributing organizations which place so high a value on the printed review.

Yet here again the paradox shows—what publicity chief, in his right mind, ever credited boxoffice success to fine notices? Simply never. Always the successful picture is great, its producer a genius, its director inspired, its screenplay an Oscar nomination, its stars "hot." Good notices for a great picture are taken for granted. It is only the bad notices for the misses-greatness release that draws fire.

Always, too, the delicacy of the published reviews relates to the first-runs in the big burgs. Are the critics then quoted outside the neighborhood houses, or on their marquees? Usually only for obscure "stars" or pictures of no confident self-momentum.

The fact stands: newspapers use valuable space to "review" the current new releases. In so doing they maintain a steady spotlight of supposedly incalculable reminder value. The readership of any critic who "glows" on cue from the business office is, by common consent, a dubious consideration though nobody seems sure of the value of open-fountain gushing as in the old days when Marion Davies was flawless, her every picture greater than her every other picture, until the adjectives ran threadbare and the most unsophisticated citizen chortled for the absurdity of it.

The film companies best argument against certain film critics is seldom if ever sounder—the argument that some of the critics have little or no qualification. It's okay they're dopes, if they only "glow." This is peculiarly true in some of the hinterland dailies where, Newspaper Guild hours and scales being what they are, the desk uses anybody standing around the water cooler who doesn't seem busy.

When things were going badly for the British during World War I someone asked the world—who gains if Britain suffers extinction? Paraphrase that. Who gains if published daily newspapers criticism of moving pictures becomes obsolete? Not, one guesses, the publicity departments.

Rue Too-Far-Ahead Upbuild

The volume of pre-release publicity in terms of stories and stills on big films being shot abroad is a source of concern to some of the companies. They feel that a lot of valuable "sell" is being wasted prematurely at a time when it does nothing for the release of the picture.

Case cited in Metro's "Ben Hur," which is winding up in Italy and promises to be one of the most elaborate productions in many a year. During the long locationing in Cinecitta, writers and photographers descended on the sets in hordes, covering every angle and shooting every possible picture.

What worries Metro now is that all these stories are apt to break long before the film is even ready for showing, and that, when premiere time rolls around, the mags won't want to repeat themselves on the "Ben Hur" topic, thus depriving the film of timely sell.

While some of the companies say they're similarly concerned, others don't see it that way. Their argument is that any publicity—regardless of when it appears—helps the picture in the long run. If a film is interesting enough, there'll be no resistance to repeats on stories when the picture hits the theatres. In fact, a conscious attempt is made to keep pre-release publicity flowing continuously to maintain public interest in the film.

And A Cup of Coffee

San Antonio, Oct. 21.

Lynn Krueger, manager of the Majestic Theatre, Interstate Circuit house here, reveals that the lobby facilities for dispensing hot dogs, popcorn, sour pickles and other items, is being doubled.

Coffee is to be added to the menu.

Crackdown on Come-Ons

Toledo, Oct. 21.

If a grocery chain can give away a vacation for two to Hawaii, or a mink stole, to a person holding a lucky ticket, why can't a theatre have bank nights, especially if you don't have to buy an admission ticket to the theatre to participate and win a prize?

That is the stand of the Toledo Theatre Managers' Assn. as a result of a legal ruling given last week by John J. Burkhart, assistant law director, that theatre bank nights constitute a lottery and as such, violate state statutes. After the ruling, City Manager said he would give the Colony Theatre a reasonable length of time to discontinue the bank nights, but that he had to enforce the law, whether he agreed with it or not.

Burkhart said that by implication, any raffle conducted for advertising or sales promotion, whether the participants pay for their chances or not, was likewise a violation of the lottery law in Ohio. When City Manager Rink was asked about the supermarket giveaways — which have ranged from a basket of groceries to an automobile in the past—he said, "It would be discriminatory to permit the operation of other raffles and drawings," and indicated that these, too, will be subject of a crackdown.

Only last month Burkhart ruled that bingo was illegal, whether for charitable causes or not, and threatened enforcement of this ruling caused so much controversy that City Council enacted a measure — constitutionality of which has already been challenged — which would exempt operators of lotteries for charity from being penalized.

One councilman said, "The city manager has no choice in the matter and has to enforce all the laws or be in a vulnerable position. Since the bingo issue, 'everybody is watching this thing'." City Manager Rink described himself as "a little helpless in the face of some silly laws that a few legislators passed."

This Is A Unique Situation

Los Angeles, Oct. 21.

Robert L. Lippert is opening L.A.'s first double theatre showing American and foreign features simultaneously. Operating on reserved-seat basis, scaled at $1.25 Riviera, 200 seats, will screen foreign product, Capri, 100-seater, American pix. Both are under one roof.

It's planned to present "classic" and memorable pix both present, past, Project, reported, reps expenditure around $100,000.

Raps Service Competish

Miami, Oct. 21.

An exhibitor campaign to achieve a 60-day clearance over base theatres at Army and Navy installations was urged here today (Tues.) by Robert J. O'Donnell, president of the Interstate Circuit of Texas. The keynote speaker at the Theatre Owners of America convention stated that the camp theatres play new product ahead of any near-by commercial theatres and that this situation represented "highly unfair and improper competition."

Several years ago, according to O'Donnell, an attempt was made to work out a compromise in Washington with the Motion Picture Service of the Army and Navy. In Texas, he noted, it resulted in a plan whereby "A" pictures that played "A" commercial theatres would not play the Army or Navy camps 30 days ahead, as has been the policy in most of the U.S., but would play 14 days after the conclusion of the commercial run. O'Donnell stated that the services have deliberately misinterpreted the compromise by saying that it is 14 days after the picture opens in a commercial house.

Although the 14-day clearance has been reinstated, O'Donnell said it is no help for the neighborhood and drive-in theatres and that the time has come when the industry must ask for a 60-day clearance over the service camps.

O'Donnell pointed out that the recent Hoover report, made by former president Herbert Hoover, particularly emphasizes the necessity for the elimination of Army camp competition with local enterprises.

N.O.'s 'Buccaneer' Preem

New Orleans, Oct. 21.

The world premiere of Cecil B. DeMille's "The Buccaneer" will be staged here Dec. 11 at the Saenger theatre, per Henry G. Plitt, president of Paramount Gulf Theatres Inc.

Plitt said screen personages as well as syndicated columnists will be guests.

Mayor deLesseps Morrison has issued the usual proclamation. Dec. 11 will be "Jean Lafitte Day." Proclamation extolls DeMille's contribution to nation and extends thanks of city for his having personally chosen New Orleans for preem.

Schary Turns Publicist

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Dore Schary will do his own drumbeating around the world for his first indie, "Lohelyhearts." Producer is now completing plans for a global p.a. tour when film is released next year by United Artists.

Meanwhile, producer, now in N. Y., will preview pic in Manhattan prior to returning here in late November.

'It's Exciting Downtown'

Washington, Oct. 21.

Local Loew's theatres have worked out a deal with downtown merchants and the parking lots for an advertising campaign for mutually beneficial purpose: bring people in from suburbia.

The idea is pegged on the theme that "exciting things happen in downtown Washington."

Through newspapers ads and posters, suburbanites are told that Glenn Ford will make a personal appearance at the preem Thursday (23) of his new MGM film, "Torpedo Run," slated for Loew's Capitol. A huge photo of Ford is used to attract attention.

Merchants and garages participating in the park-and-shop operation downtown are financing the newspaper ads which plug the film and tell about mainstem parking. Loew's is picking up the check for hundreds of posters in stores and garages which advertise both the picture and the park-shop situation.

'Sea's' Short B'way Run

Originally booked for a minimum of 10 weeks, "The Old Man and the Sea" is coming out of the Criterion Theatre on Broadway in mid-December, making room for the J. Arthur Rank film, "A Night to Remember."

The Warner Bros. release is opening on a roadshow basis (as in N.Y.) in Boston, San Francisco and Houston and in four additional cities. Nothing's been set beyond that, though Warner Bros. execs are planning modified roadshow dates, with three shows a day, but still reserved seats.

According to WB, the company "is not downhearted" re the Criterion business. Picture is said to be getting a high school and student response, partly as the result of a study guide put out by Warners. Student tickets are being sold at a 15% discount.

Lowell Kaplan Considers Admissions At 'Ridiculous Heights' For Joe 'n' Jane

Minneapolis, Oct. 21.

Some local industry members like Lowell Kaplan, Bennie Berger's circuit buyer-booker, believe that the cost of moviegoing has risen to "ridiculous heights" and keeps people away from the showhouses and at their television sets in mobs.

Pointing out that admission is being upped here from "what's supposed to be the regular after-5 p.m. 90c to $1.25 and $1.50 for every important picture or one supposed to be of major proportions," Kaplan predicts that already shrunken theatre attendance will wilt to an even more alarming extent because of the rising costs.

Kaplan cites the fact that a number of recent upped admission pictures here "haven't drawn anywhere nearly what was expected." He thinks this is the start of further public desertion of the theatres. With living costs sky high and still rising, more and more families can't afford moviegoing at present prices, he feels.

It's the opinion of Kaplan and some others that competitive bidding is in part responsible for the "orgy of advanced admission pictures." The distributors, of course, don't attempt to dictate the admission to be charged for the pictures, but local exhibitors, eager to land the top ones, "sweeten" their bids by including in them the amount of the upped tap they'll charge. And this, he points out, is a factor in the awards.

At $1.50 after 5 p.m. "Big Country" has been considerably less boxofficewise than expected here. Another recent attraction, "Damn Yankees," at $1.25 also was disappointing. At $1.25 "The Barbarian and Geisha" is far under anticipations and hopes. After a big first week "The Defiant Oones" ($1.25) sagged. These are among the examples named by Kaplan.

However, at $1.50 recent "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" and $1.25 "No Time for Sergeants" enjoyed long runs and smash grosses.

The wholesale advancing of admissions has been the case for the past 12 months here. As elsewhere no doubt, moviegoing no longer is low cost entertainment for the masses. In fact, the 90c after 5 p.m. admission now seems to be the exception.

Currently only two of the eight loop firstrun theatres here are charging the "regular" 90c after 5 p.m. and this pair of houses are showing very minor fare.

It's $1.50 for "The Big Country" and $1.25 for "Gigi" (the latter having a return loop engagement after a four-week $2.25 hard-ticket run), "The Defiant Ones" and "The Old Man of the Sea" and $2.65 for the hard-ticket "Search for Paradise" and "South Pacific."

It probably helps theatregoers some that three of the local loop first-run houses provide free parking. But, of course, in moviegoing baby sitting costs often must be considered. And for those who don't drive downtown it costs 40c for the bus round trip and service is poor and the transportation company is seeking another fare rise.

Upped admissions here also are frequent nowadays in the local neighborhood subsequent-run houses where 85c is supposed to be the regular tap.

James Mason 'The Master'

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

James Mason has optioned T. H. White's "The Master," planning to produce it as a theatrical film, and possibly star in it. Novel was published by Putnam's in 1957.

lack of any U. S. representation. The program as of now:

Oct. 29—"Eve Wants to Sleep" (Poland)
Oct. 30—"A Cry in the Streets" (Britain)
Nov. 1—"The Dangerous Age" (Canada)
Nov. 2—"Eau Vive" (France)
Nov. 3—"Nobody's Child" (Hong Kong)
Nov. 4—"White Nights" (Italy)
Nov. 5—"House Under the Rocks' (Hungary)
Nov. 6—"The Wind Cannot Read" (Britain)
Nov. 7—"Two Eyes, 12 Hands" (India)
Nov. 8—"Aparajito" (India)
Nov. 9—"The Precipice" (Japan)
Nov. 10—"Taiga" (Germany)
Nov. 11—Open date hopefully reserved for U. S.;
Nov. 12—"Rickshaw Man" (Japan) (out of competition).

In addition to these, Levin has a Spanish, a Norwegian and two Yugoslavian films available which are possible entries.

Biggest single blow to the festival probably has been 20th-Fox's decision to pull "Rally 'Round the Flag" out of competition. Levin badly needed it to have U. S. representation and to assure fete of some Hollywood glamor. He's now trying to persuade Paramount to enter "Houseboat." Paramount could come through with a contingent of personalities to add the badly needed exploitation values.

The Restless Years

hopes he can use his childhood connections to achieve the success that has eluded him elsewhere.

So the normal evolution into adulthood for the two youngsters is complicated and harrassed by the machinations of their elders as they connive for financial or social achievement.

It makes a superior story in Anhalt's treatment, although the setting, of a conventional small city, somewhat lessens its believability. It is a period piece, with the dressmaker mother of an illegitimate child, and would have been more plausible if it had been played in period. It seems doubtful that today's youth would be so uniformly bigoted in visiting the sins of the fathers on the children.

But granting this, it has a feeling of poetry and sensitivity. Miss Dee, an especially appealing ingenue, gives the picture its strongest sense of reality. Saxon seems somewhat miscast as a youth of sensitivity, but he is convincing in his scenes with Miss Dee. Teresa Wright has good moments of pathos as the mother, and Whitmore is strong as Saxon's father. The picture is exceptional in its attention to lesser characters, so Margaret Lindsay is able to make an impression as Saxon's mother, Virginia Grey as the children's understanding teacher, and Alan Baxter and Dorothy Green as other parents. Luana Patten, Jody McCrea and Hayden Rorke do well with other roles.

Ernest Laszlo's photography is notably fine in the exterior sequences. Joseph Gershenson's music, using familiar tunes for time setting, plus original music for overall mood, is good. Technical credits are top-notch. Powe.

My World Dies Screaming

"Subliminal" angles lift this dull psychological meller into an okay exploitation entry.

States rights release of a William S. Edwards production presented by Howco International. Stars Gerald Mohr, Cathy O'Donnell; features William Ching, John Juslen. Directed by Harold Daniels. Screenplay, Robert C. Dennis; camera, Frederick West; editor, Tholen Gladden; music, Darrell Calker. Previewed N.Y. Oct. 17, '58. Running time, 81 MINS.

Philip Tierney	Gerald Mohr
Sheila Wayne	Cathy O'Donnell
Mark Snell	William Ching
Jonah Snell	John Qualen
Dr. Victor Forel	Barry Bernard

Subliminal perception provides an exploitational crutch for "My World Dies Screaming," a psychological meller which ordinarily would be a candidate for the bottom half of the duals. "Not only will the picture communicate with you visually," star Gerald Mohr tells the audience in a brief prolog, "but subconsciously through your brain."

A Howco International presentation, it's being packaged with a companion film, "Lost, Lonely and Vicious." Distribution will be through franchised outfits in various territories. George Waldman, for example, is handling in the New York area. Both pix obviously were turned out on modest budgets, but the subliminal gimmick in "Screaming" appears sufficient to pull the curious through the wicket in less demanding situations.

Original screenplay of Robert C. Dennis concerns Mohr's efforts to free wife Cathy O'Donnell from a "horror" complex. It develops later that her nightmares stem from the fact she witnessed ax murders of Mohr's family when but a child. Crime was committed in the family's ancestral mansion. Couple returns to the scene of the killings and familiarity of the surroundings helps snap Miss O'Donnell out of her complex.

Dennis' script has lotsa dialog and little action. Hence, the 81 minutes running time seems far too long. Harold Daniels' direction occasionally comes up with some suspense but not nearly enough to overcome the deficiencies of the potboiler yarn. Mohr struggles with his role as does Miss O'Donnell. William Ching and John Qualen are so-so as "menaces" in the mansion while Barry Bernard is seen briefly as a psychiatrist.

Sock novelty is an epilog in which Mohr explains to the audience "what's been getting to them through their subconscious mind." Sequence runs off several scenes replete with superimposed symbols depicting love (fluttering hearts), hate (a crawling snake), etc.

Technical aspects are good, particularly Frederick West's camerawork. Darrell Calker's score is suitably eerie. Gilb.

PICTURE OF THE MONTH

The world-loved story of "tom thumb" has become a milestone of movie imagination. Not since M-G-M's "The Wizard of Oz" has there been a comparable offering with such universal appeal. It is a unique screen entertainment.

The challenge of making a production with a real live leading man only five and a half inches high was formidable. Magician-director-producer George Pal, already a four-time Academy Award winner, met it so adroitly with a combination of live players and animated Puppetoons, his own invention, that our advice is not to wonder how it's done but just to enjoy the wonder of it.

Russ Tamblyn as "tom thumb"— exactly 5½" high

© LOEW'S, INC. 1958

Russ Tamblyn is especially suited to the role of the thumb-high hero since it requires unusual gymnastic and dancing skill. Tamblyn's minute size on the screen in proportion to the normal height of the other players and the big world about him is a continued source of amazement and delight at the ingenuity of it all.

"tom thumb", A Galaxy Picture in Technicolor®, literally teems with talents, for instance: screen, radio and TV star Alan Young; June Thorburn, his pretty sweetheart who magically disappears when he becomes too amorous; Terry-Thomas and Peter Sellers, Continental comedy duo of villainous mien; plus Jessie Matthews, Bernard Miles and many more.

Ladislas Fodor did the screenplay based on the story from the pen of the Brothers Grimm. Peggy Lee has written several of the delightful songs: "tom thumb's tune" and "Are You a Dream". Popular Stan Freberg is heard as the voice of "The Yawning Man" written by Fred Spielman and Kermit Goell. Mr. Spielman, collaborating with Janice Torre, also contributed the songs "After All These Years" and "The Talented Shoes", one of the most imaginative among the spectacular sights and sounds.

The wonderful world of "tom thumb" beckons to you. The tiny star's joyous musical adventure is indeed destined to become a giant of the screen.

Protesting Vs. High Taxes and Duties, Low Cinema Prices in Formosa, Maas Sees U.S. Distribs Operating in Red

By DAVE JAMPEL

Tokyo, Oct. 21.

MPEAA veepee in the Far East, Irving Maas, has sent a statement to Taiwanese (Formosa) officials detailing conditions which he claims "have deteriorated to the point where successful operation by our member companies is in doubt."

Statement is introduced by this acknowledgement: "Recognition of the essentiality of American motion pictures to the welfare of the people of Taiwan is amply demonstrated by the generous import quota allotted our films by the government; further proof that entertainment, including besides films, Chinese Opera, circuses, etc., rates a high priority as a daily necessity lies in the fact that entertainment in general, along with only four other items, is price controlled, the others being public baths, meat, barber shops and hotels.

"Progressively over the past few years," the statement continues, "our trading conditions in Taiwan (Formosa) have deteriorated to the point where continued successful operation by our member companies is in doubt. This has been brought about by a number of factors, some arbitrary and ill-advised and others due to uncontrollable economic developments. While this presentation concerns primarily the effect of controllable factors," it reads, "we cannot ignore the hard fact that the currency devaluation last April advanced our situation overnight to a point where consideration of corrective measures becomes imperative."

Asking for understanding of the problem by the authorities, the statement made the following points: 1) The motion picture industry is geared as a world market. No other American industry is so dependent on 'foreign' revenue for its survival. 2) The belief that our remittances from Taiwan are all profit is erroneous. To the contrary, our remittances at the present level will hardly cover out-of-pocket dollar expenses with little or no balance left toward cost of the production. 3) It is also believed in some quarters that our industry as a whole is very profitable. This, too, is erroneous. Some member companies have had losses over the past few years. Taken as a whole, the combined worldwide results of our companies in 1957 showed a profit, before U.S. Federal taxes, of about 5%, and 4) The financial risk in motion pictures is unmatched in any other industry. The investment is total and cannot be cut back. Even before the devaluation, many films released in Taiwan did not cover the landed dollar cost."

Revaluation Cuts Remittances

The basic problem, the statement cites, is this: "Devaluation has cut the dollar value of our remittances by one-third and customs duty, already excessive, was simultaneously further increased by over 76%. Now we are faced with a 200% increase in censorship fees. Due to price control, all of these losses have been absorbed by us. No part of these losses can be passed on to the exhibitors because our film rental terms are already at the highest feasible economic level and no part can be passed on to the ultimate consumer, the public, which continues to pay the same gross admission price as always."

Statement cites scalpers selling tickets for as high as five times their legal value, showing the public's willingness to pay more.

"This urgent and discriminatory situation is further aggravated by the fact that the boxoffices of Taiwan are being used as a convenient apparatus for the collection of all sorts of revenues to the point where it is not possible to yield a fair return to the owner and producer of the goods. After deduction of the many taxes and surcharges imposed on each admission ticket, less than half of the gross admission price paid by the public remains as the net admission for division between the exhibitor and the distributor. he government and the organization which are the beneficiary of those revenues therefore receive over 50% of the admission fees while the exhibitor and distributor retain less than 25% each. Surely no other price-controlled essential is subjected to such excessive tax and surcharge price markup.

Says Show Biz Unjustly Taxed

"We fully appreciate the need of the government for tax revenue for general purposes; we also recognize that surcharges collected by non-government organizations for housing and refugee and Mainland relief are worthy projects," the statement offered. "But nonetheless, we feel that the entertainment industry is being unjustly burdened as a collection agency for taxes and surcharges which are not assessed in other essential lines of business and is out of proportion to that borne by any other taxable item in the economy."

The statement noted the paradox of the motion picture industry being recognized as essential on one hand by being under price control, while being regarded as a dispensable luxury on the other. The result, it cited, is that the net admission price "is undoubtedly the lowest in the entire world."

"Assuming that our gross income remains at 1957 levels," the statement reads, "the April devaluation alone will reduce remittances to about $400,000. However, when the 76.16% increase in customs duty is taken into account, our total remittance capability will be further reduced to $340,000 or an amount hardly sufficient to cover overseas costs ... with no balance left toward the share of production cost allocable to Free China.

"To achieve our gross earnings and net remittable, 294 MPEAA film productions were consumed in Taiwan in 1957. The U.S. production cost of these films was approximately $400,000,000."

Lists Ill-Advised Regulations

The statement listed some additional ill-advised regulations:

1. Revenue for so-called flat rentals (as distinguished from percentage rentals) usually confined to smaller situations, does not qualify for remittance and is permanently blocked . . . The imposition of the precautionary measure is completely unnecessary.

2. Revenue from trailer and accessory rentals are also blocked, making it impossible for us to recoup the U.S. dollar costs of these items . . . This is unjust and unnecessary.

3. Our applications for remittance must be documented with tax office stamped boxoffice statements. We are allowed 15 days in Taipei and 30 days in the outposts from the closing day of exhibition to submit these documents. If the application is not filed within the prescribed time limit, the revenue involved is no longer remittable. The time limit is sometimes insufficient, but present arbitrary time limits impose a 100% penalty in the form of blockage when our companies, through no fault of their own are unable to meet these deadlines.

4. When the application is made for remittance according to the required remittance procedure, an amount equivalent to duties previously paid is deducted from the allowable amount before remittance is approved. In other words, we are required to retain an equivalent amount of funds qualified for transfer. We strongly feel that this "withholding" is unjustifiable and should be repealed.

5. The stamp tax is applied to admissions is 5% of the net admission price whereas this tax applied to all other lines of business is only 0.47%. We fail to understand why the patrons of the entertainment industry are singled out for a 12-fold increase in this national tax.

6. As a measure of relief from rigid admission price control, the authorities have authorized double the admission price for films running 200 minutes and more. Within the past 12 months, two of our films received the benefit of this increase. In our view, excessive running time as the sole qualifying factor for advanced admission is ill-advised and does not give effect to factors far more important such as quality, public demand and production cost."

Suggests Corrective Measures

In conclusion, the statement recommended the following corrective measures:

1. Admission Taxes — Substantically reduce the tax on higher-priced seats and eliminate entirely on the lower price category.

2. Surcharges — Eliminate entirely surcharges which are levied only on entertainment admissions.

3. Customs Duty — Restore the level existing prior to April 14, 1958, by one of the following methods: a) Reduce the arbitarily-fixed invoice value from $0.271 per meter to $0.154 per meter, b) Reduce the rate of duty from 50% to 28.50% or c) Revise the tariff procedures from an ad-valorem basis to a straight footage basis as followed by most countries. A duty of $1 per foot would restore the pre-April 14 level.

4. Price Control—"We firmly believe that all entertainment admission prices should be decontrolled to seek their proper economic level and that such action would not have an undesirable effect on the economy of Taiwan. If decontrol is ruled out, we recommend alternatively that ceiling prices on motion picture admissions in Taiwan be raised as follows: a) Grade A theatres from $9 (native coin) to $18, b) Grade B theatres, from $6.50 to $13 (native currency) and c) increase lower priced seats in both Grade A and Grade B theatres in Taipei and throughout Taiwan by at least 60%."

5. Official Remittances — "a) Discontinue the segregation of revenue under which our 'flat' film rentals and trailer and accessory income does not qualify for remittances, b) Discontinue the requirement compelling us to withhold from remittance amounts equivalent to duties paid, c) Remove entirely or alternatively extend to at least 30 days for Taipei and 60 days for outposts the time limit of presentation to the Tax Office of stamped boxoffice receipts."

6. Stamp Tax—"Reduce to the level of 0.4% as applied to all other lines of business."

The statement made clear that it was not seeking preferential treatment for American films, but "only adjustment of inequitable conditions which, in our case, have reduced commercial possibilities uneconomic levels.

"Only through favorable action on our request for relief in the matters outlined above and especially on the factors previously responsible for our situation, increased admission of revision of duty to pre-devaluation levels," the statement summarized, "can our situation be ameliorated."

UA Given Top Credit For Profitability While Paramount Does Burn

Paramount execs were riled this week over a feature story on Hollywood which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune. The piece, which ran Monday (20) as the first in a series by the daily's Hollywood correspondent Joe Hyams, had it that "the only major motion picture company which will show a big profit is United Artists."

Par men burned because, as they put it, Par has consistently shown a greater net profit from operations than any other outfit. Last year's net was $5,425,000. And, it was disclosed, the net after taxes for the first nine months of 1958 will be in excess of $11,500,000.

Trib yesterday acknowledged the Par position, printing a boxed statement from the company which was in answer to the original downbeat report. This appeared within the framework of the second of the Hyams series which, incidentally, concerned the importance of agents in the picture business. Main spotlight was given to Lew Wasserman, head of Music Corp. of America, who "has more power, perhaps, than the head of any major film studio."

In addition to "setting the record straight," the Par rebuttal was seen as reflecting the sensitivity of film company execs about their respective company's financial ups and downs.

Fred Morsebach named manager the Capitol Theatre at Austin, Tex. replacing Jimmy Nunnery.

publisher. If a critic doesn't like his paper's policies, he's free to leave, but no outsider—fellow critic or no—can justly interfere. Furthermore, the advertiser has a perfect right to kick about reviews. It's up to the publisher to resist such pressure.

Consequently, argues a man like the N. Y. Times' Bosley Crowther, it's senseless for the N. Y. critics as a unit to in fact condemn the weakness of one of the publishers if the latter puts the dollar before his ethics and orders favorable writeups.

Bitter Alternative

And another critic, who sees eye-to-eye with Crowther, put it even more succinctly. "If Gilbert wants to have freedom to call the shots as he sees 'em then let him quit the Mirror. After all, each man knows pretty well what kind of paper he's working for when he takes the job."

Crowther, Miss Cameron and several others take the view that their legitimate concern is only what's happening at their own papers. Crowther, frank in saying that he's probably the most frequently attacked reviewer in town (because his paper's the most influential), nevertheless maintains that this is one of the perils of the job; that his only legitimate concern is with his own paper, i.e. the publisher of the N.Y. Times, who, says Crowther, has never tried to influence his writeups one way or the other.

At the opposite end of the argument, N.Y. Post critic Archer Winsten held last week that "the moral onus certainly should not be borne by the publishers. The issue must be put before the public, and after that the publisher has a free choice to resist pressure or bow to it."

Two points are raised by various critics in connecton with what some call "a storm in a teapot." One is that the film company pressures are rarely as direct as they appeared in the Einfeld vs. Gilbert case, and that the problem really is one of an atmosphere in which it becomes increasingly difficult to write an "honest" review for a newspaper.

Even the top critics, the argument runs, are affected by the knowledge that a series of negative criticisms of films is likely to raise the roof in the publisher's office. The critics know that the papers are "hungry" and, for the most part, apt to lean in the direction of the advertiser.

A film company official may have merit if he challenges a given daily's policy of taken a man from the city desk, with no prior experience as a reviewer, and putting him on as a film "critic." Such arbitrary assignment leaves the reviewer open to the charge that he doesn't know what he's doing, and it shows a lack of respect and appreciation of the screen medium.

The film companies on the whole reject the charge that, if a critic doesn't please them, they go for his scalp via the advertising. Einfeld last week again flatly denied any attempt to get Gilbert fired. "I may use my advertising in a paper as a wedge to try and get some free publicity for my pictures, but I'd never try to use it as a club to get good reviews," he maintained. "In any case, if that's what I've been trying to do then I haven't been very successful, as the record will readily show. Just look up the reviews of 'A Farewell to Arms,' as an example."

Though they deny pressuring the critics, most of the film people nevertheless are disenchanted with negative appraisals which they deem to be the whim of the individual critic rather than a broadly applicable judgment of the picture. Most executives, almost unconsciously, believe that the reviewers are a part of the film business, and therefore owe it some allegiance; and they frequently tend to ignore the fact that the critics on the whole are more attuned to artistic content than they are to boxoffice values.

Most of the critics, on the other hand, are fully in agreement with Zinsser that consistently favorable reviews serve neither the film industry nor the individual paper. There are virtually no film execs who subscribe—publicly—to that theory.

Steinberg Death Recalls Cafes

Cristo, Steinberg's hosting is perhaps best remembered from his reign over the Pavillion Royal, Valley Stream, Long Island, a roadhouse on the Merrick Road which showcased the tops in talent. Guy Lombardo, Ben Bernie, Ted Lewis, Vincent Lopez, Paul Whiteman, were the more prominent maestros there, and any top act of that era, comparable to the Las Vegas standards today, was booked. On one occasion John & Cristo took a chance on a newcomer who changed her name from Ethel Zimmerman to Ethel Merman only the day before she opened there and became an overnight click following her Pavillion Royal showcasing.

Latterly, as m.d of Hillcrest, he put that country club operation, with its large segment of show biz membership ("the comedian's roundtable" was personally presided over by John) to the fore as the No. 1 country club operation in the country. His "groceries" were the best in the entire greater Los Angeles area. As a membership club, it was formally recognized by his colleagues as the tops and Steinberg was often cited with top awards in the annual intra-trade appraisals of such operations.

Steinberg's renown dates from the heyday of Reinsenweber's with its multi-floored cabaret setup—Doraldina, Sophie Tucker, Ted Lewis, et al., entertaining on different floors.

Invented the 'Rope'

John invented the "silk rope." This was pre-Prohibition which, automatically, created a closed-door snobbery, depending on the popularity of the oasis. John cashed in on the psychology of "recognizing" the spenders and the nocturnal habitues and the "this way Mr. Jones, we have your usual table ready" was worth beaucoup loot as Steinberg escorted them through the mythical barrier.

When Prohibition closed Reisenweber's he and George Cristo, with the backing of brewer George Trommer, opened the Pavillion Royal. Later they also tried their hand in operating midtown Manhattan cabarets but couldn't stomach the mobsters who moved in on every joint. John & Cristo's 5 O'Clock Club and the Playground thus become casualties of mobster intrusion and they moved to Palm Beach and also operated in Saratoga during the August racing season.

Steinberg came to the Coast in the late '30s as manager of the Vendome, and subsequently the Trocadero and Victor Hugo, class restaurants of the time, all since expired. For a short time he operated the commissary at the Universal Pictures studio and then took over Hillcrest. His cuisine there made Thursdays and Sunday nights gastronomic musts for members and their friends.

As is axiomatic with virtually any renowned host, the relations with favored customers assumed personal identification. Because of VARIETY founder Sime Silverman's longtime friendship, any of the newcomer boys and girls on this paper became John Steinberg's personal charges. They displaced any big-shot spender. A VARIETY man who ventured to Saratoga in the August racing season, when gambling was wide-open, was affectionately barred from the casino—anything else was wide-open to them but John insisted "you can't win so why even look in on the games and be tempted."

When Sime's son Sid, father of present (third generation) VARIETY publisher Syd Silverman, started making the rounds he was told that wherever John Steinberg ran a place it was sure to be "a nice place to take a girl." Unbeknownst, John's instructions were (1) a good table and (2) a charge account. Steinberg took it upon himself to report back that Sid's dates "always added class to the place" and that the "charge account" ried over for any of the VARIETY bunch.

Steinberg was a great personal favorite with the show biz group in and outside of Hillcrest. When he became managing director emeritus he designated the new operator of the club and commuted frequently to Palm Springs, where he maintained a permanent apartment. For a short period, to keep in action, he assumed management of Romanoff's-on-the-Rocks, branch of the BevHills eatery in the desert resort but soon bowed out.

He was financially well fixed and just to make sure, dating from Al Jolson and others, people would tell him they "bought a couple of hundred shares in your name" and assign him the profits.

There have been a couple of abortive attempts made by ghosters to put his saga on paper, with an eye to a biopic. This may now be revived.

Harold Hecht

directors and the necessity to maintain Hollywood and N.Y. offices, the company, Hecht revealed, was confronted with a certain amount of fixed expenses. However, he stressed that these were small in comparison with the studio overheads of the major studios.

Practicality

Being free of its own studio has enabled HHL to select production sites where its entries can be made less expensively. For example, "17th Doll," if made in Hollywood would cost twice as much as the $250,000 budget set for Australia. This policy has given the company international mobility. Its upcoming crop of films will be made, in addition to Australia, in England, Mexico, Spain and Burma in addition to the U.S. The type of story, according to Hecht, will determine the location.

HHL's loyalty to the so-called medium budget picture stems from its very successful experience with "Marty," the Paddy Chayefsky teleplay converted to an Academy Award winning film. The company hopes to repeat this success with such entries as "The Rabbit Trap," "Cry Tough," "Take A Giant Step," "The Catbird Seat," "First Love" and "The Dreamers." Some of the pictures will be bolstered with star names. Others will depend solely on the story. Hecht said he is proceeding with "Take A Giant Step," which will have an all-Negro cast, despite the warning of Max Youngstein, v.p. of United Artists, which finances the HHL films, that the picture had a slim chance of recovering its negative cost. "We are creating our medium budget pictures in a manner so that if we don't have star names, we won't get hurt," Hecht declared.

As part of the company's policy of concentrating on story values, HHL has signed up a battery of writers and directors. It's not unusual for up to a half a dozen writers to accompany Hecht to a location site. In London recently, for example, while Hecht was supervising the production of "The Devil's Disciple," there were at least four writers in an adjoining office working on upcoming HHL projects. Among writers working on HHL properties are John Gay, Roger MacDougal, Julius Epstein, John Dighton, Ben Maddox, Phil Leacock and Ray Bradbury.

In addition to the completed "Separate Tables" and the almost-finished "Devil's Disciple," HHL will continue to be represented in the blockbuster field. "The Unforgiven," a $4,000,000 entry, is set to roll in December in Mexico with John Huston directing. Another biggie on the company's slate is "The Way West," for which John Gay is presently writing the screenplay.

Frank Sinatra is being sought by 20th-Fox to co-star with Marilyn Monroe in "Can Can," Jack Cumming's first production for the studio. Sinatra is currently winding Metro's "Some Came Running."

Holy Name Pickets

Manchester, N. H., Oct. 21.

When a film on the condemned list of the Catholic Legion of Decency was shown at the Sky-Ray Drive-In theatre, on the Manchester-Hooksett road, the establishment was picketed by 17 members of the Holy Name Society of St. Patrick parish here. State troopers and Hooksett police stood by to maintain order.

The picketers carried signs reading:

"This Picture Condemned."
"On Strike for Decency."
"Do Not Patronize This Movie."
"Is This for YOUR family?"

Madrid Okaying Aguilar's U Buy

Madrid, Oct. 21.

Almost a year to the day after RKO sold its Spanish holdings to Jose Garcia Ramos, the government here has cleared the way for sale of Universal to its Spain manager, Enrique Aguilar, and a group of Barcelona financiers.

Disappearance of another Yank distributor, now leaves only Metro, Paramount, 20th-Fox, Warners and Columbia operating own distrib companies in Spain.

Universal sale was almost set last March, but Motion Picture Export Assn. prexy Eric Johnston prevailed on Universal to withhold final approval pending MPEA negotiations with the Spanish government on the broad issues.

Deal was consummated three months later when Aguilar submitted documents of sale for government approval to nationalize an American company and to arrange dollar remittance of purchase price.

Following the RKO-Ramos pattern, the new company will have exclusive distribution rights to Universal product.

Tells Atlanta Censors To Stop Stalling 'Nana' On Appeal From Ban

Times Film Corp., whose "Nana" was banned in Atlanta, told the city censor there last week to get on the ball—or else.

"Nana," a French import, was banned in September. Times Film then tried to get it shown to the board of appeals, but the board could not meet since several of its members were out-of-town and no quorum could be obtained.

Times then got a letter asking whether it would accept a verdict from only a few board members who were available to see the picture yesterday (Tues.) Felix Bilgrey, counsel for Jean Goldwurm, prez of Times Film, fired off a letter informing the board that delay would involve "great damage," that the company would not accept any decision without a full quorum of the appeals body being present, and that the Atlanta censor would be personally held responsible for damages in any further delays.

Wanger's 20th 'Cleopatra'

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Walter Wanger's initial feature under his new 20th-Fox two-year producer pact will be top budget "Cleopatra," based on Carlo Franzero novel, "Life and Times Of Cleopatra," which Wanger owns.

He also has screen rights to Albert Camus' "La Chute" (The Fall), philosophical French tome.

Payoff—Not the Play's—The Thing

Chicago, Oct. 21.

The Bard was wrong. It's the exploitation potential—not the play—that counts, at least in the scheme of things at American-International Pictures. Studio ad topper Richard McKay, to last week's National Allied States confab:

"Here is how our pictures are usually born. First comes the idea. Then the advertising team sits down and attacks it from every angle. If it lends itself to strong ad copy, and powerful illustrations, we make the picture. If it does not, no matter how great it otherwise may be, we do not make it."

Inside Stuff—Pictures

It's a paradoxical world. The just released German documentary, "The Nuremberg Trial," is hailed as an objective depiction of Nazi brutality. A German soldier gazette reportedly protests, claiming film damages the reputation of the German nation. Ironically, the commentator of this undoubtedly objective film is a certain Jochen Willke, once editorial-writer for the Nazi press and remembered for his "sit tight" articles during Hitler's war era. Today, Willke is editor of a big mag in Munich.

One of those who protested most energetically against the comeback of Veit Harlan (of "Jew Suess" fame) was Erich Lueth, press chief of the Hamburg Senate and a prominent man in Germany's Social Democratic Party. "Essener Tageblatt" carried an article which speaks for itself: "Within 24 hours, Erich Lueth has written twice to his former regiment commander, Othmar Mumm, and asked him to let his past sleep. The commander had reminded Lueth that, before 1945, he (Lueth) had taken much pains to become a N. S. Fuehrungsoffizier (political officer in the Nazi Wehrmacht) and also to set up a Nazi front paper. This, so wrote the commander, stands quite in contrast to Lueth's present attempts to denounce those who are not liked by his party. 'You remained a simple soldier,' Mumm wrote, 'because we wanted to save you the shame to be turned down as an officer's aplicant, but not because of your alleged anti-Nazi conviction which you evince today . . .'

Major portion of the controlling stock in List Industries, whose principal subsidiary is RKO Theatres, has been earmarked for charity by Albert A. List, president of the corporation, and his wife, Vera G. List.

List has deposited 384,720 shares of his personal holdings with Tarr & Co. as nominee for Old Colony Trust Co. Trust agreement runs until Oct. 1, 1960, unless extended. It's for the benefit of "a charity" but this has not been identified.

Vera List transferred 236,964 to Tarr for the same purpose. Albert List now directly holds 217,107 of the List company's shares and his wife owns 354.

Heavy European returns have upped early estimate of Anthony Mann-Security's "God's Little Acre," Robert Ryan starrer, to $7,500,000 world gross, per producer Sidney Harmon. Film will hit around $4,000,000 domestic, already having grossed $3,200,000. Initial European bookings indicate conservative $3,500,000 foreign take.

Brought in for $1,000,000 by Mann, Phil Yordan and Harmon, film's four partners—Mann, Security Pix, Erskine Caldwell, UA, will split approximately $2,000,000 melon.

Liquidation of Cinerama Production Corp. is anticipated as result of Stanley Warner's extension for the third time of its offer to exchange Cinerama Inc. stock for shares of Cinerama Production Corp. The two previous offers have already brought in a reported 61% of the outstanding shares of Cinerama Productions. This total already gives Stanley working contol, but it's believed that the chain needs about 67% of the stock before it can actually liquidate Cinerama Productions.

In the person of 67-year old James McFarland, Bennie Berger's loop firstrun Gopher in Minneapolis believes it has the world's wealthiest and best dressed theatre ticket taker.

McFarland, a widower with one son, was bequeathed a fortune by his deceased father, a British magnate. He has considerable real estate holdings and stocks and bonds.

Doorman annually buys 10 tailor-made suits at $150 apiece.

Grace Metallious, who collected $125,000 from 20th-Fox for the screen rights to "Peyton Place," now stands to get another $400,000 from the studio for two works—an original and a novel. The original is "Return to Peyton Place," which Miss Metallious is scripting. The book is "The Tight White Collar," on which 20th has taken an option. Miss Metallious now lives in Rye, N.H.

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Bob Goodfried, Paramount studio publicity manager, is resigning his post Oct. 31 to join Columbia Pictures publicity staff in what pub chief Al Horwitz of Columbia describes as "important capacity."

PECK'S REAL-HERO MODEL

He's 'Studying' Style and Bearing Of W. R. Anderson

Pittsburgh, Oct. 21.

Commander W. R. Anderson, of the Nautilus, may not know it yet, but he'll be the model for the sub commander Gregory Peck will play in the Stanley Kramer picture, "On the Beach," which starts shooting on location in Australia in January. That's what Peck told newspapermen here last week while he was in town tooting his "Big Country" at the Penn.

Peck said he'd long been wondering about the character in the novel and wasn't sure what he'd be like in bearing and style, but his mind was made up immediately once he got a load of Anderson on the Edward R. Murrow "Person to Person" last month.

Actor asked Murrow for a kinescope of the program, and plans to study Anderson closely at home before departing for Australia. The sub skipper in "Beach," like Anderson, is an Annapolis man, and Peck says he's already noticed a number of characteristic similarities.

Frank O'Neill, former manager of the Palace in Norwich, Conn., has been transferred by Stanley Warner to the same post at its Delaware, Albany, art house. He succeeds John Brousseau.

Daytz & Lourie In Theatres Buy

Boston, Oct. 21.

The largest theatre negotiation in New England since the splitting up of the old M & P chain comes with the operation and control of the Western Massachusetts circuit of houses, formerly leased to Theatre Managers Corp., acquired as of Oct. 29 by L. D. Theatres Co., under management of Albert R. Daytz and Albert B. Lourie.

Daytz and Lourie operate 17 conventional and drivein theatres in various parts of New England. The acquisition will approximately double their holdings. Buying and booking of films for the new company will be handled through the office of Daytz Theatre Enterprises of Boston. Theatre management will be under the active supervision of Lourie.

The deal, for a five year period, involves over $1,000,000.

Theatres included in the transaction are: Amherst, Amherst; Rivoli, Chicopee; Victoria, Chicopee; Falls, Chicopee Falls; Garden, Greenfield; Lawlor, Greenfield; Suffolk, Holyoke; Victory, Holyoke; Paramount, North Adams; Calvin, Northampton; Palace, Pittsfield; Casino, Ware; Strand, Westfield; Strand, Palmer; Bing, Springfield, all in Mass.; and Paramount, Brattleboro, Vt.

Theatre Management Corp, was represented in the negotiations by James T. Moriarty and Thomas Donahue of Springfield. L D Theatres Co. was represented by George B. Lourie of Lourie & Cutler, Boston.

When the old M & P chain split in January, 1949, Samuel Pinanski formed American Theatres Corp., while Martin J. Mullin organized New England Theatres Inc., involving over 100 theatres.

British Uneasy But Pass Film Showing Christ

London, Oct. 21.

The British Board of Film Censors were unhappy about the portrayal of Christ in the Hollywood-made religious film, "Day of Triumph," with Robert Wilson, Lee J. Cobb and Joanne Dru. The Board eventually agreed to pass the film with a "U" certificate providing one scene was cut.

The film is now being shown at the Cameo-Poly cinema, a house usually reserved for Continental films with an "X" certificate, which means that children under 16 may not see them. Basil Clavering, the cinema's managing director, said: "The film's a gamble for us, but we can afford it, thanks to Brigitte Bardot."

On profits from the $490,000 production, 10% will be devoted to Cancer Anonymous, founded by the Rev. Brian Hession, who was spiritual and technical adviser on the pic.

'SHADOWBOX,' TO FIGHT SLOW SUNDOWN, READY

Minneapolis, Oct. 21.

Following "gratifying results" in its first and thus far only test, a shadowbox with various appurtenances in front of the screen to wash the dust out of the atmosphere and keep it clean so that drive-in theatres can circumvent daylight and start their shows an hour earlier than without it, the EL-Meg Screen Tower System has started manufacture here.

The one-month test was at Eddie Ruben's Starlight ozoner, Grand Forks, N. D. It continued through September.

Cost of the average screen's shadowbox will be under $10,000, but there'll be smaller ones for less and larger ones for more, according to Russ Tweedy, inventor and head of the manufacturing company.

'Windjammer' Due in Minn.

Minneapolis, Oct. 21.

"Windjammer" will follow Lowell Thomas' own "Search for Paradise" into Stanley-Warner's Century Theatre here Nov. 19 after the latter has concluded its 39-week run, the shortest engagement by far locally of any of the four Cinerama offerings.

For this first non-Cinerama attraction there'll be the necessary several Cinemiracle technical changes at the Century.

MARIE McDONALD'S FUR COAT

Issue of 'Wages' Vs 'Contractor' Being Argued

Dallas, Oct. 21.

Marie McDonald, sometimes known as "The Body" is trying to unfreeze $8,000 of her salary tied up in a suit over a chinchilla coat she says she hasn't got.

Miss McDonald was sued by New York furrier Milton Herman, who alleges she bought a $7,000 coat, paying $2,000 down in December 1957, but never paid the balance. His attorneys filed a writ of garnishment on the Statler Hilton Hotel here where Miss McDonald sang in the Empire Room, seeking to attach the amount due her.

The singer's attorneys argued the money represents wages and cannot be garnished in Texas. Not so, the furriers attorneys said. She was an independent contractor when she signed with the hotel, they asserted.

No decision has been announced by the District Judge. The case has been delayed in District Judge Paul Peurifoy's court because of a witness. Miss McDonald, meanwhile, left Dallas for Chicago and tv appearence.

Call TV's Film Needs Hollywood's Salvation

Boston, Oct. 21.

John Harriman, financial columnist of the Boston Globe, wrote last week on "Why they are betting on the movies." His slant: television makes money for Hollywood so investors are buying again.

"The motion picture stocks (producing companies) have been strong lately, and attracting more than a little speculative attention," Harriman wrote. "The reason is that here is an industry heavily charged with potentialities and, of course, at the same time fraught with risk. Back of the whole situation in this industry is one central fact: as of Aug. 31 of this year there were 506 television stations in operation throughout the country . . . and 113 new stations authorized by the Federal Communications Commission and currently in process of construction. When these stations now building come onto the air waves it will mark a growth factor of some 20%."

Metro's No-Moveover Shortens 'Cat' Tenure

Minneapolis, Oct. 21.

Metro's refusual to permit any moveovers downtown here shortened the "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" run to seven weeks at the RKO Orpheum, according to Harry Weiss, RKO Theatres district manager. In its seventh week it still chalked up a $7,000 gross sufficient to warrant its moveover from the Orpheum to the other RKO loop house, the Pan, and this would have occurred except for the distributor's rule, he says.

M-G-M is the only distributor here that will not allow a moveover for any of its releases.

At the advanced $1.50 after 5 p.m. admission (instead of the "regular" 90c), "Cat" chalked up a sensational approximate $90,000 during its Orpheum seven-week run. It thus takes its place as the highest grossing picture locally of any 1958 non-hard ticket attraction.

It had to go out of the Orpheum, Weiss says, because of the theatre's commitments for other pictures. Otherwise, he believes, if it could have been retained there or moved over to the Pan, it might have stood up for two to four more weeks.

Bomb Hoaxing Season On

Atlanta, Oct. 21.

Telephone call from a "crank" caused East Point Theatre management to empty house Thursday (16) night and set police to searching for a non-existent bomb.

Mrs. V. M. King, manager of theatre, said she received a call from a man who sounded like an elderly person telling her theatre was going to be bombed. She called police.

Half a dozen officers searched building, but found no trace of a bomb. They returned Friday morning to be sure they had not overlooked an infernal machine.

Police asked Mrs. King to close theatre for the night after threat was received. She said about 80 patrons left the theatre and she gave them passes.

East Point is a municipality that adjoins Atlanta.

When It Comes to Moment Of Reality, 'Last Hurrah' Leaves Hub Unfluttered

Boston, Oct. 21.

The world premiere of "the-not-about-Curley" film, "The Last Hurrah," set for the Orpheum tomorrow night, Wednesday (22) was being taken in stride by native Bostonians. An old fashioned politico torchlight parade through the streets of Beantown was set to launch the preem, and Pat O'Brien was skedded to show.

Although James Michael Curley, who "settled out of court" with Columbia Pictures in a case involving his rights of privacy, and ex-President Harry S. Truman were invited, it was doubtful that either would be on hand.

Curley, aging and ill, and his family have seen the picture. Donald Crisp was in ahead of the "Hurrah" film for press rounds.

Protestants Verbalize For Worthy Pictures

Kansas City, Oct. 21.

A plan seeking to improve the quality of motion pictures exhibited here was publicized last week by the Council of Churches of Greater Kansas City. Via a resolution calling for a committee to investigate theatre bookings and to petition managers and circuit officials to favor films of better quality.

Just what standards may be set up, or the procedure for the committee function, was not disclosed. The decision to take action on films is based on "complaints" from churches as to the showing of some films here recently, according to Dr. Stanley Stuber, general secretary.

The council represents 230 Protestant churches in the metropolitan area. It did not name any specific films against which complaints had been lodged. The committee is to be appointed shortly by Dr. Thomas E. Mather, minister of the Central Methodist Church, president of the council.

NEVER FOR MAKE-BELIEVE

Gamecocks Do Their Stuff For Washington Cameras

Washington, Oct. 21.

Two fighting gamecocks gave their all for realism as National Film Studios here began shooting "Dead to the World." National hired an abandoned barn near White's Neck, Md., and two expert handlers (one a woman) along with their vexed male birds.

Risking the ire of the law and the Humane Society, the company decided to leave nothing to the imagination, and armed the cocks with steel spurs. One was killed in the first take, and his victor was cut to death in the second before it was decided to fit the remaining birds with harmless rubber.

The sequence is climaxed by the fatal stabbing (not real) of one of the spectators who pitches forward into the cockpit to wallow his last moments in rooster blood (real).

Film, an adaptation of the novel "The State Department Murders" by Edward Ronns, portrays the violent adventures of a State Department security officer accused of treason. When he's on the lam, one of the places he finds himself is the cockfighting arena.

This Friday (24) location moves to House Veterans Affairs hearing room, where activities of a fictional congressional Red-hunting group will be shot.

Preminger: Busy Days

Otto Preminger has a new stage play by Ira Levin, adaptor of "No Time For Sergeants." It's "General Seegar" and the screen-stage showman has sent the script to Fredric March and Florence Eldridge as a co-starring vehicle.

Preminger's immediate commitment is to direct the film musical, "Porgy and Bess" for Sam Goldwyn but he's lined up for his own Carlyle banner future film versions of three novels, "Anatomy of Murder" (Robert Traver), "Exodus" (Leon Uris) and "Other Side of the Coin" (Pierre Boulle) lined up.

Kansas Women Censors Ban Natural Childbirth Feature, French-Made

Kansas City, Oct. 21.

Refusal of the Kansas Board of Review, three woman state censorship authority, to pass the French import, "The Case of Dr. Laurent" dealing with natural childbirth, has brought a temporary shift in the Fox Midwest first run exhibition in the metropolitan area. Result is a split of its usual three-house day-and-date combo, Uptown, Fairway and Granada.

"Dr. Laurent" opened last Wednesday in the Uptown Theatre, which is located in Kansas City, Missouri, free of censorship. Fairway, located in suburban Johnston County in Kansas, held over "Barbarian and the Geisha," which had played simultaneously in all three last week.

Granada in Kansas City, Kansas, brought in "Marcelino" and "Rome, Eternal City," making it a combo with the southside (Missouri) Brookside Theatre, which held over these two after playing them last week.

As it stands now the film is likely never to play in Kansas, following the ruling of the board, one of the last official censor groups still acting on films. It is the first refusal by the board in almost a year, and probably marks Kansas as the only state to turn down the film. Board has consistently turned down sex in films, whether educational or not, as not being in the general public interest.

Theatre Owners of America No Longer Separates Parlor-Pay From Cable; Opposing Both

Miami, Oct. 21.

Theatre Owners of America, which at one time drew a line between over-the-air and cable pay-tv, now is looking to Congressional legislation that will outlaw both forms of pay-as-you-see.

"It is against the public interest and certainly not within the province of any administrative body, whether city, state or national, to grant any franchise or license to any special group for pay-tv purposes," Philip F. Harling, chairman of the TOA toll-tv committee, tells the convention in a speech prepared for delivery tomorrow (Wed.).

Noting that the Oren Harris Congressional committee again plans to hold hearings on toll-tv, Harling says TOA "must spearhead" the anti-toll drive, rousing a countrywide campaign as it goes. "We have consulted with our attorneys, and we have explored the possibility of a grass roots campaign to be directed through our public relations organization; and it is our opinion, backed up from years of experience with this subject, that the necessary legislation to ban toll-tv will emanate from the Harris committee findings with the help and cooperation of public opinion."

TOA's stand on cable tv is comparatively recent, though the group passed a resolution condemning boxoffice feeds of any kind at last year's convention. Some years back, the TOA position was somewhat different. At that time, TOA concentrated its fire on over-the-air tollvision. Specifically, it argued that air pay-tv was "unfair" competition to the theatres, whereas cable connections "give theatres a chance to compete on the same basis." However, at that time cable tv seemed an unlikely possibility whereas now it looms larger.

At no point did Harling mention theatre television, which works essentially the same way as cable payvision. Theatre television, which never really got off the ground, also deprives the home viewer of an event which, normally, he might have on his screen. On several occasions, the theatres have outbid the networks for top prize fights and in turn have charged high per-seat prizes for the bout in the theatres.

If Harling knows all the ins and outs of the issue, he isn't sharing it with the convention. "It is not incumbent upon us at this particular moment to state our legal position or other reasons why we oppose all forms of pay-tv and why it should be banned," he says. "We and our counsel (Herman Levy) don't say we don't know, but what we are saying is that before we finally determine what course to take, our position will have to be carefully screened, annotated and analyzed before it can be presented before the Congressional Committee."

Vital to Guide Toll From Home Films—Skouras

Chicago, Oct. 21.

In his talk here last week before the Allied States exhibitors, Spyros Skouras of 20th-Fox pounded the tocsin for preparedness re pay-tv. Film industry will be dead, he said, if tollvision shows feature pictures in homes firstrun, but if properly legislated, the system "could stimulate production and improve theatre business considerably."

What Skouras has in mind is this: a committee repping all exhibs should work for enactment of federal fiat limiting feature pix showing on pay-tv until minimum of three years or maximum of five after initial theatrical release. Also, three years after tollvision exhibition, films could be played on the free channels "as a public service"—but not before.

Cosmo Alley clientele, he is "in." For two weekends, Bikel is being joined by Lenny Bruce, a Sahl-ish comic with routines. His satire is biting, his material is good, and he's a solid scorer when he "makes the scene" at this bombed-out looking but atmospheric coffee house.

Jack Kramer's International

Around the corner is Jack Kramer's International where this month's program includes Devidja and her Bali-Java dancers as well as a Spanish dance act, Cuadro Flamenco. Previous bookings have included a legitimate play and the Shelly Manne jazz combo, a unit that must have seemed more authentic to coffee house goers than do the current oriental dancers.

Aside from Hollywood, the beach areas boast several coffee houses, and the greatest concentration has developed on the Sunset Strip. Where the plush night spots used to beckon the notables, the coffee houses — Club Renaissance, Via Veneta, Chez Paulette, Caffe Espresso, the Seawitch, Pandora's and the Unicorn—lure the esoteric, making Sunset an international thoroughfare. Jazz artists and folk singers are finding the pickings easiest, and they're picking up the best kind of experience before the most discriminating kind of audience.

Plugging the Arts

While the majority of coffee-ites —both Beatniks and otherwise— are most interested in the arts of painting, sculpture, poetry and jazz, there is a strong minority that is part of or trying to be a part of show business. Most are dedicated and thus are stimulated by the atmosphere; many simply are out of work. One club, the Renaissance, next month will open a 500-seat theatre for presentation of experimental plays. It presently shows experimental films on Monday nights and presents classical improvisations on Wednesday nights. The Unicorn lists such activities as "talks under the big tree," discussion groups, poetry recitations and "bulletin board readings." Upstairs is an avant garde book shop where paperback editions run from Nietszche to Kerouac. Art, all modern, plays an important role in decor, and one spot, the Ash Grove, is a combination art gallery, concert hall and coffee house.

The entire concept of the coffee house, as one struggling actor put it, is "an economic necessity." Although some clubs charge a minimum, most "let you alone with your cup of coffee all night, if that's what you want." Cosmo Alley has a license to sell beer and wine, but most of the houses stick to coffee made to European tastes, pastries, Italian ices and snacks. Some go in for full dinners ranging all the way to filet mignon. Prices for food are very reasonable—that same filet dinner may run anywhere from $2.75 to $3.85. The coffees usually start at 50 cents and run as high as $1.25. One Sunset establishment proudly includes on its menues: "2c plain . . . 20c."

Shutter At 2 A.M.

Coffee houses in the City of Los Angeles must wind up their live entertainment by 2 a.m., according to a recent police commission ruling. Establishments in Los Angeles County—and these include the Strip spots—can run entertainment on through the night if they care to, but the county public welfare commission now is considering an ordinance that also would limit live entertainment to 2 a.m.

Two a.m. or five a.m.—from the looks of the coffee houses from 10 p.m. on, there's time enough to provide talented performers with a chance and a boost and night-owls with a place to go.

Bandman King Thinks Closed-Circuit Immune To Strife

Dallas, Oct. 21.

Henry King, pianist and bandleader, is negotiating for a closed-circuit setup for industry, business, education, medicine and government. He hopes that he is steering clear of the tollvision feuds. "My primary interest lies in commercial closed circuits, which are destined to become a part of this industry in years to come."

He said a closed circuit could enable schools to distribute personnel over a wider area at a savings to both school and taxpayer. All schools could be linked by tv cameras. In the case of retarded children, it would eliminate travel from home to school.

King also stated that it would be possible to book his band for the 15 minute coffee breaks when the system would be sold to offices. He said that it won't be long before closed circuit tv is as much a part of one's office equipment as the typewriter and filing cabinet.

G.M. Motorama On Closed-Circuit TV

For the first time the General Motors Motorama was carried over a closed-circuit tv network last week to 20,000 GM dealers and executives in 40 cities across the country.

The large-screen telecast, produced and networked by the Tele-Sessions Division of Theatre Network Television, gave the GM dealers a preview tour of the Motorama exhibit at the Waldorf Astoria prior to its opening to the N.Y. public.

Marc Daniels, TNT dirctor of programs, was in charge of the Motorama tv production and direction. The tv tour was narrated by John Daly.

the neighborhood "fine arts" Westgate. At the same house "The Admirable Crichton" and "Your Past Is Showing," also firstruns, boasted four-week runs. All to fine grosses.

After its loop firstrun, "All at Sea" enjoyed three highly profitable Westgate weeks and later went into two other uptown houses and continued to do well.

"The Smallest Show on Earth" and "The Green Man" were other 1958 similar offerings that clicked in the local art houses. Currently, "Law and Disorder," firstrun, is doing excellent business at the Suburban World, firstrun, with indications of a four-week or longer stay.

Bob Hazleton, buyer-booker for many local neighborhood houses, says, however, these pictures "don't mean a thing boxofficewise in the non-art uptown theatres. But, for that matter, he points out, neither do the French, etc., sex films, not even the Brigitte Bardot sizzlers.

way and it's carried on the corporation's books at $1,000 per acre, or a total of $480,000. This, obviously, is a token evaluation.

Wrapup of the deal will mean MCA's moving its Revue Productions, telefilm-making subsidiary, from Republic in North Hollywood. The U studio has the space that Revue needs; conditions are too crowded at Rep.

MCA has a 20-year lease at Rep but this would represent no problem in that studio facilities are in demand and a sublease arrangement with other interests would not be too difficult to come by.

Acquisition of the U studio would mean a reversal in thinking on the part of MCA. Some time ago the agency had the opportunity to latch on to another major lot—RKO, before Desilu took over—but nixed the deal.

"Borscht Capades," English-Yiddish revue is dated for a one night stand here on Oct. 28 at the Dallas Memorial Auditorium Theatre.

New Parent: Skiatron of America

Skiatron-TV, the Matty Fox pay-see outfit, has changed its name to Skiatron of America Inc. and will become the parent company of local state subsidiaries which are being registered. Thus it'll read Skiatron of New York, Skiatron of New Jersey, etc.

Skiatron of America, which has no stock out on the market, is the operating company for the Skiatron Subscriber-Vision system. Skiatron Electronics & TV Co., of which Arthur Levey is head, is the development company, which leased the patents to Fox. Skiatron Electronics shares in any profits.

Readers Digest: Resolve Doubts As to Toll, Let Experiment Begin

Readers Digest for November looks into the question of tollvision and its byliner, W. L. White, takes the myth out of the "free" side of commercially - sponsored video. Quote:

"You are not allowed to pay to see what you really want. Instead you may look only at what it is to somebody else's interest to let you see. The miracle is that television is as good as it often is."

Referring to the advertisers' expenditure last year of $1,291,000,000 for tv time purchase, author figures that each American family's share of this cost is $30.02. Five cents of the daily eight cents, as broken down, is needed to keep the stations juiced and on the air. Article suggests that for all its costliness status quo sponsored video does not enrich many of those enfranchised by the Federal Communications Commission. Again quote:

"Out of the 1880 commercial channels allocated by the FCC only 501 are filled, and about 30% of those stations, according to latest FCC figures, operate at a loss. Channels have been allocated for 1,238 cities, but only 318 can find advertisers to support tv. Nor is there likelihood of much improvement."

Doubt is thrown upon the pertinent question of whether the American family will "pay" for over-air entertainment. But the final point, ascribed to music critic Irving Kolodin, is this: "The conception of America as a nation of free-loaders loath to pay for what it wants and indifferent to quality as long as it has quantity, doesn't ring true."

Readers Digest's final prod reads: "Congress, how about clearing the track for that experimnt?"

Ustinov Wows

in the longlived "Romanoff and Juliet" at the National.

It was held in a place called the Presidential Arms (Washington Star drama critic Jay Carmody observed, "In his Republican Administration, who ever expected to find Tallulah in the Presidential Arms?"), with club president Lee Walsh presiding. Mrs. Walsh called on both Ustinov and Mis Bankhead for speeches—in that order.

Ustinov spoke at length, elegantly, about democracy and tolerance. He was serious, almost poetic at moments and witty at others, including a highly entertaining take-off on various UN delegates. His audience of scribes and capital society was dazzled. The applause thundered.

It became Miss Bankhead's turn. "Peter," she began, "I could kill you."

She was reminded, she went on, of the time her "divine" Adlai Stevenson was introduced by Jack Benny. The comedian, she reported, made a high-level, hilarious speech. Stevenson went to the mike, according to Tallu, and declared, "Through some amazing error that has been made here today, Benny just delivered my speech!" And he sat down.

Tallulah didn't. She turned to profanity for the spectacular, and to politics to be more quotable in the newspapers. She called for a cigarette and a glass of bourbon.

She also took off on Ustinov. "Here's Peter—" she remarked, and turned to him and paused. "Peter, how do you pronounce your last name?"

The actress also took care of the club which had gotten her into her situation. "I have been honored before by this club," she commented, "and it is good to be back again with the—with the—what is the name of this club,"

She spoke of the New York gubernatorial race. "It'll be awful if Harriman doesn't win . . . I like Nelson Rock-feller. He (Rockefeller) has spent years doing dreary jobs when he could have been having a field day, if you know what I mean, dahlings! Nelson is much TOO attractive."

Of ex-President Truman she observed, "I love him—and I'm so glad he wrote to that critic!"

Of the current GOP Administration, "It's revolting!"

Of certain Southern politicians, her remarks were libelous, but included the word "bastards," and she concluded, "Write that for the Montgomery Advertiser!"

Of Vice President Nixon, "Ugh, 'Tricky Dickey!' He's already gone too far (in political offices). It would be horrible for the country if he went any further."

Mrs. Walsh had made her introductions brief and, it turned out, prophetic. She presented Ustinov as "the genius," and Miss Bankhead as "the legend."

Y. Frank Freeman, Paramount studio v.p., is due in New York from the Coast tomorrow (Thurs.) for a several days of homeoffice conferences, including talks with president Barney Balaban, foreign distribution head James Perkins and ad-pub director Jerry Pickman.

'Unto Death' War Against Pay-See, Fellows' Vow

Minneapolis, Oct. 21.

There'll be no letup whatsoever in the National Association of Broadcasters' "fight to death" against pay television if it's to be substituted for or replace established broadcasting. And the same goes for anything else that might restrict the radio or video industries' freedom.

Recalling NAB's pledge to this effect, Harold E. Fellows, the organization's president, gave the reassurance at the Minneapolis fall NAB conference, one of the eight throughout the country.

Fellows explained that commercial broadcasters regard pay tv as an abridgement of "public service" and pointed out it would be unfair to anyone who thought they paid for their video entertainment with their set purchase.

Trade body is disturbed by the pressure groups promoting liquor advertising in the industry and predicted its rejection as a traditional NAB policy will continue "for moral reasons."

Legislative interest tending to school control programming are "the greatest peril to the broadcasting industry and public interest," in his opinion.

NOT AN EMMY BUT AN OSCAR

Arthur Murray's Trendex Ball

The "Trendex roof" fell in Monday night (21) in what may well turn out to be the major upset of the new season, involving the Westinghouse-sponsored $11,000,000 "Desilu Playhouse" package. Monday's Desilu film production of "The Case for Doctor Mudd" on CBS was trounced by "The Arthur Murray Party," 24.7 to 18.7, in the competing 10 to 10:30 period.

It's one of those "they said it couldn't be done" stories which undoubtedly cued many a raised eyebrow when the Trendex returns are posted. On the one hand CBS had heralded the Westinghouse deal some months back as "the blockbuster of the season" in terms of program potential and coin involved. And on the other hand the Arthur Murray showcase has been kicking around for seasons without any takers except as a summer replacement entry. NBC had practically written off the time period.

While one Trendex doesn't make a season, NBC thinks it's a harbinger of things to come.

Sponsor Identification Gets To Be More 'n' More a TV Problem

Sponsor identification, according to Trendex, has been declining continuously for the past three years and with the curse currently being put on quiz programs, which ranked second only to sports spectaculars in identification, and with the networks inking one-shot appearances on any and all of their unsponsored shows, it is expected that the identification of advertised products with network programs will be even lower than ever this season.

The recent switch to specials on the part of many national advertisers is attributed to the fact that they are ideal for kicking off a national sales drive with added merchandising coordination plus the fact time is allowed to identify the products to be advertised with the large spec.

With the growing split of audiences due to the hot competition between three networks, national advertisers are paying more attention to making sure the sales messages are not wasted or lost in the program. While it's difficult to pin down exact figures between sponsor identification and sales, tv success stories are all too well known to network backers.

$1,000,000 Texaco Billings Salvaged

Even though the Texaco $4,000,000 deal with CBS-TV fell apart on the sponsorship of the network's "Man of the Hour" one-a-month 60-minute series, the network did manage to salvage about $1,000,000 of Texaco billings.

Oil company is picking up the tab on three still undesignated specials and the New Year's Day Cotton Bowl grid classic. Originally it had planned to buy these along with the "Man of the Hour" Nat Hiken-produced series. Something went wrong having to do with the pilot show, on which Ed Sullivan was guest of honor. Some educated guesses around the network: maybe Texaco didn't want to identify itself exclusively with a Mercury salesman when it must cater to drivers of all makes. Just a guess, since CBS isn't talking.

BEECH-NUT, ANACIN BUY INTO 'COLT .45'

ABC-TV has landed two sponsors for its "Colt .45" western skein currently being aired Sundays at 9 p.m. Peppermint division of Beech-Nut Gum, which had initially planned to take a second Dick Clark show, has a near-set deal which would virtually amount to alternate sponsorship of "Colt." Young & Rubicam is repping Beech-Nut.

Anacin, repped by Ted Bates, is also currently huddling with ABC-TV brass. Anacin's deal for the western reruns would amount to a one-third sponsorship.

CBS-TV's 'Jet Age'

CBS-TV's public affairs division is prepping a 60-minute "Jet Age" show.

Network is currently dickering with American Airlines, via Lennen & Newell agency, to bankroll the segment. Web has been talking about a Dec. 12 exposure. This was the date originally earmarked for Mary Martin's special which has since been cancelled.

Busy Days For Soviet Censors; Newsfilm Curbs

Russian relations with American broadcasters appear to be getting worse by the day and the USSR censors are adopting harsher methods in their conduct with the few remaining network representatives in Moscow.

Latest irritant is the Soviet government's restrictions on the export of newsfilm which would drastically affect the content of material shown in this country by tv news and newsreel producers.

William R. McAndrew, veep of NBC News, appealed to the State Dept. "to use its influence to negotiate a lessening of the restrictions." He also pointed out that the new Soviet curb comes smack on top of the Russian govern-

U. S. TV Experts Set For Moscow Trip But Will CBS Rep Get In?

Six U.S. television experts, five from commercial video ranks, are scheduled to begin a State Department sponsored tour of Russian tv Monday (27). Junketeers, scheduled to collect in Moscow on that day for a three-week guided tour, is part of the cultural exchange agreement made by Russia and the U.S. earlier this year.

Once the executives and one college professor return to the U.S. plans will be made for the possible visit to the U.S. of Russian tv experts.

Three network representatives are slated to participate in the tour, but it is understood that the State Department is not certain whether Russia will permit the entry of Richard O'Brien, the CBS exec. A problem over O'Brien's visa may crop up because of the recent official Russian edict against CBS. The network's Moscow bureau was shuttered after CBS-TV's "Plot to Kill Stalin" was put on.

Along with O'Brien, a general engineering executive at CBS, the State Department tour will be attended by NBC's Jerry Danzig, ABC's Mike Wallace, Screen Gems prexy Ralph Cohn (the only telefilm exec on the list), Westinghouse's Ralph Harmon and Dr. Burton Palu of the U. of Minnesota.

KATZ'S DAYTIME COUP FOR CBS

By GEORGE ROSEN

At a time when practically anything can happen in the daytime television program sweepstakes by virtue of the ABC move-in last week with, on the whole, a solid, well-received block of morning-afternoon entries, the up-and-down-again rivalry between NBC and CBS, with the latter for the moment enjoying its "finest hour," makes for one of the more intriguing stories of the '58-'59 campaign.

Just how successful ABC's "Operation Daybreak" will emerge won't be determined for some time, since the network, moving into an area virtually untapped in past years, is starting from scratch in building up an audience. But meanwhile it's the "eight out of the Top Nielsen 10 and five out of the top five" status of the CBS schedule, in another shift of strength corresponding with the period that Oscar Katz assumed the daytime reins, that's creating a kind of excitement all its own around the Columbia precincts.

The intense two-network rivalry goes back at least two years. Until that time CBS had the daytime play pretty much to itself. Then late in '56 and during the first half of '57 NBC began to build its schedule, whittling down the CBS advantage. For a period roughly from June '57 to Sept. '57 it was nip and tuck and in Oct. of that year NBC wrested control of daytime from Columbia. This continued until February of this year when a whole new nip-and-tuck situation began, sparked by some fresh Katz maneuvers, that continued until June. By July CBS moved back into dominance both on the rating and sales front, and at the moment seems to be operating at alltime peak performance.

If the CBS daytime braintrusting-inging veepee (network's ex-research man) stands in high favor among the 20th floor high echelon today, it's because the "Katzenjammer antics" and strategy have resulted in the sale (as of Oct. 1) of 104 quarter-hours of daytime (compared with 110 last year, but in the face of the $15,000,000 ABC-TV's blockbuster and some stepped up NBC sales competition); an SRO 2:30 to 5 p.m., and the sale of five and a half quarter-hours on the new Jimmy Dean entry.

The Nielsen AA's (average audience) report for the second Sept. period tells the most revealing story of all: an average Top 10 rating of 7.0 compared to 5.8 for NBC, representing a 21% lead, with eight in the Top 10 as payoff; and Nielsen paydirt on the first week of the Jimmy Dean show to the tune of 6.8, as compared to a 4.8 for the last week of the previous entry—"Beat the Clock" representing a 42% increase.

What particularly elates CBS is the nature of the Top 10 shows, for the most part solidly-grounded serials with little reliance on audience participation-giveaway entries NBC's candidates for Nielsen Top 10 honors, "Price Is Right" and "Tic Tac Dough," both venture into program areas under public and official scrutiny.

It Takes More Than Display Ads To Make a Hit Out of a TV Show; Dailies Reap Harvest from Webs

Over the past three or four weeks the "premiere time" display ads in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles dailies and in other key Trendex cities have toted up to perhaps the biggest single source of Sept.-Oct. revenue for many a newspaper throughout the country. The networks (and affiliate stations in the cities involved) have been splurging with unprecedented coin to attract audiences to the new season's premieres. (Newspapers bemoaning the fact that television has been taking away their bread-and-butter have been singularly quiet this past month while tv has been replenishing the coffers of the dailies.)

There's no question that those half-page, quarter-page and even eighth-of-a-page display ads in the tv sections of the dailies have been benefitting the programs in their first time up for the season, Milton Berle, for example, almost blew the lid off the Trendex Index with a phenomenal "comeback" rating. So did a lot of the others, including Jackie Gleason.

But with the premiere out of the way, the boys were on their own—even though they were fortified with some second-week (and even third-week) display ads. Once you get them "into the tent" with that initial blown-up ad, your second-week audience is only as good as your first-week show. This was amply demonstrated with Milton Berle's second-week rating — a drop of six points from his previous high of 32.5. It was same in the case of Gleason, whose five-point drop for his second time out merely reflected a lot of dissatisfaction with his premiere show.

And so on down the line, with literally dozens of shows to prove that once you attract them you gotta deliver to hold them. Those second and third-week ratings are far more indicative of how a show is going. Conversely, take Dinah Shore. First time out she was beaten by "General Electric Theatre" but she delivered such a wham of a show that word-of-

Frank Sinatra will make his first and possibly only tv guest appearance of the season this Friday night (24), appearing in a dramatic role on the premiere segment of "The Thin Man" on NBC-TV.

However, it will probably be the least heralded stint Sinatra's ever done. Under his contract for the appearance, sponsor Colgate and NBC are forbidden from advertising the stint in advance.

$365,699,450 TV Network Gross In 8 Months; Up 11%

Network television grossed $365,699,450 in the first eight months of 1958. This marks an 11.4% increase over the gross take by the three webs in the like 1957 period, but it does not take into account most of the fall sponsorships. In the latter regard, the trade expects a considerable drop-off from the 1957-'58 season.

Nighttime tv went up to $261,247,266, a 13.6% increase from the $230,280,872 of 1957. Daytime was up 6.6%, from $84,213,714 to $89,304,915.

Food and food products remained the category spending the largest amount of gross coin in network video through the month of August. It hit $69,806,396, with toiletries running a $66,204,708 second. Soaps, cleaners and polishes spent $41,205,640, tobaccos $38,408,891 and automotive accounts $35,811,579.

Wm. Zeckendorf Subject Of CBS-TV's 'Celebrity' Pilot; Wkly. Biog Series

Following a recently-laid master plan to enhance the pubaffairs programming and consequently draw prime time advertising, CBS-TV is out peddling a new half-hour film stanza called "Celebrity." A pilot has been completed on real estate giant William Zeckendorf.

"Celebrity," the network reports, "is an experiment in the area of television biography." Stanza, which is aimed at weekly exposure, follows a subject in his daily chores with mobile film cameras, interspersed with commentary about the man's makeup by friends and critics alike. At the tailend of each show, emcee Walter Cronkite interviews the celebrity (who will come from any part of business, industrial, public or show biz life) as to his own feelings regarding the preceeding commentary.

CBS show followed Zeckendorf into his office and lensed the realtor closing a $6,000,000 deal.

Fairy Tales Are Not for Real

The lowly Trendex status of "Swiss Family Robinson" last week in its Sunday 6:30 to 7:30 berth (in the same time period where exactly a year ago a production of "Pinocchio" more than doubled the "Swiss" rating) provides the clincher in the writeoff of the fairy tale as a hot program or sales commodity. Today there is no market for them; advertisers shun them like the plague.

Only the week before "Swiss Family Robinson," NBC-TV put on the latest of the Shirley Temple series, "Hiawatha," bumping Steve Allen for the occasion, and it wound up a poor third on the rating returns. (Sponsors of the series, Breck and Sealtest, are pulling out at the end of their commitment in December).

A few weeks back NBC did a repeat on the filmed "Pied Piper." Its 14.6 Trendex (in contrast to the big audience returns on its initial showing last season) only managed to match a CBS "Adams & Eve" repeat.

Alcoa Near ABC 'Step Beyond' Buy

Alcoa is near to buying the ABC Tuesday 10 to 10:30 p.m. slot in a late season program deal that all three networks sought. Buy is for vidfilmed drama series called "One Step Beyond" and is reportedly an every-week deal to begin this year, although a premiere date was not pinned down.

Plump prospect of a last-minute program buy like this has had all networks bidding, especially in light of the relatively substantial number of holes in present skeds. Alcoa's agency Fuller, Smith & Ross only let the webs know a handful of days ago that they were in the market for additional programming this season. Web and agency are reportedly dickering details now.

"Beyond," produced by Collyer Young, will replace the sustaining "Confession" on ABC-TV.

'INVISIBLE MAN' GETS TUES. SLOT

CBS-TV finally has slotted Official Films' "Invisible Man" for Tuesdays at 8 p.m. It will be a sustainer, with the kickoff date being Nov. 4.

The science fictioner will replace "Keep Talking," now in the 8 p.m. Tuesday time slot. Latter is being considered for Sundays at 10 p.m. should Revlon and Lorillard bump "$64,000 Question."

Jackie Gleason Deplores TV's Lack Of Excitement; 'Ratings Won by Default'

By ABEL GREEN

Jackie Gleason is a performer of no uncertain opinion as regards television now and what the medium—and its reflex actions—may be in the future. As of now he deplores "the lack of excitement in anything in the tv medium today compared to almost any previous year. Take it from the bottom to date, whether it was Milton Berle who was the king as 'Mr. Television,' or the plunging necklines, or the money giveaways and the excitement they generated for a while, or the year or two when one fat comic called Jackie Gleason had a hot flush. But now," he continues, "whatever gets the ratings gets 'em by default, whether it's westerns or what."

It is for that reason that Gleason sees the inevitability of pay-tv and has some definite views that "it'll only come through AT&T, meaning over the telephone lines."

But before he writes off "free" television Gleason believes that education will be the next big excitement in the medium. "It'll come not in the forthright manner of the morning semesters or language courses or local classrooms in emergencies like Little Rock but, for mass consumption, it will first be projected and integrated into a variation of space and pseudo-horror adventure stories, in the guise of science-fiction, and from that will evolve a thirst for real knowledge which only television can bring to the masses into the home.

"I predict that the big cycle towards the end of 'free' tv will be knowledge, and the end of both free and fee-tv, as you call it, will be sports.

Free Vs Fee-TV

"As regards pay-television," Gleason continues, "it'll still be 'free' and have variations of the present system of sponsored television. For example, a sponsor will force the public at point-of-sale to pick up a token which will enable the viewer to see, let's say 'Ben Hur,' on some giant hookup in a week or two hence. That token is in lieu of the quarter or the half-dollar in the home-slot. Through realistic returns on the consumer-level (first you buy the merchandise and then you get the token) an audience can, for the first time, be realistically counted.

"I see a $5,000,000 super-film production getting its money back the first-time-around via tollvision.

"I see the entry-blank-and-the-token system as a big pay-see audience for some gimmick such as 'If after you see our new model automobile you answer such-and-such questions you get a free car.'"

On Critics and Audiences

Gleason is committed to the audience-identification as the best common denominator for fan appeal. He respects the pro cri ics "but I wish some of them," he observes, "would see the type of mail a popular favorite gets—it does not have to mean me—and they'd see their pseudo-sophistica'ed criticism in another light. Only we, who get tons of this kind of mail, know how the average Joe puts himself in place of me, as a 'lost soul,' or when we stumble-bum-

Ginger's Trendex Very Unsnappy

CBS-TV has been asking itself: What went wrong on the Ginger Rogers special for Pontiac last Wednesday (15)? It's virtually axiomatic in tv today that to bring on an all-star spec (this one also had Ray Bolger and the Ritz Bros.) you can't miss as a Top 10 entry.

But when the Trendex returns were posted the following morning. CBS found that Miss Rogers had been swamped by Ralph Edwards' "This Is Your Life," score reading: 23.4 to 13.6. True, in the last half-hour Miss Rogers climbed to a 19.8 as against 8.3 for ABC's boxing, but her overall hour average of 16.7 won't give her even a look-in when the Top 10 tallies are registered.

Sun Oil's 'Sea Hunt'

Other alternate week sponsor is Bristol Myers.

Radio-TV News Directors Carry Editorial Torch

Chicago, Oct. 21.

If it proves that this year's parley of the Radio and Television News Directors Assn. has made any difference at all in the future of broadcasting, it will undoubtedly be in the area of the editorial—"the big new idea," as one member put it.

Fact that the subject came up repeatedly, generating such interest that the perennial issue of Canon 35 was demoted to second place, augurs a quickening across the country of the slow-starting trend at stations to opinionize. At least it's a better bet that a majority of stations will find themselves engaged in "depth report" or commentary programming over the coming year than that cameras and mikes will gain blanket admission into the courts before the next RTNDA conclave.

The statistics, as unearthed in a survey conducted by Dick Yoakum (WFIU, Bloomington, Ind.) are already impressive. Yoakum reported that 42% of stations were airing or beaming editorials by this date, nearly a third of them on a regular daily basis. The editorial in most cases, he said, is in the news director's purview, with the blessings of "a cooperative, responsible management that knows what it's getting into." Based on his study, Yoakum estimated that radio and tv "is half-way along the road to editorializing."

What a willingness to express enlightened opinion can do for a station was demonstrated by Ralph Renick, citing his own station (WTVJ, Miami, Fla.), as the example. Renick said ARB ratings have doubled for the time period ever since WTVJ installed a nightly editorial back in September, 1957. He calculated, on the basis of ratings, that the electronic editorial was getting eight times the exposure of the printed ones in the Miami Herald, with a circulation of 300,000.

He pointed out that it is a highly

Mull Spec for Debbie

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Debbie Reynolds may star in an hour-long spec on CBS-TV next spring.

Network is negotiating for the Metro pactee to topline the spec, which would be produced by Bob Banner. Dick Lewine, director of special programs for the web, is handling the negotiations for Miss Reynolds. She recently had her Metro pact revised to allow her to do television.

CBS-TV Shooting Pix O'Seas for 'Playhouse' And Theatrical Release

First of two 90-minute films financed by CBS-TV goes into production next month in Florence, Italy. Film, scripted by Dale Wasserman, will be part of a series the network will insert into "Playhouse 90" and then distribute theatrically overseas.

Interesting angle is that CBS is contemplating post-tv theatrical distribution in the U.S. as well, although a final decision in this regard has not been made. If it is ultimately exhibited theatrically here, it will be the first-network-made series to go a supplemental motion picture theatre route.

Said to be a pet project CBS program boss Hubbell Robinson Jr., production has been to Nicole Milinair who was associated with Sheldon Reynolds in the "Foreign Intrigue" skein. After filming Wasserman's meller about forged Rennaisance art in Florence, Miss Milinair will oversee the second film in the series, which is called "Cities of the Night," in London. Her production partner is Tony Darnborough who did the Somerset Maugham "Trio" and "Quartet" features.

Initial word was an additional four "Cities of the Night" would be produced, but Robinson disclosed that the network's immediate plans call only for the stories lensed in Florence and London. TV-theatrical deal was negotiated by William Morris.

The two films will be dubbed for foreign theatrical use.

NBC's Rodeo Spec

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Roy Rogers will appear in World Championship Rodeo which NBC will televise from Cow Palace, Frisco, Nov. 9, as first of three specs he'll appear in during the next three months. Cowboy star also is slated to do three more specs next year.

Followups will be as guestar on Dinah Shore special, Nov. 23, and his own Roy Rogers Country and Western Roundup, Jan. 4, from NBC Burbank. On latter, Pat Boone, Jo Stafford, Red Foley and Rex Allen will guest with him.

The Weekend Trendex

Dinah Shore for the second week in a row topped "GE Theatre" on Sunday (19), registering a strong 22.5 against the CBS competition's 18.4, while ABC's "Colt .45" ran third with a 14.0 Ed Sullivan bested Steve Allen with a 15.8 for the 8 to 8:30 period as against 13.1, and a 21.1 vs. 19.2 for the 8:30-9 segment. But "Maverick" triumphed over both Sullivan and Allen in their three-way competitive slotting, the ABC western copping a 23.7 In the 7:30 to 8 period, "Maverick" was way out in front, 27.0, as against Jack Benny's 18.0 and a 5.8 for NBC's "Northwest Passage," which spells trouble for NWP.

As was to be expected, the Fred Astaire special on NBC-TV Friday outclassed the competition, copping a 19.0 in the 9 to 9:30 period as against Phil Silvers' 17.9 and "Man With a Camera's" 13.1 Again at 9:30 Astaire triumphed with a 19.3, with "Schlitz Playhouse" getting a 16.1 and "77 Sunset Strip" trailing with a 14.5. However, highest rating of the night went to ABC's Disney show, which edged Astaire with its 19.7 in the 8:30 to 9 period, when it left Jackie Gleason trailing with a 15.5 and "Ellery Queen" with a 10.2.

Channel Shifts to Invite Probe On 'Influence' as High Court Acts

Washington, Oct. 21.

Two thorny deintermixture cases are on another legal merry-go-round per direction of the U. S. Supreme Court.

Where they will wind up, no one knows, but it could be back in the lap of the Federal Communications Commission.

By a 7 to 2 vote Monday (20), the Supreme Court returned the two cases to the U. S. Court of Appeals here for "appropriate" action in light of Harris Investigating Sub-Committee testimony last spring.

The cases had been appealed by Sangamon Valley Television Corp. and WIRL Television Co.

Sangamon, a Springfield, Ill., Channel 2 applicant, was protesting FCC's deintermixture order shifting the VHF outlet to St. Louis.

WIRL, winner of Channel 8 in Peoria, Ill., was appealing subsequent switch of the channel to the tri-city area of Iowa and Illinois. WIRL got a UHF outlet instead.

WIRL, in its protest, charged that Sen. Robert S. Kerr (D-Okla.) had used "his influence as a U. S. Senator for his own private gain" in getting the Peoria VHF channel removed. Kerr is majority stockholder of West Central Broadcasting Co., which operates UHF station WEEK-TV in Peoria.

The Court of Appeals upheld FCC's orders in denying the protests by Sangamon and WIRL.

Monday's brief order by the Supreme Court noted a Justice Department brief in the Sangamon Valley case which alluded to Harris subcommittee testimony last spring. Justice said the hearings indicated that a St. Louis UHF operator, interested in having a VHF outlet in his city, and applicants for Channel 2 in Springfield, including Sangamon, had talked to FCC members about the switch.

Noting that the testimony came after the rulings by the Court of Appeals the high tribunal vacated the lower court's decisions and ordered them reconsidered.

As a result of disclosures by the House influence probe, the Appeals Court has already sent the Miami Channel 10 and Boston Channel 5 cases back to FCC.

Justices John M. Harlan and Tom C. Clark dissented from the Supreme Court's action, arguing there was no reason for vacating the lower court's decisions for it to consider the House testimony.

NBC Ups Donaldson

Ross Donaldson has been named director of script services for NBC-TV network programs. He'll report to Robert F. Lewine, veep of NBC-TV network programs.

Donaldson was previously manager of program submissions.

NAB Head Flays De Sapio Bid For Free Air Time

Minneapolis, Oct. 21.

Here from Washington for the National Association of Broadcasters' regional conference, Harold E. Fellows, NAB president-board chairman, flayed Carmine DeSapio, New York Tammany Hall leader, for the latter's proposal that major political candidates receive 20 hours of free broadcast time a month.

Fellows also expressed agreement with Edward R. Murrow that radio and television are failing to keep the public adequately informed regarding international and national developments and not defending their interests sufficiently. But he feels progress is being made in that direction.

The NAB president, too, told the regional meeting that broadcasters must make a unified effort to shield their industry against unnecessary controls and expressed the belief that with the improving economy sales of color tv sets, "which have been lagging so disappointingly," will spurt in 1959 and "color tv will come into its own."

Fellows said he feels that nobody has a better right than Murrow to make the latter's criticisms.

Relative to DeSapio's proposal for free time, Fellows declared "there is no reason for us to have to give such free time than there is for newspapers or billboard companies to do so."

Fellows urged a continued united front against hard liquor advertising "which could jeopardize the industry's relations with the public and with Congress."

"Any broadcaster who accepts hard liquor advertising is selling out his birthright for a $20 bill," he declared.

It was pointed out by Fellows that "we have yet to face some of the most intense legislative problems that have confronted this industry." Among them, he said, are pay tv, community antennas, network regulation, restrictions on ownership, advertising controls and music licensing.

"Attempts to control programs is the greatest peril to our industry and, for that matter, to the public," asserted Fellows.

He urged that the broadcasters become acquainted with their Congressmen and Senators to inform them of their industry's problems. He pointed out that radio and tv are "peculiarly vulnerable"

NBC to Pick Up Tape Tab on Delayed Shows, Pursuing CBS Policy

NBC-TV has apparently decided to do as CBS-TV is doing regarding video tape operation for delayed network shows during daylight saving time periods.

NBC-TV originally informed its affiliates that it would not pick up the tab for this service despite move on the part of CBS-TV to assume such costs.

Announcement of NBC-TV's new move is expected to be made at the affiliates' meeting tomorrow (Thurs.).

Tape costs, however, will be picked up by NBC for 1959. Decision as to what will be done subsequently remains up in the air.

Chi FM'ers Form Assn. for Buildup

Chicago, Oct. 21.

FM interests in the Chi area are meeting this Friday (24) to create an association whose purpose will be to promote new audiences and business for frequency modulation radio. Idea was hatched by Frank Kovas of WKFM, Walt Dennis of WBBM-FM, and Chuck Klein of FM Unlimited. Around 15 station operators are expected to turn out, the almost certain holdouts being the NBC and ABC outlets here, which are not seriously in the FM business.

FM is hot in Chicago, the new business filtering in at a faster rate than ever before in the medium's history. Two airlines made their first FM purchases last week, both of them buying WBBM-FM, the CBS station. Delta purchased the station's "Champagne Hour" on Sundays for 52 weeks, and Northwest Airlines bought 28 five-minute newscasts per week on a full year's contract.

Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co., deluxe Chicago department store, also made its debut in the medium last week with spot buys on WBBM-FM, WFMT and WNIB for the pre-Christmas season.

Chicago area now has 16 FM stations on the air, including those in Oak Park, Hammond (Ind.) and Cicero. Two more will sign on in three or four weeks, and the remaining two channels of the 20

B'CASTERS IN BLUE BLAZERS

The End of an Era

[DAMM STEPS DOWN]

By GEORGE ROSEN

This is the week when the NBC affiliates are assembled in New York for their annual conclave with the network executives. And perhaps the highlight of the three-day meet is the stepping down of Walter J. Damm, the WTMJ-TV, Milwaukee, factotum, as chairman of the NBC Affiliates Advisory Committee. With it comes the end of an era in broadcasting.

For perhaps more than a score of years Damm was the No. 1 stormy petrel of the broadcasting industry. As the "guardian angel" of the combined affiliate family, he coveted their interests 24 hours a day; whenever he suspected network "transgressions" or felt the affiliates were getting the worst end of a deal, it was the rambunctious Mr. Damm to whom the affiliates turned. They loved him to a man.

About four or five years ago things took a turn. It was about that time that CBS cast envious glances at the Milwaukee Journal-owned WTMJ-TV operated by Damm in the hopes of maneuvering an affiliate switch. Nothing happened—except that, subsequently, Damm not only protected the interests of the NBC affiliates but also began making like a network v.p. in charge of stations relations. Then everybody—on both sides of the fence—started to love him. A lot of the fire had gone out, but his value both to the network and the affiliates seemed on the ascendancy.

Damm is now retiring. Moving into his spot will be Jack Harris, of KPRC-TV, Houston, the vice chairman of the affiliate group. Harris is no slouch either; has taken his cue from Damm in his awareness (1) of station problems; (2) of the network's problems. But nonetheless this week puts the period to one of the more interesting footnotes in broadcasting history.

NBC Press Junketeers on Virtual 24-Hour Musical Chairs Spree

By BOB CHANDLER

Some 80 tv editors flown into New York from all over the country by NBC-TV this week for its second annual press junket are on a virtual 24-hour spree, all for the network, its programs and personality. Web, which has expended some $25,000 to finance the junket (which all told, including trade deals and sponsor-talent expenditures on parties, etc., would come to about $100,000), is getting its biggest press blast of the year out of the shindig, however.

Between luncheons and parties, the network's press department under v.p. Syd Eiges and director Ellis Moore has set up a complex game of musical chairs, under which some 50-odd NBC execs and performers are undergoing the interview treatment at half a dozen locales throughout the city. Web has scheduled four at a time, each an individual and exclusive session for the newsman involved, running a half-hour, after which the newsmen vacate the premises to make way for four more of their colleagues. All told, hundreds of columns have already been filed out of the press setup at the New Yorker.

Moreover, a round of nightly parties and luncheons have been so arranged as to give the fourth

Leg Men

Choice interview subject of the current annual press junket was NBC Radio's Marlene Dietrich, whom about 70% of the 80 editors from around the country named as the star they most wanted to interview.

What set out to be a routine gathering of four of five editors with Miss Dietrich Monday (20) turned out to be a virtual mob scene, with NBC filling a room at the Hotel Plaza twice over with newsmen who wanted to gab with and gander la Dietrich.

Treyz: 'Who Says Quizzes Are Dead?'

Atlanta, Oct. 21.

Oliver Treyz, president of ABC-TV, commenting on cancellation of tv quiz series "Twenty-One" Thursday (16) predicted "you're going to see more quizzes coming back of a more intellectual nature."

"You can't kill the drives that are behind the appeal of the quizzes," ABC-TV chieftain commented when told that NBC-TV had jettisoned "Twenty-One."

Treyz was in Atlanta to participate in dedication of WLW-A's 1,049-foot tower. (WLW-A is owned and operated by Crosley Broadcasting Corp.. and ABC-TV outlet here).

Treyz is a firm believer in "our master tactic, counter-programming—to schedule a program unlike anything else offered at the same time period." An example: ABC pits "Maverick" vs. Jack Benny; "Northwest Passage," Ed Sullivan and/or Steve Allen. Concept

'64G' Also Cueing Lorillard Distress; '21' Is Booted Off

P. Lorillard Co., co-sponsor of "$64,000 Question" along with Revlon, is also seeking relief from the fare in the form of either a basic change in the format or wants to get off the "Question" hook completely. The ciggie company held a meeting last Friday (17) with CBS brass and officials from Entertainment Production Inc. and has another slated for today (Wed.).

Revlon made its position known a week ago and surprisingly enough did it without the knowledge of P. Lorillard Co. or the agency for the ciggie firm, Lennen & Newell. The cosmetic firm recently purchased the "Bid 'n' Buy" show off packager Robert Stivers. It was a summer entry that did well rating-

LARRY PUCK'S NEW TALENT-PROD. SETUP

Larry Puck, vet show biz figure and former general manager of all Arthur Godfrey radio and tv shows, will head up a new talent and production organization, HFH Enterprises, a subsid of Hunn, Fritz & Henkin Production, Inc.

Under Puck's direction, HFH Enterprises will enter the personal management field to represent both performing and production talent and will also package tv, theatrical and industrial shows.

In addition to his new duties, Puck will continue as exec producer with HFH Productions, Inc., which has a wide array of commercial production clients.

COM'L STATIONS' BIG EDUC'N YEN

The romance between the nation's school teachers and commercial broadcasting stations is growing hotter and heavier daily. This is no minor necking affair but a major union between two forces that once refused to dot each other's "i's" and cross each other's "t's."

Unable to do much within their own educational broadcasting boundaries, school administrators, more and more, have been reaching out for guidance and practical help from commercial outlets and the results, according to expert electronic educators, are currently visible in spades on audio-video channels of commercial indies, network-owned outlets and coast to coast chains.

NBC-TV is currently presenting a significant series of educational programs tagged "Continental Classroom." It is an early morning college credit course in atomic age physics with over 300 colleges and universities participating and is supported by some of the biggest foundations in the country. Also,

It's Now Harvideo

Superabundance of college credit programs on the commercial channels these days has led to a super-abundance of appropriate gags.

A Saturday Review columnist, kidding the flurry of educational programs, points out what it will be like in the future: "Rumors persist that Harvard will move to the West Coast. 'Our plans are not yet finalized,' admitted Harvard's prexy at the offices of William Morris Agency. 'Nevertheless I can assure you that we have sufficient film footage in the can to continue the great tradition of Cambridge wherever we are.'"

"What channel did you graduate from?" is another current crack among those "attending" "Sunrise Semester" and "Continental Classroom."

NBC's 13-owned radio and tv outlets are doing a concentrated job for high school students in a series called "Science Calling" with each o&o station working on a local level to promote greater interest in science study.

For Gothamites, the rise-and-shine picture is equally bright. WRCA-TV recently launched "Aqui Se Habla Ingles," ("English Spoken Here") reportedly scoring in the Puerto Rican sections of the city. It is estimated 80% of the Spanish-speaking families in the New York City area own tv sets.

WCBS-TV, pioneer Gotham experimenter in early-morning educational programming, recently expanded its "Sunrise Semester" programming. Tied-in with NYU, it is now giving its viewers lessons in the classics and courses in English, government and math.

Sale of text books, as a result of the tv courses, has jumped to unprecedented heights. Barnes & Noble, NYU Bookshop and other

Godfrey's Ouch

Bob Hope was so hot on the rating charts last Tuesday (14), coming out of the 9 to 10 p.m. fray with a whopping 29.0, that he not only smothered the competition but left Arthur Godfrey nursing probably the worst Trendex wounds of his nighttime career. Best AG could get was 5.6. Even CBS' Red Skelton fell before the Hope onslaught, his 13.0 Trendex, in fact, winding up even behind ABC's new hit, "Rifleman."

Eddie Fisher also took it on the chin, getting a 14.9 compared to "Sugarfoot's" 24.4 at 8 o'clock, and a 15.8 compared to 23.0 for "Wyatt Earp" for 8:30.

Agencies' Big Yen for Tape With BBDO, L&N Hitting 40% Stride

Videotape, being hailed as the replacement of film, is being used commercially by approximately half of the Madison Ave. agencies with only the union hassle and the accompanying right to show the tape commercials more than once holding up a more extensive use of videotape. All agencies queried by VARIETY were either using it currently or making plans for the future use of tape.

Two of the largest users of videotape are BBDO and Lennen & Newell. BBDO currently tapes approximately 40% of its commercials with 60% of the blurbs being filmed. At Lennen & Newell, the tv commercial department also estimates that about 40% of the sales messages are being taped. Most of the L&N taped commercials are being made for P. Lorillard, makers of Kent, Old Gold and Newport cigarets.

McCann - Erickson's television commercial sector estimates that 15% of the blurbs are currently being taped. On the network side the agency taped the first Bob Hope show for Buick as well as planning to tape some episodes of "Desilu Playhouse."

J. Walter Thompson is not presently taping its blurbs but is using it to some extent on the network level. "The Price is Right," which is supervised by JWT, is on tape. Young & Rubicam has been using tape for about a year but agency execs state the big problem with videotape is that the commercials can be used only once.

At Dancer-Fitzgerald-Sample the agency taped the blurbs on "Gunsmoke" for Liggett & Myers and has been taping most of the commercials for Sterling Drug, one of the larger tv accounts in the house. N. W. Ayer has taken to tape for both Breck and Sealtest. The two programs sponsored by Sealtest are taping their commercials. They are the Shirley Temple series and the plugs on "Bat Masterson." Breck, one of the sponsors of the Temple skeins, tapes its commercials on the program.

Others using tape to some degree are D. P. Brother for Oldsmobile; Norman, Craig & Kummel; Warwick & Legler; Emil Mogul; Ogilvy, Benson & Mather; Parkson; Kenyon & Eckhardt; MacManus, John & Adams; Doyle, Dane Bernbach and Foote, Cone & Belding.

This Could Be 'U'

Joseph Leeming, bachelor, was indeed existing in a poppyland as promotion director of the NBC-UHF outlet in Buffalo . . . that is until the roof suddenly, caved in a few weeks ago and the network folded the operation.

Leeming's sorrow was short-lived. Almost immediately he landed a job with the CBS-UHF outlet in Hartford. Toothbrush in his trunk compartment, Leeming pulled into the Connecticut capital and his new job at WHCT. It was a blissful job, for three days anyhow . . . when, zowie, the roof fell in on him again!

CBS had decided to fold its UHF operation in Hartford. Leeming is available for most anything except (no foolin') any UHF endeavor!

Boston Station Breaks the Ice On Liquor Ads

The self imposed ban on the advertising of hard liquor companies and the broadcasting industry fell by the wayside this week with the disclosure that the Sackel Co., Inc., Boston advertising agency had placed an order for Nuyens cordials and vodka on radio station WCRB, Boston. Nuyens Co. has been running two five-minute newscasts under a 26-week contract.

WCRB kicked off the drive in behalf of Nuyens on Oct. 13 and it is slotted late in the evening on the 11 p.m. and midnight newscasts. Theodore Jones, president of the Boston radio outlet stated that "the station was reaching an adult audience and the campaign for Nuyens did not differ from stations carrying beer and wine advertising or newspapers for that matter."

Sol Sackel, prexy of the agency which bears his name, indicated a strong feeling in favor of the program. "In the time scheduling and in the type of station carrying the broadcasts, we have been careful to keep everything on an adult level. This is a dramatic kickoff method for launching the program and on the basis of our initial response, our recommendations has been borne out with immediate success."

Another radio station, WOMT, Manitowic, Wis., recently stated that as of Nov. 1, when a new rate card is in application, the station will accept all alcoholic beverage advertising.

The advertising industry differs as to whether broadcasters should be allowed to carry liquor messages over the airwaves but within the next month or so the industry answer should be forthcoming. Traditionally the liquor industry adopted a voluntary code that they would not advertise via the broadcast medium and the rule applied to newspapers on Sunday.

ABC-TV MAY REPRISE BING & SINATRA SPEC

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

There may be a reprise of the Bing Crosby-Frank Sinatra spec this season—only on ABC-TV, instead of CBS-TV on which they performed last year.

Both are now under contract to ABC, and the web is negotiating for Sinatra to be Crosby's guest on the latter's second spec of the season in February. While Sinatra is an ABC pactee, it's mainly a matter of seeing whether he will be clear for such a spec due to his many pix commitments.

NBC's $2,300,000 Daytime TV Spurt

NBC-TV's block of programs from 10:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. Monday-through-Friday is now sold out for remainder of the year as result of new and additional daytime biz obtained in past few days. Orders amounting to $2,300000 gross revenue brought about this optimistic picture.

Additional biz came from Procter & Gamble, Lever Bros. and Whitehall Labs and follows recently announced purchase by Pharmaceuticals, Procter & Gamble purchase in "It Could Be You" starting Oct. 30 and continuing through next June. Lever Bros. bought into "Concentration," as did Whitehall Labs.

Also, some $800,000 in gross billings was chalked up at NBC-TV as result of two orders, including big purchase by Alberto-Culver and order from G&C Merrian Co. and additional order from Block Drug Co. for representation on "Today" and "Jack Paar Show."

Alberto-Culver order is for 93 participations on Paar program during first half of 1959. Merriam order, for Webster's dictionary, is for four participations on "Today" during final quarter of this year.

CBS Films, With $4,200,000 New Product Tab, Sets Producer Stable

CBS Films, which has four series being filmed with a production tab of about $4,200,000 and seven pilots in various stages of development, plans to build a stable of producers.

This stable would maintain a flow of product to the web's growing syndication arm. Producers, under the plan, either would come in with their own projects, or be assigned series.

Present situation confronting CBS Films' v.p. and general manager Les Harris is short of chaotic. The web's telefilm subsid has grown tremendously over the past three years, now grossing in the neighborhood of $15,000,000 a year. Harris, besides riding herd on sales, also has been confronted with many production problems. In order to lighten the load, the outfit hopes to build a retinue of producers it can depend on for its production needs.

Another step in the delegation of production responsibility will be the opening by CBS Films of a production office in Hollywood. Right now, the web subsid has four projects alloted to a variety of lots, including Desilu and General Service.

A man is needed on the Coast to keep tabs on the activity there. CBS Films also is toying with the idea of buying its own studio facilities on the Coast. Another alternative is to make one studio alignment, with the current scattered projects serving as a test.

On the "producers stable" project, CBS Films already has a start. Sam Gallu, who did "Navy Log" for CBS, also will do "Border Patrol" as well as another meller pilot. Wilbur Stark and Jerry Layton, now filming "Col. Flack," will do a cops-and-robbers pilot. "The Brothers Branagan"; Jim Faickney, assistant producer on the net's "Air Power," has done the the subsid's "Silent Sabre.

Idea is to have these and other producers available to CBS Films on a non-exclusive basis.

N.Y. Politicos In 50G Tape Talk

Telestudios, equipped with video tape machinery, finds the politicos are ringing its cash register.

To date, billings to both major parties for video taping and kines run upwards of $50,000, with more in the offing.

Major candidates have taped shows ranging from five to 15 minutes for airing in N.Y. Because stations outside the metropolitan area are not equipped for tape, kines have been made for distribution to upstate New York.

Those using the Telestudios facilities include gubernatorial candidates Averell Harriman and Nelson Rockefeller, senatorial contenders Frank Hogan and Kenneth Keating, as well as such politicos as Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, former senator Herbert Lehman and Thomas Finletter.

Harriman & Hogan are shooting three other takes today (Wed.) at the new Terminitape Studios.

'MAN IN THE HOUSE' TO ROLL IN N. Y.

"The Man of the House," the Peter Lawford property in which Carl Reiner will star, is set to be filmed in New York, with the pilot to roll Dec. 1, probably at Gold Medal Studios in the Bronx. Lawford is bankrolling the pilot, but won't appear in the series.

Reiner, however, is doubling in brass. He plays the head writer of a comedy show in the series, and he's already written the pilot and 13 other scripts on his own for the show.

Schubert's Global Jaunt

Bernard L. Schubert, prexy of Telestar Films and producer of the projected "Counterspy" series, plans to begin a world-girdling trek next month for location sites.

Pilot, starring Don Megowan and David Harding, has been completed.

Mason's $3,750,000 Libel Suit Vs. NTA

Los Angeles, Oct. 21.

National Telefilm Associates Inc., was accused of being responsible for a letter appearing in the London Daily Express last month which held him up to ridicule and lacking in courage and integrity, in a libel suit asking $3,750,000 damages filed in Superior Court by James Mason last week.

Because of this letter, in Sept. 29, 1958 edition of London sheet, Mason lost out in a deal with NTA to star in a tv series titled "The Third Man," to have been jointly produced with BBC, actor charged.

Named also as defendants were Mort Abrahams, NTA program director; Oliver Unger, prexy, and Bert Kleiner, member of NTA directorate and associated with Beverly Hills investment firm of Cantor, Fitzgerald & Co. Letter, according to complaint, stated that contract in negotiation contained a war clause whereby in the event of an international military situation Mason might leave England, where series was to have been lensed. Actor claims such a clause was never discussed.

Metro-TV's 500G 'Creative' Upbeat; Isaacs Is Pacted

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Metro-TV has signed vet producer-writer Charles Isaacs as the first of several new production executives to be added in a $500,000 expansion of the programming activities of the Loew's tv subsidiary. The $500,000 was voted Metro-TV by the Loew's board, with the coin earmarked for an expansion of the company's creative and program development staff, as well as for acquisition and development of new properties.

Isaacs, whi'll report to production chief Dick Maibaum ,will function primarily in the program development area, operating at the producer and writer level in whipping up new properties. Charles C. (Bud) Barry, v.p. in charge of the tv subsidiary, is currently dickering with two other production execs to move to the Culver City lot.

While the fund did not specify the number of properties to be developed this year, Barry said the studio would do between five and 10. "We'll do whatever we think looks good," he said. Already in work are four potential series, "Jeopardy," the Andrew Stone suspense package; "Amigo," with Gilbert Roland starring as a San Diego detective; "Father of the Bride," pilot of which is being bankrolled by General Foods; and a televersion of "Gaslight" with James Mason as the projected lead.

Metro is currently repped on the webs with "The Thin Man" and "Northwest Passage."

SCRANTON CORP. MULLS TELEFILM BARTERING

Scranton Corp., which owns Hal Roach Studios, is weighing the possibility of bartering telfilms for time on stations.

Film product which would be used is the Rabco catalog, now completely owned by Roach Studios. Scranton Lace, one of the companies owned by Scranton Corp., most likely would be the company getting the benefit of the bartered spots, under the plans.

Roach Studios bought out ABC Films' 50% interest in Rabco for a reported $500,000. Roach had been partnered with ABC Films' in Rabco, formed four years ago. Properties involved include "Racket Squad," 98 episodes; "Code 3," 39 episodes; and "Passport to Danger," 39.

CBS Exits Madrid Dubbing

Because of the importance of the Latin American market, CBS Films has joined other syndication outfits in switching its dubbing operation from Spain.

CBS Films, which has 18 shows for the Spanish-speaking market, plans to dub its telefilms in San Juan, Havana and Mexico City. Lee Harris, CBS Films topper left for Europe Saturday (18). One of his missions there will be to close down the company's tv dubbing operation in Madrid. He also will visit London, Rome, and West Germany during his two week stay.

UATV Wraps Up 'Hudson's Bay' As Fifth Property

"Hudson's Bay," an outdoor adventure series, starring Barry Nelson, is the fifth property inked by United Artists Television (UATV). Like the other four, UATV has committed to produce the full series, 39 episodes.

The deal for the Barry Nelson starrer was inked with Northstar Pictures, Ltd., the principals of which are producers John Gibbs, Richard Steenberg and Michael Sadlier. Same team of Gibbs-Steenberg-Sadlier will produce the Keenan Wynn starrer, "The Troubleshooters," another series of 39 on the UATV agenda.

UATV prez Herb Golden, explaining the UA subsid's operation with indie producers, said UATV supplies all the financing. In return, UATV gets about 50% of the profits in the series, in perpetuity. Ownership of the series is retained by the indie producers. Profit-sharing begins after UATV recoups production costs. Subsid also retains distribution rights in perpetuity. Golden estimated that the parent company has set aside about $10,000,000 for the launching of its UATV subsid, with a good portion of the $10,000,000 alloted for the five series and other projects in the works.

UATV exec v.p. Bruce Eells said initial episodes of at least two series, "Dennis O'Keefe Show" and "International Airport," should be ready for screenings in mid-December. Also a possibility for mid-December is "Troubleshooters," although the initial segments may not be ready until after the first of the year. "Vikings" won't be ready for screenings until about April, with a fall, '59 tv release slated so that the series doesn't conflict with "The Vikings" theatrical release, also distributed by UA. Initial episodes of "Hudson's Bay" should be ready for showings after Jan. 1.

Eells said UATV plans to get into the syndication field by March 1, with a compliment of 20 to 30 men in the field. Those projects which fail to find a national berth will be fed to the regionals in syndication. UATV, he added, also is in the market for outside telefilm product, in order to build its syndication catalog.

NEW G-K-S COMBO SETS 'FATE' SERIES

The production push of the freshly invigorated Gross-Krasne-Sillerman telefilm outfit is underway.

Michael Sillerman, the new prez of the company, became a partner with Gross-Krasne, after leaving Television Programs of America, where he had been exec v.p. TPA has been acquired by Independent Television Corp. (ITC).

First property to be announced by the new combination for production in Hollywood is an anthology series titled "Fate." Thematic series keyed to quirks of fate over man's destinies will be filmed at GKS California Studios, under the personal supervision of Jack J. Gross, GKS vice chairman.

Overseas, "Glencannon," now being filmed in London, is expected to be completed in early '59. Also in London, "Flying Doctor" went before the cameras Monday (20). "Glencannon" stars Thomas Mitchell, while "Doctor" stars Richard Danning.

GKS' "Trader Horn" series, starring John Turner, is expected to be completed by the spring of '59, for release in the fall of '59.

Ziv on Prowl for New Talent

Hollywood. Oct. 21.

Ziv Television Programs has begun a talent search for fresh faces for supporting roles in its six currently filming series, according to Herb Gordon, Ziv Coast v.p. Five-man casting department has been allocated additional funds, according to Gordon, to scout little theatre groups, school and other amateur theatricals and daytime television shows to come up with new talent.

Gordon feels that casting in some instances has tended to become too mechanical, with the result that many of the same faces keep popping up in supporting roles. Expanded casting setup at the studio, under Benn Jacobson and his associate, Howard Montgomery, will attempt a "creative casting" approach.

Additional monies stem from a meeting last week between Gordon and Ziv prexy John Sinn, which stressed desirability of higher quality production in the increasingly competitive and selective market. Ziv has allocated more coin for scripts, directors and actors in the move toward higher quality, Gordon declared. He stressed that while Ziv has always had the coin available for top writers and directors, much of the desirable talent itself wasn't available. Now, for the first time, top writers and directors are working in the syndicated field and Ziv is out to get them.

As for actors of star calibre, Gordon said they are being won over to syndication after years of reluctance by the "missionary work" of Richard Carlson, Broderick Crawford and Lloyd Bridges, three of Ziv's top stars. "They get a convert every time they wave one of their checks in front of somebody's face," he said.

Limited Range in Which Femme Stars Can Roam in Telepix

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Of some 60-odd telefilm series currently filming five have femme stars as leads, and of these, four are comedy series and the fifth is an antholcgy with the distaffer as hostess. The nix on pix built around distaffers isn't confined to film shows either, but universally extends through the live and filmed tv spectrum.

One reason, advanced by Herb Gordon, Coast v.p. of Ziv Television—which has never used a series built around a femme star—is that agencies appear to feel that the gals don't have the staying power that men stars possess in television. Gordon points out that several top female stars have made pilots—Claudette Colbert and Barbara Stanwyck, for example—and despite their reputations and appeal have met with cold receptions at the ad agencies.

Besides the agency reaction, Gordon states that properties to showcase the femme stars are difficult to come by. Apart from the question of getting the right vehicle, there has to be at least one other strong element in the property besides the star in order to make it acceptable, and the combination is difficult to find. Ziv doesn't by any means take the position it will never do a femme vehicle, Gordon points out, but so far it's been unable to find the right one.

Actually, those distaffers who have made the tv grade made their successes in the early days of television, when viewers were less selective and the competition somewhat less fierce. He points to the fact that after years of success with her original format, Eve Arden returned last year and fared not so well. Similarly, other

Harrison, Cooperman As SG Exec-Producers

Screen Gems in the past week has signed on two executive producers, Paul Harrison and Alvin Cooperman. They'll report in Hollywood to Harry Ackerman, veepee in charge of the telefilm company's production.

The two men, company said, will work on the development of programming for the 1959-'60 season.

Harrison directed the new Ann Southern series at Desilu. Cooperman, former executive producer of "Producer's Showcase," has been working for the past year on "Shirley Temple Storybook."

Ziv TV Prepping 10 New Series To Launch 1959-60

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Ziv Television Programs is developing a minimum of 10 new series for the '59-60 season, an all-time high for the company. While specific properties haven't been nailed down, a minimum of four and possibly five are earmarked for syndication and therefore will represent minimum production of 29 episodes each. Balance will be aimed at the network market.

Studio is currently operating at capacity, with six series filming at the rate of about 300 half-hours per year. Additionally, more production will be underway shortly with production of several episodes in one new series as a possible January starter, and at least one other as the next Ziv syndication entry after the current "Mackenzie's Raiders."

'BOLD VENTURE' AS NEXT ZIV ENTRY

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Next Ziv syndication entry will be "Bold Venture," with Dane Clark starring, which began shooting yesterday (Mon.) at Ziv studios here. Mort Fine and David Friedkin are producing the series, centering about the adventures of a Caribbean hotelkeeper. Joan Marshall costars.

Fine & Friedkin will alternate on scripting and direction, as well as producing the series, with Fine having written the opening script and Friedkin directing. Ziv is shooting 39 of the shows.

ANNE FRANCIS INTO 'CLAUDIA'

Anne Francis has been cast in the title role for the pilot of "Claudia," which George Burns' McCadden Productions will roll in the next couple of weeks on the Coast, in association with Rose Franken, author of the stories.

Already cast in a key role is Doris Kenyon.

Metro TV Preps 'Silent Classics'

Metro TV may package a "Silent Film Classics" group of about 50 pix for tv distribution.

Metro TV execs in N.Y. this week are screening the company's silent library, consisting of from 700 to 800 pix, in an effort to prune the best. Final decision will be made after the screenings, to be followed up by sounding out station sentiment.

Idea for the package is to supply each "classic" selected with historical notes about the film and its stars. These notes could be utilized for a hosting format by the stations.

Metro's silents include "Big Parade," starring John Gilbert; "Greed," directed by Eric Von Stroheim; Buster Keaton pix, and many starring Greta Garbo, Rudolph Valentino, Lon Chaney, Ramon Navarro, John Barrymore, and other greats of the 20's. Titles include "Laugh, Clown Laugh," "The Four Horsemen," "Flesh in the Devil," "Prisoner of Zenda." "Camille." and "Romeo and Juliet," starring Francis X. Bushman.

VIDPIX ON 'CONFESSION' KICK

It's Better to Marry a Millionaire

Stars in telefilm series find that their work before the cameras is mild compared to hitting the road for a promo push.

Here's a typical day for Barbara Eden, Lori Nelson and Merry Anders, of "How to Marry A Millionaire," as logged by flack Phil Cowan, of National Telefilm Associates. The city was Chicago.

8:30 a.m.: breakfast interview with Chicago Tribune tv critic, John Fink; 9:15 a.m., appearance at the Chicago Food Fair for American Tobacco Co.; 10 a.m., girls travel 60 miles to Zion, Ill., for the opening of a new A&P store; 1 p.m., lunch interview with Nate Gross of the Chicago Daily News; 2 p.m., appearance at WGN-TV to shoot promos for the station; 2:30 p.m., appearance at two local A&P stores; 3:30 p.m., cocktails with American Tobacco officials; 4:30 p.m., more cocktails with Chicago tv critic Terry Turner; 5:45 p.m. "Man on the Street" WGN-TV interview; 6:15 p.m. to 12:30 a.m., stunt having three real life millionaires meet girls at a publicity party, followed by more newspaper interviews and a press photo stint.

So on to Minneapolis, Detroit, N.Y., Hartford, et al. "Girls thriving, Cowan dead," flack notes as final item.

'Gray Ghost' Haunts CBS Films

South Waxes Hot Editorially on Vidpix Skein; Ponder 2d Year Production

Probably no other telefilm series, especially in the syndication field, has kicked so much editorial comment as CBS Films' "Gray Ghost."

Ironically, most of the copious editorial comment has come from the South, the very section of the country which has caused the demise of new production on the Tod Andrews starrer.

CBS Films' nixed fresh production on the Civil War show because some advertisers in the South were said to be worried that the show may stir Dixie feelings at a time when the South is fighting the school integration issue. The North, apparently, has accepted the exploits of Col. Mosby's Raiders without much excitement, even though the series leaves the implications that Federal troops never won a battle.

But, suh, listen to the South.

Harry Ashmore's Little Rock Gazette had this to say: "One of the unforeseen byproducts of the (desegregation issue) has been a decision to cancel new fall schedules for 'The Gray Ghost.' . . . Most of all we are opposed to censorship as such, the notion that because Mosby's Rangers will not be on tv this season, they can be presumed never to have lived or not to live today in the history books . . . It seems unlikely that we have come to pass where sectional shooting could be touched off by a tv show, no matter how stimulating to the old glands and juices."

Radio-tv editor of the Birmingham (Ala.) News, Roger Thames, warned "TV should smarten up. With the coming of the 100th anniversary of those stirring times (Civil War), interest is mounting to a new high."

The Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer editorialized: "Now on television, to the infinite delight of millions, the heroic ranger proves weekly that one Reb. is better than a regiment of Yankees. The old ratio of one to seven is gone. The South never lost except in 1865."

That's about the representative editorial comment in the South. It's enough to make CBS Films pause and wonder whether it would be wise to get into second-year production.

A&C's Rerun Bonanza

A sales switch story is being penned by the vintage Abbott & Costello pix, distributed by Sterling Television. Outfit finds it actually easier to sell reruns of the comedy team than to open up a market that's never telecast the show.

Same stations are buying it again and again. Roster of renewals include WPIX, N.Y.; CKLW, Detroit; WGR, Buffalo; WTTV, Indianapolis; KTTV, Los Angeles; WGAN, Portland; WNAC, Boston; KARD, Wichita; and WPTA, Ft. Wayne.

GAC Into Telefilm Arena; Eight-Pilot Partnership Deals

GAC-TV is making its first concerted push into telefilm production on a partnership basis. The General Artists subsid has lined up eight pilot films, including one for a 60-minute dramatic skein.

Company has already invested in the pilot scripts and, when necessary, story rights, and it's now in the process of fishing around for partners to handle actual production. Until now, company has chiefly done straight agenting in vidfilm, with the possible exception of one or two series.

Art Weems, prexy of GAC-TV, organized about a year back, has lined up, among other shows, "The Many Loves of Dobie Gillis," based on the Max Shulman comedy novel. Shulman wrote the pilot and will supervise additional scripting. Second show is "Dangerous Dan McGrew," with Kay Starr inked as the femme lead in this video adaptation of the Robert Service poem. Hal Stanley, who produced Van Johnson's "Pied Piper" spec is partnered.

Other series are "Mayday," an original on the exploits of the air transport command written by Harold Gast; "Merrill's Marauders," to be produced by Sam Gallu, whom GAC set for the NBC "Behind Closed Door Series"; "Gideon's Night," the 60-minute series, based on a Scotland Yard mystery tome by English writer J. J. Marric (Columbia Pictures already has a feature film with the same title in the can); a story on loggers by John Demott and James Mandulay called "Timber Cruiser"; "Motel," a situation comedy for which Walt Canter penned the pilot and for which GAC is dickering with Glenda Farrell to star, and "Many of Many Faces," a cloak-and-dagger skein in conjunction with Green-Joy Productions.

4 Star's Pilot On Judy Canova Show

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Four Star Productions will finance a pilot of a new Judy Canova series tentatively tagged "The Judy Canova Show."

Paul Jones, former Paramount producer, is producer of the series. Charles Stewart and Jack Elinson wrote the pilot script. Early December shooting date is planned for the pilot.

Series will be a comedy, but Miss Canova will not essay her customary broad hillbilly comedics.

SYNDICATION'S 'TELL ALL' SEGS

Everybody's "confessing" on syndicated shows these days.

Telestar Films has "Parole"; Guild Films has "Divorce Court"; Interstate Television has "Divorce Hearing"; Banner Films has "Night Court," with a few more similar properties from other outfits in the offing.

Virtually all of these shows emanate from the Coast, being plucked for national syndication from local Coast stations. Whatever the resistance may be from other sections of the country, all of the above listed entries have found a berth in the N. Y. market. If they do well in N. Y. on the indies (and there's something to crow about in the ratings and/or sponsor satisfaction) situation would give a lift to sales throughout the country.

Their popularity also will be watched by the networks. NBC-TV reportedly is interested in a daytime strip for agony columnist Abigal Van Buren, who syndicates a lovelorn newspaper column under the heading of "Dear Abby."

Webs are no novices to the format, though. ABC-TV, in its new "Operation Daybreak" programming, has "Day In Court." CBS-TV's "Verdict Is Yours" is still going strong.

But with the entire trade on the lookout for what may prove popular, the "tell all" formats, both on the net and syndication levels, will be given a fresh o.o..

Troubles of the heart or with the law characterize the type of programming fare. Some of the entries, such as "Parole" and "Divorce Hearing," are not reenactments, but have real life participants. Others such as "Verdict" and "Divorce Court" have actors participating, with some real life people included.

On the syndication level, influx of "confession" type documentaries comes at a time when the tape situation is warming up. One of the entries, "Divorce Court," originating at KTTV, Los Angeles, is a taped show. KTTV also is responsible for producing the filmed "Parole" series.

Whether on tape or film, these are the type of shows easily produced on the local station level. Both the originating station and syndication outfit feel that these entries are strong enough for circulation throughout the country. Whether they can earn their rating weight, or at best be a marginal pull, remains to be seen. The viewing jury is still out.

Adrian Samish Exiting Metro-TV to Set Up Own Vidpix Production

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Adrian Samish, who has just finished producing 26 segments of "Northwest Passage" at Metro TV, has asked for and received a release from his contract which runs to Jan. 15, in order to get into indie vidfilm production. Samish checks out of the Culver City lot Nov. 1.

Samish has two series ready for production by his own vidfilmery, both penned by Gerald Drayson Adams. One is tentatively titled "The Corsair," and is a modern adventure series located in Florida, Cuba and the Caribbean, with its main site being Miami. Second series is tentatively called "River Man," is a post-Civil War series about a Mississippi River boat captain and his teenage son. It's an adventure-family type of series.

Samish has been at Metro TV for two years, originally joining it as a director of programs in tv, but later electing to produce the "Northwest Passage" series. He was in indie production in N. Y. before joining Metro, and prior to that was with ad agencies and networks in various exec positions.

Brighter Outlook for Hour, 90-Min. Telepix Entries for Syndication

By MURRAY HOROWITZ

What looked like a major headache only a season ago—the rerun possibilities of hour and 90-minute network shows—has been dissipated.

It was a head-splitter to try to find sufficient time in the syndication route for anything above the traditional 30 - minute format. Hardly anyone, though, looked to the diminishing stockpile of features, the gaping holes in the local stations' logs, if the oldie cinematics would not be replaced.

But now with the last of the libraries being unloaded, the Paramount pix handled by MCA TV, station managers from N. Y. to L. A. are "blue-skying" the possibilities of replacement programming. Some of the tentative proposals carry far-reaching implications for both the tv and motion picture industries.

Westinghouse Broadcasting's Dick Pack, program manager for the o&o's sees the need for "featurettes." Acknowledging there are outstanding union problems, he feels that Hollywood could turn out smaller budgeted motion pictures which would have a run in theatres and then be turned over shortly thereafter for tv distribution. The combination of a theatrical run and tv distribution could make it economically feasible.

Of course, one big stumbling block at this time is the failure of studios and the Hollywood talent guilds to come to an agreement on residual payments on pictures made after the cut-off date of August, '48.

But there could be a lot of pressure built up between now and three years hence, when the features on tv drought should be sorely felt, for effecting a residual payment agreement.

In the meantime, the hour long "Wagon Train," "Perry Mason," "Cimarron City," the taped "Playhouse 90" shows and the taped "Pursuit" could be building up residual values hardly anticipated when the projects were initiated. The nets and the producers of 60-minute and longer shows, whether on film or tape, could be building up vaults. The winners in these vaults, such as Jackie Gleason's "Time of Your Life," on tape, could have a life, as long as the old theatrical release of "Johnny Belinda," starring Lew Ayres and Jane Wyman, now playing the "Movie, U.S.A." tv circuit.

CBS-TV is known to be thinking of syndicating "Playhouse 90" entries. There, too, residual payments must be contended with and a for-

WJBK-TV's $2,000,000 For Paramount Library

Detroit, Oct. 21.

WJBK-TV agreed to shell out over $2,000,000 for a licensing deal on the Paramount library, distributed by MCA-TV. The licensing period on individual pix runs to Jan. 1, 1959.

Purchase gives the station over 1,400 features in its film library.

Unique Deal Gives WNEW-TV Reruns Of WCBS Features

WCBS-TV bought the first few runs of 35 Columbia and Universal features, and, simultaneously, WNEW-TV signed a contract to take the same pictures for a number of additional New York runs beginning at the end of approximately 18 months. It's the first record of a competing station being able to capture reruns from WCBS before they've exhausted most of their local audience potential, and it was aimed at hypoing a weakening rerun market in N. Y.

Two-ply pact is believed the first time additional runs were sold by a tv film distribbery at the same time that first runs were pacted, and it marks a drastic change, especially for WCBS, from the standard longterm contract. WCBS has been buying longterm pictures in order to gain the time necessary to amortize the high cost over several replays. And heretofore, other N. Y. stations were locked out from any reasonably hot feature properties because of WCBS' higher bidding. Some of the WCBS feature contracts are understood to run for five years, many as much as seven to 10 years.

As a consequence, the New York rerun market is slowly burning out, and, meantime, a logjam was created for the feature distribs. Unless some method was found such as the current deal to quicken the release of reruns to other Gotham outlets, there has been the fear that WCBS' competitors would run completely dry on feature product.

An SG official explained that they were willing to take slightly less than the company usually gets for features, in order to hypo the WNEW feature showings, on the assumption that if the Metropolitan Broadcasting station can up its audience returns for a given program slot, it'll ultimately be in the market for higher priced pix. Shirley Temple Series For British Midlands; SG's O'Seas Step-Up Screen Gems' European office, directly after consolidating its operations with the parent Columbia Pictures' London affiliate, inked a deal with British ABC-TV for 13 hourlong "Shirley Temple's Storybook" films for exposure in the Midlands.

Besides the sale, SG in Europe began French dubbing on "Ivanhoe," series playing in England since early this year, and German dubbing on another 13 "All Star Theatre" and another 13 "Circus Boy" films.

Meantime, company says it is finalizing plans to begin sale and dubbing on the seven new series that SG sold in the U.S. this season. With a dozen shows now in production here, the consolidation with Columbia Pictures Ltd. in London gives the telefilm subsidiary added personnel and facilities to handle expanded foreign sales.

Bardot's 'Balzac' A Hot TV Item

Station film buyers like Brigitte Bardot.

"Please Mr. Balzac," French import dubbed in the U. S. starring the sexy Gallic charmer, is one of the hottest properties in the Flamingo Telefilm catalog. Although the pic cannot be televised uhtil the summer of '59, it's already inked in over 50 markets.

As sales agent for Distributors Corp. of America, Flamingo is leasing 50 features to tv stations, under a delayed telecasting agreement, keyed to the completion of theatrical runs.

Others in the catalog include "The Baby and the Battleship," starring John Mills; "Loser Takes All," starring Rossano Brazzi; "Silken Affair," David Niven; and "Devil's General," Curt Jurgens, These, among others, have been sold in various markets for telecasting in the fall or winter of 1959. In addition, several of Flamingo's most recent acquisitions which have not yet been released theatrically, will be seen on tv in two or three years.

• ON NBC 4 OF THE TOP 5 SHOWS; A PLURALITY OF THE TOP 10, OF THE TOP 15, OF THE TOP 25 • TOTAL VIEWING UP PEOPLE WATCHING MORE TV ON MORE SETS THAN EVER. WITH FALL PROGRAM SCHEDULES IN FULL SWING, MORE OF THEM NOW WATCHING NBC

"The President cannot be disturbed!"

On November 9, 1916, Charles Evans Hughes retired believing he was President-elect of the United States. While he slept, late returns re-elected Woodrow Wilson. But early the next morning, a reporter seeking Mr. Hughes was told "the President" could not be disturbed.

"Well," responded the reporter, "when he wakes up, tell him he is no longer President."

In the first week of October 1958, on the basis of early Trendex returns in television's annual Fall audience "election," victory claims were being run up every flagpole on Madison Avenue. They stemmed from Trendex returns on little more than half of the season's new network schedules, and some of the claims would have done a precinct captain proud. (You can prove almost anything if you take $^{37}/_{52\,nds}$ or $^{47}/_{65\,ths}$ of a whole.)

Now the latest Trendex reports are in, covering nighttime television for the week of October 8-14. This is the first week in which all three networks reached virtually full program strength. It gives the first inkling that the tremendous audience switch which carried NBC into Number One competitive position last season is accelerating this season. By almost any criterion, taking the schedule as a whole, NBC commands audience supremacy.

Of course, this election will keep right on going all season, and it's far too soon for anyone to hoist a final victory flag. But it's not too soon for us to join Trendex in spotting a landslide victory for all television, and to congratulate our competitors for helping to win it. Thanks to the fresh excitement generated by the new Fall schedules on all networks, more Americans are spending more time watching more television than ever before.

NBC TELEVISION NETWORK

OPEN END
With David Susskind; Fanny Hurst, Gypsy Rose Lee, Jo Mielziner, June Havoc, William Shatner, France Nuyen, Denise Darcel, Jim Moran, David Merrick, others Producer: Jose Vega
Director: Don Luftig
Tues., 11 p.m.
WNTA-TV, Newark

Next time he has a chance to take his tv program, "Open End," to a post-mortem theatre party, David Susskind had better think twice. Except for maybe 15 minutes of upbeat tv, which might have been stretched into perhaps three times that much under less distracting and less restrictive circumstances, the show ran aground on a lot of repetitive and effete show biz talk.

"Open End" was initiated on WNTA-TV on Tuesday (14), the same night "The World of Suzie Wong" premiered on Broadway. Actually, it was the occasion of a triple premiere, since it launched tv-theatrical-motion picture producer Susskind on a sideline career as video interviewer. Since the articulate Susskind had gained an industry reputation as a controversial figure, onlookers were naturally led to expect controversy. But he eschewed tough talk and bogged down at once in a series of interviews with persons who, in the main, had nothing more substantial to offer than curtness or the common bond of nervous expectancy (drama reviews were due) and mutual admiration. It went on this way for about 45 minutes, and then Susskind struck upon William Shatner, who, though co-starred in "Suzie," was more interested in talking about things beyond the prescribed sphere, and with that Susskind for the first time warmed to his job. It was a neat 10 or 15 minutes with Shatner. By that time, Susskind had put his sense of humor to work, and began gently to needle the next guest, Denise Darcel, and affably joust with flack Jim Moran. However, the joyful touch disappeared when David Merrick, "Suzie's" producer appeared, and for some reason the tv program returned to the earlier lustreless level.

A basic tactical error seems to be behind the poor initial showing of "Open End," which was the collaborative inspiration of Susskind and Ted Cott, WNTA bossman. They shunned more substantial topics, which Susskind proved he could handle those nights he substituted on WMCA radio for veteran interviewer Barry Gray, and favored an opportunity to capitalize on the glitter of an opening night bash. Not only did this expose Susskind to an overly generous amount of "everybody-is-great" blah, but when the party turned into a wake for "Wong," Susskind (he learned too late) had put himself right in the middle of an embarassing mix-up. As the early Atkinson review came in by phone from scouts apparently stationed at the N.Y. Times, Susskind tried to summarize the critique. It was a terrible spot to be in when he realized it was a pan, and it was even worse for the members of the "Suzie" company who happened to be on camera as this and later reviews were repeated.

In the blueprint stage, "Open End" was supplied by Susskind and Cott with kind of a built-in critical faculty: When the show is going slowly, then Susskind has the right to end it as soon as he likes; when it's going well, he can stretch it the night through (since "Open End" is the last scheduled WNTA program of the night. But unfortunately they decided to wait for the a.m. journalistic judgements.

A bright and personable guy like Susskind, with a bagful of interesting things to say, should give himself a better opportunity to say them. Art.

Playhouse 90

"The Long March" was an interesting "Playhouse 90" from the intellectual and technical standpoints. But it fell short of the mark as a drama on several counts, the principal ones being a fuzzy characterization in the key role by Jack Carson and a failure to build the kind of climactic impact that the story requires.

As an intellectual premise, the Roger O. Hirson adaptation of William Styron's story was provocative. It dealt with the rebellion against the special kind of conformity that characterizes the military and particularly the Marine Corps. Carson, as a reservist captain called up for the Korean war, is a decent sympathetic type who can't bring himself to act as a spit-and-polish martinet, and he finally rebels against the by-the-book rigidity of the corps, personified by a toughminded battalion commander, Sterling Hayden.

The rebellion is centered about a forced march which Hayden orders for the end of a two-day field problem. Carson, after arguing futilely against the 36-mile march and its climactic scaling of the ridge, finally does a turnabout flip and vows he and his company will finish it to a man. When Hayden finally rules against scaling the ridge because of the danger landslides, Carson has become so fanatical about it that he goes ahead on his own, causing the death of one of his men and a subsequent court-martial for himself.

Production was technically interesting because it combined live production, a little film and a lot of pre-taping done on location—probably the first dramatic location taping ever done for a network show. To a great extent, the location work was unsatisfactory and explains the inability of director Delbert Mann to build to that strong climax. Pictures of the hardships of the march were suggestive rather than forceful in portraying the grueling horror of the march, and the 13-hour period was flashed through too quickly to properly develop the change in Carson from rebel to hysterical fanatic. The buildup was just too sketchy to justify the change in character, and the outdoor reelage impressionistic rather than detailed, which didn't help the impact either.

Carson's performance was in some respects a puzzling one. His rendition of the good-guy officer was fine, but he didn't quite bring the breakup off convincingly. Perhaps it was largely due to the script, with the too-quick transition. Perhaps also to the effect of a pair of sub-plots woven through the story, particularly the relationship between him and his French wife, a model who plainly doesn't give a darn about him. In stacking the cards too carefully, the script made too much of a case, and the conviction was lacking.

But Carson worked hard at his role, and in its physical aspects, at least, turning in a whale of a job. It was in the key scenes, however, that either he or the script or the direction missed. Hayden gave one of his tough, purposeful portrayals as the martinet; Rod Taylor was forceful as Carson's exec officer, torn between his play-it-by-the-rules personality and his admiration of Carson; Mona Freeman was good in a somewhat irrelevant role as Taylor's girlfriend; Jacqueline Beer carried off the role of Carson's wife nicely. James Congden as the private who gets killed was good, as were Shirley Knight, Jason Wingreen, Harvey Stevens and Fletcher Allen in minor roles.

With the proper care and time that filming allows, "The Long March" might have made a good motion picture—in fact, producer Fred Coe borrowed a screen treatment that Robert Alan Aurthur had prepared for United Artists. But within the limitation and confines of the live production, and with too much time allotted the minor subplots and not enough the grueling climax, "The Long March" didn't quite come off as a tv'er. Chan

Encounter

"The Flower in the Rock" was the rather obscure title of this Canadian Broadcasting Corp. show in the "Encounter" series, fed to ABC-TV "live" from Toronto. Well acted, it had about it an unreal air that spoiled the required illusion and robbed it of emotional impact.

Best thing about it was Frances Hyland, a very attractive actress who managed to convey a feeling of her trials and tribulations without going overboard on the maudlin side. The Joseph Schull script told about a stern British industrialist who sent his fun-loving son and daughter-in-law to farm in Canada. Son turned into a drunkard plotting revenge on the father, being rude to the neighbors and getting to hate his wife.

Being told in flashback, story had the son — played by Joseph Shaw—murdered by the wife, with her friend Douglas Rain, taking the rap until, in the end, he was told Miss Hyland had died and admitted the murder.

Show overplayed, which was largely due to overemphasis in the script. Miss Hyland, who has an expressive face, was touching in the role of the tortured and long-suffering wife. Ivor Barry played the stern industrialist-father, opposed to his son's marriage and contemptuous of his weakness. Douglas Rain, looking very much like a young John Mills, portrayed Miss Hyland's friend, the implication being he fell in love with her. William Needles was okay as the local constable.

Paul Almond produced the show and directed it without much imagination or real sense for suspense. The Schull script was too concerned with establishing its characters to maintain dramatic unity. Hift.

Perry Como Show

This show failed to use two of its guest stars, Gretchen Wyler and Ralph Bellamy, to maximum advantage on last Saturday night's (18) NBC-TV stanza. Bellamy did a one-minute bit from his "Sunrise at Campobello" legiter after being used as a shill through the first half of the show to introduce the other guests. Some of the byplay between Como and Bellamy, while the latter was making up, was on the cute side and was not in tune with the F.D.R. personality Bellamy was to play. Miss Wyler was completely wasted in a "Sleeping Beauty" ballet parody.

As a straight song session, however, this show remains tops. Como is still plugging both sides of his latest RCA Victor disk release, "Mandolins In The Moonlight" and "Love Makes The World Go Round," both nifty songs which he delivered among others in standout style with an assist from the Ray Charles chorus. Eydie Gorme also scored big with her rousing "Johnny One-Note" number after ballading "Hello, Young Lovers." For the younger set, Robin Luke, a current jukebox fave from Hawaii, did his "Suzie Darling" hit in pleasing style. The final quarter-hour was a showcase for songwriter Jule Styne's catalog. A medley of a dozen or so of his songs were delivered by Como and guests in a brightly produced routine.

Plugs for the various sponsors, including RCA Whirlpool, Kleenex and Chemstrand, were liberally scattered throughout. Herm.

Eddie Fisher

Almost everything that runs on wheels was given a melodic spin on last Tuesday night's Eddie Fisher Burbank gambol to roll up the whole ball of wax. As a peg to keep the story line moving it served its purpose but the skein snapped too often for a smooth runoff. Only Fisher's singing and the comicalities of Red Buttons rose above the imaginative lack in staging and the dearth of material to enliven the laugh line.

The show's pace at times sped so fast as to border on production bedlam. At the finish it became a complete shambles when Jerry Lewis broke up Fisher and everyone else by his physical contortions that even had him rolling on the floor. Fisher tried to salvage something out of the close-off but Lewis was not to be denied the red-lighted camera. Confusion was so rampant that Fisher had trouble reading the cue cards and those who put the show together can blame Lewis for being denied their credits in the closing crawl. Professional courtesy to the star of the show went out the window. The audience screamed at Lewis' break-up antics to the total disregard of Fisher, who seemed annoyed at such unsporting intrusion.

It was perhaps one of the noisiest shows of the young season, considerably abetted by guestar Betty Hutton, who was raucously vocal and too intimately attentive to Fisher. The smooching and break-ups were overdone. Through it all Fisher tried to keep the show on keel but made port only after a rough voyage. He bore down on his songs and made them a musical delight but it wasn't enough to balance off the other disturbing factors. Buttons didn't have much to do in the German U-boat bit and it foundered because of over-length.

The writers took the easy way out on the young comic, fighting for a comeback, and revived his "ho ho, hee hee" hopping around. His dialect impressions touched off the show's best laughs but this was a studio audience that even applauded the commercials. With the right kind of material, Buttons could get back in the electronic running.

If the show didn't stand off the competition of westerns the fault can't be laid to Fisher. Producer George Englund, directors Englund and Grey Lockwood and writers Ken Englund and Bobby O'Brien didn't whip up much of a show. They should have pulled the camera away from Lewis and focus on Fisher to save the show from complete collapse. Production was shoddy and uninspired. Helm.

Ed Sullivan Show

Ed Sullivan's demonstration on behalf of Kodak failed to get off the ground despite the general wealth of talent involved. The samplings provided by most of the acts weren't sufficient to ingratiate, there was a spot or two of which the less said about the better.

The major development on this show was by magico Marvin Roy who manipulated lighted electric bulbs with entertaining and mystifying results. He's a new factor on the tele circuits and this demonstration should open many new avenues of employment to him.

Tony Martin also got a full inning and therefore came off better than most turns with two tunes and a clary interlude. Another big factor was Jack E. Leonard whose remarks on various and sundry subjects didn't hit all the time, but there were some lines that left the customers reeling.

A moment of charm and nostalgia was by Benny Fields & Blossom Seeley, in their one number, "Rosie" with some handsome production in back of them. Also in the man and wife category Xavier Cugat & Abbe Lane did okay in the song and batoning field. There were some sundry items such as Leonard & Leonard, Negro tapsters who opened okay and Bennett & Patterson who did a highly unfunny bit. Dolores Vargas & Batista passed muster in a brief flamenco bit with the male providing guitar accomps. Roger Williams in his two spots at the piano didn't have his usual zing.

A very unnecessary bit was the showing of a sequence from "Roots of Heaven." There wasn't time for the full presentation and that which was shown didn't make sense. Jose.

RATE THE RECORDS
With Bob Brown, guests
60 Mins., Sat.; 6 p.m.
WNTA-TV, Newark

This show is for the teenagers. For those in the studio audience it's a combination discussion and dance session. The kids make with the footwork while records are being played and also comment on various turntable offerings which are in the current pop groove.

A guest panel is also on hand to discuss the merits of various recordings. On last Saturday's (18) show, the panel comprised singers Tommy Edwards and Lou Monte, who shared the rating spot with a different teenager for each of the records to be judged.

The juves appeared to enjoy themselves and the plug value for the various disks spotted is tremendous. Also, the guest artists get the full promotion treatment, including the spotlighting of their own recordings.

Besides voicing their opinion on certain platters, the youngsters are also given an opportunity to ask questions of the guesters. The rating gimmick, incidentally, ties in with the system used by a trade publication in its evaluation of records.

Edwards and Monte handled themselves well, while Bob Brown emceed pleasantly. Jess.

Rexall Dickering NBC Frances Langford Spec

Rexall, via BBD&O, is negotiating for a one-hour filmed special featuring Frances Langford and flock of other performers over NBC-TV sometime next April.

If deal jells, there'll be options on other Langford productions made by Charles Wick. Initial production also has Bob Hope, Hugh O'Brien, Julie London, Edgar Bergen and Charlie McCarthy, and George Sanders.

THE UNCLE AL SHOW
With Al Lewis, Wanda Lewis, Janet Greene, Larry Smith
Producer: Al Lewis
Director: Mike Tangi
Writer: Al Lewis
60 Mins.; Sat., 11 a.m.
PARTICIPATING
ABC-TV, from Cincinnati

Al Lewis, the "Uncle Al" of this three-ring moppet show, sure has a busy time of it. So does everyone else on the hour-long outing, including the small fry who are on camera for the entire length of the program.

What the show appears to be lacking is some focus, some pauses to catch your breath and experience what's going on. But youngsters, from the ages of two to seven for whom the show is aimed, may feel differently. They have inexhaustible energy and sometimes care little about rhyme and reason.

Net is picking up the outing from WCPO-TV, Cincinnati, where it appears to be a local regular. On Saturday's (18) episode, Uncle Al, sporting a snappy strawhat and playing the accordion, sang many moppet songs, led the on stage kids in some dancing and shennanigans. He was assisted by Wanda Lewis, as Captain Windy, and Janet Greene, as Cinderella. Both made nice contributions. Larry Smith worked the wide assortment of puppets.

The kids at the on-stage party made fetching pictures, as they danced, sang and carried on. It should have warmed them up for that afternoon nap. They must have had a tiring hour. Horo.

FOR THE PEOPLE
With Leon Pearson
Producer: Ben Hudelson
Director: Dan Peters
30 Mins.; Sun., 11:30 a.m.
WRCA-TV, from New York

The half-million aliens in the Gotham area are the potential viewers of this new and important public service series of 10 programs on American history. Undoubtedly a potential American citizen, determined to get his citizenship papers, could learn from watching "For the People" but the going would indeed be rugged.

Leon Pearson is the narrator of the program but thus far his visual aids and the tenor of his remarks have certainly not been geared to the comprehension level of many applicants for citizenship. "For the People," as caught on the preem show, appears to be pitched on too high a language level. The basic facts of American history, in this instance, should be reduced to more elementary story telling and in a vocabulary capable of understanding among the less literate seeking aid toward naturalization.

What Pearson had to say about the American colonies, the Boston Tea Party, the origins of the Declaration of Independence, Samuel Adams, Paul Revere, Tom Paine, Abraham Lincoln, et al, was important but it was couched too loftily.

If Pearson will come down in his sentence structure, "For the People" will undoubtedly reach far more citizens-to-be. Rans.

YOUNG AUDIENCES
With The Contemporary Brass Quintet; David Randolph, host
Director: Anthony Farrar
60 Mins., Sun., 4 p.m.
WCBS-TV, N. Y.

First of six concerts designed to create an interest in good music on the part of school children began Sunday afternoon (19) via WCBS-TV, N. Y., and the hour-long production can be termed a resounding success on the basis of the studio audience's reaction. Comprising fifth and sixth graders, the studio guests beat time with the music, asked questions and showed a genuine interest in what makes the Contemporary Brass Quintet tick.

All six concerts are being produced by Young Audiences Inc., a non-profit organization dedicated to bringing youngsters into contact with good music, played by professional musicians. Kickoff program had members of the Quintet explaining use and operation of their respective brass instruments. "They're not hard to play at all," declared tuba player Herbert Wechselblatt, "as long as you enjoy it." On the whole it was an informative, lively session. Next week string instruments will be explained.

Concert series is being presented jointly by WCBS-TV and Young Audiences Inc. in association with the New York City Board of Education. At show's windup host David Randolph made a polite pitch for public contributions to help YAI continue its cultural program. Gilb.

LITTLE WOMEN
With Jeannie Carson, Margaret O'Brien, Florence Henderson, Zina Bethune, Rise Stevens, Bill Hayes, Joel Grey, Roland Winters, others
Exec Producer: David Susskind
Producer: Albert Selden
Music: Richard Adler
Writer: Wilson Lehr (from the novel by Louisa May Alcott)
Director: William Corrigan
Choreographer: John Butler
60 Mins., Thurs. (16), 8:30 p.m.
SHEAFFER PEN CO.
CBS-TV, from New York
(BBD&O)

David Susskind's teleproduction of "Little Women" was sugar and spice and many things nice but paradoxically bland for all of it.

Trimmed as it was for the hour's length, and garnished besides with eight songs from Richard Adler's fruitful cupboard (not to count the reprises), Louisa May Alcott's eye-watering evergreen for youngsters emerged on the picture tube as a fluffy petit fours for dainty palates, with not much to sink the choppers into. That must have been as true for children as it was for adults.

It did not matter, towards the end of the play, that young Beth did not die as Miss Alcott had committed her to in the book's most memorable scene. Even by this time there was no audience involvement with the character—no reflection on Margaret O'Brien, who did her tearful best—anymore than there was incisive delineation of her sisters, with the possible exception of Jo. In this case it clearly reflected on the talents of Jeannie Carson, who made herself dear by dint of spirit and showman's projection. She was a delight to watch, her incandescent personality enlivening every one of her scenes.

But to the basic problem, it was simply that the show sought to accomplish too much in a relatively small confine of time and, as an ironic result, accomplished hardly anything of consequence. In its haste to tell the story and to pace comfortable lead-ins to the songs, the script left the characters to fend for themselves; and before the show had progressed very far, the viewer found himself with nothing or no one to be concerned over.

Similarly, William Corrigan's effort at clean direction resulted in static blocking that gave the production the flavor (or lack of it) of something sterile.

Nor did Adler's straightlaced songs catch fire for their general tunelessness, although his lyrics often had charm. Only the ballad "Love I Mean" came off as a candidate for the pops, and "Dance, Why Not?" lent itself to a euphoric production number choreographed by John Butler.

Because of the brevity of scenes, much good talent was called on to make only token contributions. Opera star Rise Stevens handled her dramatic bits capably, but she had a single lackluster number that could have been handled as effectively by countless performers of lesser gift. Florence Henderson and Zina Bethune were all right in flimsy parts that made scarce demands, and Bill Hayes was properly wooden in a part that called for woodeness. Joel Grey had a pleasant flash or two, as did Roland Winters and the Sheaffer commercial. Les.

CROSS-CANADA HIT PARADE
With Wally Koster, Joyce Hahn, Phyllis Marshall, Gino Silvi Singers, Bert Niosi Orch; Guestars, Kirby Stone Four; Paul Anka
Producer-Director: Stan Harris
Writers: Ray Jessel, Ron Krans
30 Mins.; Mon., 8:30 p.m.
PHILISHAVE
CBC-TV, from Toronto
(Erwin-Wasey)

Introducing a theatre-in-the-round technique with an audience of over 400, this obviating costly sets, Stan Harris, producer-director of "Cross-Canada Hit Parade," has given the program an entirely new format which should cut down production costs while not militating against the fast-moving show's success. With the series now in its fourth season, Harris plans to alternate stars of records and stars of albums, plus such regulars of the past as Wally Koster, Joyce Hahn, Phyllis Marshall and the Bert Niosi band. Harris is also in for 39 weeks over 40 coast-to-coast stations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp., plus a new sponsor.

On new production format, the producer has injected needed speed into his "Trans-Canada Hit Parade." This has Wally Koster in as emcee replacing Austin Willis (who is in a London play), with Koster into a wham opening in the teeoff of "Volare" and then into The Kirby Stone Four (boys in dinner jackets) for their album medley of "Baubles and Bangles" in swing style. With neat backgrounding of Bert Niosi's big band, singing quartet come back for "Zing Go the Strings of My Heart," again in bouncy style.

"Tea for Two," in cha-cha style, had the Bert Niosi orch back for a hot session, plus his four-trumpet section for stepout work, with Niosi on for a clarinet solo that had the audience enthusiastic. Phyllis Marshall had one number, "The Days the Rains Came," which she sang in dramatic ballad style; with Joyce Hahn (in a new soft hair-do as different from her former bangs of last season) on for a swift "Hula Hoop Song" with four youngsters doing a background of swirling hoops and body contortions.

Guestars were Tommy Edwards for his "Many a Time" and "It's All in the Game," plus Paul Anka for his "Diane" and "You are My Destiny," both having the background of the Gino Silvi Singers and the Bert Niosi band. It was a rousing teeoff, with all artists in good voice. MoStay.

BOB HOPE BUICK SHOW
With Joan Crawford, Fernandel, Marion Ryan, Bernard Bros., Robert Strauss, Hillary Brook, others; Les Brown orch
Producer: Jack Hope
Directors: Bill Ward, Jerry Hopper
Writers: Bill Larkin, Mort Lachman, Lester White, John Rapp
60 Mins., Tues. (14), 9 p.m.
BUICK
NBC-TV, from Hollywood
(McCann-Erickson)

After a temporary digression in the form of last month's "Roberta," Bob Hope was back in clicko form in his second NBC-TV Buick special of the season.

This hour was a study in contrasts; Hope's opening monolog was as topical, fresh and up-to-date as today's headlines, while the sketches that followed with Joan Crawford and Fernandel were as old-hat as the Orpheum circuit. But such is the nature of Hope's having-a-ball delivery of even the most ancient routine that it emerged as great fun all the way down the line.

Taking it from the top, Hope's unusually long—about 12 minutes — opening monolog touched on everything from the moon rocket to Ike's golf and the current election campaign, and his irreverence was matched by the accuracy of his barbs. As one of the few comics who are willing to be topical—or can get away with it — Hope achieves a sort of elder-statesman-of-comedy status—they just don't make 'em like that anymore.

Then followed Miss Crawford's sketch, unfortunately marred by picture trouble — at least on the western feed—a good half of the way. (By this time, one would think NBC would have a stand-by tape on hand for just such an emergency.) Hope's writing staff used a pair of old gags, the gimmick that after 12 years, the marriage between Hope and Miss Crawford isn't legal, and the use of the tv repairman (remember when it was the Hoover vacuum salesman?) as the unwitting foil for the make-him-jealous bit.

Hope and Miss Crawford made the turn fun all the way through, with Robert Strauss also clicking as the repairman. Miss Crawford was obviously at ease in the pre-taped session, and generated the kind of good-humored s.a. that registered strongly. In the show's other major sketch, it was Hope and Fernandel in the "tourist and the waiter" bit, which Hope unblushingly identified as a standard. His lack of pretention, incidentally, about his material in itself gives the routines a lift. Here again, it was old hat, but the irrepressible Hope's clowning and the fine pantomimic hand of Fernandel gave it a fine fun flavor.

Bernard Bros. were on for a solid record panto, than worked into the time-honored panto bit wherein one of them, operating behind Hope's back, identifies his hair, teeth and eyes as false. Hope made the perfect straightman, and the Bernards gave the turn a wonderfully funny whirl. Marion Ryan, the British chirp, turned in a good version of her "Love Me" disk, and Hope and Fernandel exploited the language barrier with a takeoff on a couple of bilingual tunes.

Writing team of Bill Larkin, Mort Lachman, Lester White and John Rapp supplied Hope & Co. with plenty of good material, while Bill Ward's direction kept a zingy pace. Jerry Hopper directed Miss Crawford's sketch equally well. One technical point; in pre-taping segments of the show separately, lighting levels of the different tapes didn't match, and the transitions were somewhat uncomfortable. Chan

JERRY LEWIS SHOW
With Helen Traubel, Wiere Bros.
Producer: Ernest D. Glucksman
Director: Jack Shea
Writers: Mel Brooks, Danny Simon, Harry Crane, Lewis
Musical Director: Walter Scharf
Choreographer: Nick Castle
60 Mins., Sat. (18) 9 p.m.
TIMEX
NBC-TV, from Hollywood (color)
(Peck)

Jerry Lewis got off to a good start in his first special of the season but lost his way before the program was more than 10 minutes old. His next special is due Dec. 10 and if he can keep up the calibre of the first two bits he ought to have a knockout. Total effect of the opener, however, was a missout.

Show opened briskly with a slick hoofing routine parodying the June Taylor styling on the Jackie Gleason show. With Patti Thomas leading the way with missteps and shaky legs, routine brought in a strong round of yocks. Then came Lewis in the gem of vignette in which he plays a sad sack against whom the elements have a private grudge. When it rains, it rains on no one but him. And the tag in which he finds a sad sackess in a film house, whom the rain has chosen, too, was a socko clincher. It played perfectly even with the technical hazards.

Rest of the show, though, was routine variety fare. Helen Traubel was less than inspiring in her rundown of "I Believe" and was a little silly in her duet with Lewis on "Black Magic," miming Louis Prima and Keely Smith, but it had its moments. The Wiere Bros., too, didn't quite come off in their brief fiddling affair. Lewis had the makings of a good idea in a choreographic attempt to satirize tv commercials but it went on too long and his audience participation stint never got to mean anything. Walter Scharf's musical backing was neat as was Nick Castle's choreo efforts.

Milton Berle returned Jerry Lewis' visit to his show the previous Wednesday by coming on to give Lewis a statuette kudo from fan mag. That award bit is a tv habit that should be done away with pronto. It's not interesting or entertaining and only serves to plug the mag. Gros.

ALLISON'S WONDERLAND
With Joe Allison, emcee; Ginny Jackson, Bill Ewing, Johnny Duffy, others Producer-director: Don Whitman
60 Mins., Mon.-thru-Fri., 7:30 a.m.
KABC-TV, from Hollywood

The old plugola managed to reduce "Allison's Wonderland" to a poor substitute for slumberland in its first early morning outing on KABC-TV. The 7:30 a.m. kickoff hour didn't deter that hardy breed of wolves seeking a free plug from showing up to turn this basically acceptable idea of a show into a tedious session of reciprocal backslapping. In between all the dull accolades that were exchanged, enough business of a somewhat entertaining nature transpired to justify enlivening the picture tube for those few who spurn radio's traditional function as a breakfast table medium.

Host Joe Allison is a gracious emcee who can maneuver a pencil across a drawing board and take a turn at vocalizing with equal relish. Other regulars are Ginny Jackson, a fresh and wholesome girl-Monday-thru-Friday who also sings; newsman Bill Ewing; and Johnny Duffy and his instrumental trio, to provide the sharps and flats when needed. On hand to launch the show were the venerable Clark Sisters, Margie Rayburn and Sonny James, all of whom listened to their records, then engaged in very uninspired chatter with Allison. A brief fashion show, vocals by Allison and Miss Jackson, and time and weather information rounded out the proceeding. It all amounts to a routine and unpretentious hour, the most admirable facet of which is the ability of those involved to appear bright and willing at a time when most entertainers are sleeping off the previous night's pursuits.

Producer-director Don Whitman kept the cameras hopping at a pace sufficient to make the show reasonably lively, while art director George Smith served up some interesting illustrations as backdrops to make up for the lack of action. If nothing else, the entry serves as a clock for those rushing off to work, with the correct time superimposed on the screen.

However, on the basis of its first showing, this new program offers little in the way of an excuse for abandoning the old radio receiver as an early a.m. companion. Tube.

GINGER ROGERS SHOW
(Pontiac Parade of Stars)
With Ray Bolger, Ritz Bros, Nelson Riddle orch, others Producer-Director: Bob Banner
Writer: Joe Stein
60 Mins.; Wed. (15), 10 p.m.
PONTIAC
CBS-TV, from H'wood
(McManus, John & Adams)

Considering the marquee values, the "Ginger Rogers Show," Pontiac's initial special of the new tv season on CBS-TV last Wed. night, didn't quite make it as an allround qualitative entry. In these days when finesse and sureness trademark these month-to-get-ready tv specials, a so-so show isn't good enough. To say that Miss Rogers' hour display wasn't bad is to damn with faint praise. Yet in the final analysis it was no better than "not bad."

As a vet trouper who's been through the show biz wars, Miss Rogers retains some class and style. In voice and terps these days she's outclassed by many who have come up since. Thus the victory lies in recapturing the remnants of the stardust that once glistened so brilliantly. And it's here, among other things, where producer Bob Banner (ex-Dinah Shore producer) failed to play it for maximum values. Toward the end, some of it came out (in some of the peak moments of the show) when Miss Rogers engaged in some "memorabilia on the hoof" in which, to an appropriate and ironic "You Can't Take That Away From Me" motif, she reprised some of the more fetching turns dating back to the Astaire-Rogers theatrical specs. Even as a "teaser" which carried the suggestion "you can see the real thing on the 'Late Shows' around the country," it still bore the earmarks of class and distinction.

Miss Rogers had as guestars Ray Bolger and the Ritz Bros. The latter, when showcased within their proper orbit of entertainment, are unquestionably tops on the zany circuit. But here it was a case of "miscasting," their buffoonery (a cutup on the westerns) being peculiarly out of tempo with the remainder of the production.

Nor was Bolger "played" for maximum results. True he had his innings in the soft shoe department (and a pleasure it was to watch) and again he clicked with a bowler-&-umbrella hoofing bit (backed by six gals) that captured the genuine RB stamp. But by the time he and Miss Rogers suffered through the opening County Fair production number and later duo'd their way through some joint impressions of emcees and other tv personalities, fully half the show was taken up by inferior material.

Production as a whole needs more imagination. (Much more, is seemed, went into the Pontiac commercials, which were dressed up to "junior spec" proportions). The show itself was too stereotype. It was not one of Banner's better efforts. Rose.

DR. I. Q.
With Tom Kennedy, emcee; Kay Christopher, Mimi Walters, others
Producer: Harfield Weedin
30 Mins., Mon.-thru-Fri., 2:30 p.m.
KABC-TV, from Hollywood

At a time when quizzers are reeling from investigations and disclosures of naughty goings-on, KABC-TV has emerged with a revival of the granddaddy of them all. "Dr. I.Q." The fact that these question-and-answer sessions are under close scrutiny won't tamper with the appeal of this one. "Dr. I.Q.," hampered not at all in its transition from radio to video, is a bright, fast-paced half-hour in which silver dollars are spread so thin among the winners that it cannot possibly be suspect.

The principal appeal of this show is its lightning pace. Questions are fired thick and fast by the new doctor, Tom Kennedy, and there's no monkey business involved, no unwieldy gimmicks resorted to, no lengthy explanations, no patient waits for answers. Queries range from the ordinary to the absurd, and answers are supplied by the studio audience as the camera surveys its diversified emotions.

All the "special questions" of the original are still around, including the "famous quotations question" and "the thought twister." The familiar call, "I have a lady, doctor," still signifies fun and a smattering of knowledge. Even a special balcony has been erected by the station so that the good doctor can have a lady up there too.

Kennedy is a nimble-witted fellow and that's a prime requisite for his new role of "the mental banker." He does an excellent job throughout, aided by Kay Christopher and Mimi Walters, a handsome pair of roving assistants. Harfield Weedin has produced an enjoyable daytime show. Tube.

AN EVENING WITH ASTAIRE
With Fred Astaire, Barrie Chase, Jonah Jones Quartet, David Rose orch, others Producer-Director: Bud Yorkin
Choreographer: Hermes Pan
Special Material: Herbert Baker
60 Mins., Fri. (17), 9 p.m.
CHRYSLER
NBC-TV, from H'wood (color)
(Leo Burnett)

Fred Astaire's live tv debut on last Friday nights (17) Chrysler-sponsored special on NBC-TV was one of the new season's more exciting events, not only in promise but in performance. It had c-l-a-s-s written all across its 60-minute format. Unlike many another tv show, "An Evening With Astaire" simply got down to the business of turning out a highly professional and refreshing hour of entertainment without resorting to trivia or superfluous folderol to help push the hour along. Instead, this 60-minute display (whether viewed in tint or black-and white) was vested with polish and performance of a high order to match the '59 models (and the commercials) of its sponsor.

Under Bud Yorkin's exacting direction and production, Astaire and his troupe of skilled performers, including his lovely and talented partner, Barrie Chase (also making her tv bow); the Jonah Jones quartet and a full-bodied David Rose orch backgrounding, maintained balance and pace, with a fine blending of the show's nine production numbers of song and dance. There was no frenzy about any of it; smartness, skill and exactness with an imaginative use of talents keynoted the hour, with a spacious decor of simplicity always in keeping with the tenor of the production.

But above all there was Astaire to set the tone and the style as he sparked the proceedings both in the hoofing and the vocal departments. Whether he was reprising a dozen or so of the show tunes with which he's been identified through the years going back to Gershwin's "Lady Be Good"; whether he was "batoning" his group of dancers, broken down into small units, into a uniquely distinctive choreographic pattern for an utterly charming opening number called "Svengali," whether Astaire and Miss Chase as a twosome were bestowing a special kind of spell and hoofing magic on their own interpretation of "St. James Infirmary" to the accompaniment of a fascinating offstage Jonah Jones trumpet; or whether it was a nimble-footed, white tie-top hatted Astaire in solo putting a neat pink ribbon and voucher of approval on the whole hour package in an effective song-and-dance finale with "Isn't This A Lovely Day"—here was an all-too fleeting 60 minutes which saw an upper case kind of show biz returning to tv.

There are others who may have preferred Astaire's conception of "Man With the Blues" as he and Miss Chase and the dancing group translated a Dave Rose original into a moody, lyrical vignette; or the "Change Partners" bit which demonstrated Miss Chase's ability to hold her own with Astaire. But whatever the preferences, the three-way collaborative teamup of Astaire, Bud Yorkin and choreographer Hermes Pan gave the whole a style and distinction.

It's a sad commentary on a medium where outstanding event comes along so infrequently that there is a tendency to exaggerate its importance and pin a "classic" tag on it. "An Evening With Astaire" may not have been a classic, but until the real thing comes along, it filled the bill admirably Rose.

JOHNS HOPKINS FILE 7
With Milton Eisenhower, Donald H. Andrews, guests; Lynn Poole, host Producer: Poole
Director: Ed Fryer
Writers-Assoc. directors: James Chimbidis, David G. Bell, Walter Mills Jr.
30 Mins., Sun., 11:30 a.m.
ABC-TV, from Baltimore

Johns Hopkins prof Dr. Donald H. Andrews dressed up a half-hour introduction to atomic physics in a lot of visual finery, including Arthur Murray dancers. Program was a titillating study of what the doctor called "molecular spin and dance" or the movement of molecules.

Using professional ballroom dancers to demonstrate the interchangeability of the molecules may have been overblowing instruction a bit but, understandably, the Baltimore program wants to expand its audience. Andrews was sufficient as classroom guide, and was backed strongly, dancers apart, by some clever visual laboratory manipulations. The camerawork was alert, aiding the instructor in every possible technical respect. Dr. Milton Eisenhower made a brief opening announcement Art.

In Era of Quick Casualties Agencies Now Alerted to Year-Round Buying Sez Keesely—On Other Ad Fronts

By JACK BERNSTEIN

Nick Keesely, radio-tv director of Lennen & Newell says flatly that "the days of agencymen buying television programs in the spring for the coming fall season is over. Packagers are going to have to be prepared with pilots and live shows ready to roll almost on the spot with longterm contracts no longer being demanded by either the producing companies or the networks.

"Programs are going to be bought all year-around on 13-week deals; agencies and packagers have got to have a 'ready to go show' to fill a weak time slot." Keesely, so far this year had one show knocked from under him—$64,000 Challange"—and with the fall tv season barely off and running his "$64,000 Question" is in rating trouble. On the latter show, both co-sponsors P. Lorillard and Revlon are seeking revisions. On the "Challange" fare Lennen & Newell was faced with the immediate problem of coming up with a replacement and dug "Masquerade Party," an old-line network entry out of mothballs.

Keesely adds that with the rating situation, television is going through one of its most troubled periods. "Ratings are not the complete answer, but the current attitude is if the Trendex is off, make a change quick. As such, ratings are responsible more than ever for program switching.

"It's tremendously difficult to change shows in midstream that are not living up to expectations and are tied down to a longterm commitment. Programs aren't allowed time to develop and either a show piles up a big rating on its first showing or it's in trouble, and almost immediately you have to search out a new format. "Unfortunately, many of the show on the air desire a better rating than they are getting but due to either a weak network program structure on a given day or heavy competition, it's hard to get a show off the ground.

"One of the biggest jobs agencymen have is to keep advertisers from losing confidence while a program is building. Sponsor nervousness is mostly due to the cost of network television and naturally every advertiser wants the highest ratings and the largest share of audiences."

It's not all bad, according to Keesely who says progress isn't made by complacency and both advertisers and agencymen have to keep on their toes to compete in the current television market.

SHORTS: Bryan Houston Agency has launched a personnel development program designed to meet the needs of the advertising industry which through growth calls for 2,100 specialized employees every year. Effective this month, Bryan Houston will pay the total tuition and fees of employees completing professional courses in the advertising-marketing field.

The advertising industry can rest easier now because it's official; the Baltimore tax on advertising was declared Friday (17) by Maryland's highest court, the Court of Appeals, to be unconstitutional. The decision was based on the fact that the impact was upon radio and tv stations and newspapers, businesses entitled to the immunities of the first amendment to the Federal constitution. An estimated $1,500,000 collected thus far since January will have to be returned to to the taxpayers.

LOST AND FOUND: Cunningham & Walsh has been appointed to handle the advertising account of Everest Records, made by the Belock Recording Co. and distributed by the Decca Distributing Corp. C&W also landed the Belock Instrument Corp. account.

The Benrus Watch Co. and Lennen & Newell, which had handled the account worth an estimated $1,000,000, have severed their relationship effective Nov. 1. Grey Advertising has been named to handle the billings. The parting between Benrus & L&N was described as being mutually agreed upon and carried out in complete friendliness.

The Wexton Co. has picked up the billings of the Organ Corp. of America.

McCann-Erickson named to handle the account of the American Tyrex Corp. Communication Counselors will handl p.r. and publicity.

Switches: James P. Barrett has been appointed media director of H. W. Warden Associates. He was formerly media supervisor at Lennen & Newell and media buyer at Benton & Bowles.

Robert L. Garrison, veepee of MacManus, John & Adams, elected to agency's board of directors.

David L. Lambert, formerly with Benton & Bowles, has joined WPIX, N. Y., as an account exec.

John Curran, formerly with Kenyon & Eckhardt, and Robert Bruno, previously with Dancer-Fitzgerald-Sample, have joined Reach, McClinton's media department.

William H. Genge elected a veepee of Ketchum, MacLeod & Grove.

Howard L. Davis has been named head of the information services program of N. W. Ayer. He has been a member of the copy staff.

Andrew J. Purcell appointed media director of the Miami office of Marschalk & Pratt. He is currently associate media director in the New York office and will assume his new post Nov. 1.

Richard W. Tully, v.p. and general manager of Foote, Cone & Belding's Chicago office, has been named to the newly-created post of chairman of the agency's national operations committee.

Saul Grubstein has been appointed executive art director of Hicks & Greist. He was previously an art director for Gore-Smith-Greenland.

Frank O'Connor, who has been acting as new programming director on the Coast and program supervisor on "Thin Man," for Ted Bates, is leaving the agency. John Calley, recently appointed new programming director in the N. Y. office of the agency will also assume the Coast role.

Campaigns: Dowd Redfield & Johnstone has mapped a saturation spot tv schedule in an expanded market list for Lanvin perfumes in a fall and winter drive.

Young & Rubicam for the Thomas J. Lipton is initiating a campaign in 70 markets for its tea. The seven-week drive starts this month.

Pharmco, Inc., began testing in eight markets its new 24 Cold Tablets with a heavy spot tv schedule as well as radio and newspaper support.

Chi Agencies

By LES BROWN

Chicago, Oct. 21.

Inasmuch as it stifles creativity, motivational research can be detrimental to the cause of good advertising rather than helpful to it. So said Arthur Meyerhoff, prez of the Chi agency bearing his name, in a speech to the Advertising Executives Club of Chicago last week.

"Psychoanalysis is primarily therapy," he said, "and advertising primarily creativity. I question whether the twain can meet." Meyerhoff said he had no quarrel with the use of psychoanalytic techniques in advertising, but he warned that overindulgence in motivational formulae would tend to paralyze creativity, just as would any other pat formulae. Meyerhoff said he doubted the basic premise of MR—"that by playing directly upon unconscious motivations you automatically increase the selling power of advertising."

New Veeps: John L. Baldwin at Kenyon & Eckhardt (he learned the news in London, where he is supervising production of Wilson & Co.'s new tv-er, "Take 5"); Joseph T. Kohout and William T. Seay at Meyer Both Co.; and John Morrissey at J. Walter Thompson in Chi.

New Accounts: Turtle Wax-Plastone Co. to Bozell and Jacobs; Allied Van Lines to Campbell-Mithun from McCann-Erickson. Latter bills around $750,000 a year, and switch is effective Dec. 10.

Additions: Austin L. D'Alton, ex-North Advertising, joined account service staff at McCann-Erickson.

George C. Mead to Chi staff of Reach, McClinton & Co., as a.e. and copywriter.

Alfred S. Trude to Clinton E. Frank, as media director. Had same post at MacFarland, Aveyard for six years.

London Agencies

London, Oct. 21.

John Martyn has joined the Pulse research organization, which specializes in television and market research. He was formerly with Young & Rubicam agency and the British Market Research Bureau.

Kenneth Gill, director in charge of television for the S. T. Garland agency, arrived in New York yesterday (Mon.) for a seven-day business trip. The past 12 months have shown rapid expansion for the agency which handles such major accounts as ABC-TV, British Overseas Airways Corp., Sheaffer Pen, Bowater and Rowntree. It also advises the A. C. Nielsen Co. on publicity for the Nielsen Television Index in Britain.

A series of five-page and three-page editorial type supplements in leading home magazines will be the mainstay of a winter campaign being launched by the Solid Fuel and Warm Air Divisions of Radiation Group Sales Ltd. The supplements will demonstrate each month that there is a Radiation appliance to solve every heating problem. Agents are Clifford Bloxham & Partners.

Geo. H. Gribbin New Y&R Prexy

In a move that comes as a surprise to the advertising industry George H. Gribbin, senior v.p. and copy director of Young & Rubicam, has been named president of the agency with Sigurd S. Larmon who had been the agency's prexy and chairman of the board since 1943 slated to continue as chairman of the agency and chief executive officer.

Louis N. Brockway, executive veepee, has been named to the newly-created post of chairman of the executive committee. Three new executive v.p.s were appointed at the same time. They are Frank Fagin and Harry Hardin, both now senior veepees, and Harry H. Enders, presently v.p. in charge of finance and director of the international division.

Gribbin, who has been a senior v.p. of the agency since 1956, joined Y&R as a copywriter in 1935 and become a copy supervisor in 1943. He has been director of the copy department since 1954.

PAUL WHITE TROPHY AWARDED TO SWEZEY

Chicago, Oct. 21.

Radio TV News Directors Assn. awarded the Paul White memorial trophy this year to Robert D. Swezey, exec viceprez of WDSU-WDSU-TV, New Orleans, for his work with the American Bar Assn., in connection with its Canon 35, which virtually bans broadcasting equipment from the courtrooms. Through his efforts ABA postponed a revision of the canon which would have made it more stringent and undertook a study of the rule, which conceivably could result in its rescission.

Swezey, who is a member of the bar, was cited by RTNDA for "a significant contribution to freedom of information." Swezey is the third recipient of the Paul White Award, which is given by the organization in memory of the late CBS news director. Previous conferees were Hugh Terry (KLZ, Denver) in 1956 and Dr. Frank Stanton, CBS prez, in 1957.

Britain's ATV and ABC-TV Plan Ambitious Program Sked for Kids

London, Oct. 21.

Two commercial tv companies, ABC-TV and Associated TeleVision, have joint plans to nurture juvenile viewers with wholesome and stimulating programs. They've enlisted the aid of Mary Field of the Children's Film Foundation and have big ideas for Saturday and Sunday morning shows. But the basis of these plans depends almost entirely on the assumption that the Independent Television Authority will be granted extra broadcasting hours.

The ITA is asking for an additional 21 hours air time each week above the already alloted 50 hours, which does not, however, include outside broadcasts, religious programs or schools tv. If this request is granted it will mean that every outlet will have an extra three hours programming time each day, thus enabling them to be on the air from midday till midnight if they wished.

This, however, does not appear to be the intention of ABC-TV or ATV, which between them handle the weekend programs for the Midlands, North and London outlets. Miss Field, whose joint appointment for these two stations takes effect on Jan. 1, will see that the additional daily three hours will be used wisely on the tots.

Howard Thomas, managing director of ABC-TV, summed up the situation by saying: "The next development of independent television is for us to provide programs which will stimulate children to do things. This means to stimulate them to write, to draw, to paint, to take part in games and music. This is the challenge which we eagerly accept to motivate the young audience. The object will be to design programs to make our kids livelier and brighter."

Val Parnell, managing director of ATV said: "Children's programs are so important to us that ATV and ABC have taken the unusual course of joining forces to tackle the problem." The programmers intend to spend around $84,000 on research into the subject. It is likely that the remaining commercial outlets will also take a more serious view of juve programming, which has been the cause of much criticism from the press and public bodies, which claimed that too much violence was portrayed.

Scots Press For 3d TV Channel

London, Oct. 21.

Scotland is after its own third tv channel. The Scottish National Party is pressing for the setting up of a Scottish Television Board which would promote Scottish culture via the medium and would prevent both culture and other traditions from becoming submerged in the mainstream of Anglo-American ideas.

The plan, which has been submitted to the Prime Minister, suggests that the web, should operate on revenue derived from advertising sales. The Government would be expected to provide the capital investment necessary to establish the STB.

History of BBC

London, Oct. 21.

Asa Briggs, professor of Modern History at Leeds University, has accepted an invitation from the BBC to write a history of broadcasting in Great Britain.

Val Parnell Exits Moss for Fulltime Role in British TV

London, Oct. 21.

Val Parnell has resigned his managing directorship of Moss Empires to concentrate full time on Associated TeleVision, of which he is also managing director. He will, however, retain his seat on the board of Moss Empires and will continue as executive director of the London Palladium.

Parnell has been managing director of Moss Empires for 13 years and in the last few years has doubled his activities with ATV. Moss Empires has a substantial holding in the commercial tv network.

A successor to Parnell is expected

A-R's John McMillan On Global Hop; Hopes To Sign Up Yank Producers

London, Oct. 21.

John McMillan, Associated-Rediffusion's program controller, leaves London on Saturday (25) for a four-weeks around the world trip starting in Australia and including Canada and New York, in a bid to corner some of the Commonwealth kinescope market from America.

On his way home, McMillan will visit the United States where he hopes to sign up two Yank tv producers to come to Britain and work for A-R. Apart from its other attractions, such a step could help the resale value of programs to the U.S.

McMillan revealed that British Actors' Equity Assn. had intimated that it was prepared to cut its claim to 25% residual fees in territories where the sparse population at the moment made kinescope sales a difficult proposition. This would help Britain, particularly in Australia.

His mission is based on the affinity of Britain with the Commonwealth, and he aims to make dent in U.S. domination of the Australian market. He would like to double Britain's share, from its existing 10% to 20%. He will be making his pitch with such A-R programs as "Murder Bag," a crime series; "The Jubilee Show," an old time vaude offering; and telerecordings of A-R plays. McMillan also said that there were tentative plans for a weekly Commonwealth news feature to which overseas outlets would contribute.

YANK STAKE IN ITALO SKEIN?

Rome, Oct. 21.

Second television channel covering the principal Italian cities appears closer than ever before though the pending event is shrouded in secrecy.

Only two things are almost certain: The new setup will be commercial, and it will use UHF equipment imported from the U.S.

In this respect, it is known that both NBC and CBS have in recent years explored the possibility offered by a second Italo outlet. NBC reportedly abandoned the problem in view of early difficulties stemming from the virtual monopoly enjoyed here by the government-subsidized RAI-TV. However, the network again made overtures, this time through RAI, only three weeks ago. Recently, CBS huddled with local officials in an attempt to reach a solution also satisfactory to RAI-TV.

William A. Berns was reported to be the most recent to negotiate a U.S.-Italo setup in Milan. Berns was formerly a news-public affairs executive with NBC in New York, and, unofficially, he still has close NBC connections.

It is probable that the first telecast by the second network will emanate from Milan, where one of the Italian combines just erected a 50-foot antenna on top of one of the city's skyscrapers, and is soon expected to top this one with a taller one, about 90-feet high. Rome, Turin and Naples would follow, UHF telecasts being restricted in range.

Basically, there currently appears to be three distinct possibilities for a so-called second Italian network: (1) a privately financed indie commercial setup functioning with completely self-sufficient equipment "in opposition," as it were, to the existing RAI-TV network; (2) a privately operated commercial network using RAI-TV facilities via rental, with RAI (and the government) exercising some control; (3) a second net entirely operated by RAI-TV itself on a more limited scale and with regional characteristics, in addition to its current tv programs.

There is also a possibility that last-named above scheme may go into operation in addition to one of the other projects.

Reports that have so far penetrated the general veil of secrecy indicate that one of the companies wanting to set up a second tv net, TVL (for "Free Television"), has

There's No End To Those Brit. Com'l Success Stories

London, Oct. 21.

New evidence of commercial tv's golden bonanza will be forthcoming at the end of next month when Associated-Rediffusion publishes its reports and accounts. It is forecast that their profits will reach a new high level for the industry, topping the $11,000,000 results announced by Associated TeleVision earlier in the year.

The news will come as a welcome surprise to the industry, particularly after the bad financial start made by the programming company. Their earnings for the year just ended will more than wipe out their heavy losses in the previous years.

A-R operates the London commercial outlet on weekdays and the company is headed by J. Spencer Wills and Paul Adorian as chairman and managing director respectively. John McMillan, the A-R program controller, is due to leave at the end of this week on a world tour starting in Australia. He will be visiting the United States on his global trip.

Britain, Just Like U.S., Talks Up Mergers; ATV Buys Out ITP

London, Oct. 21.

Associated TeleVision is buying out the Incorporated Television Program Corp. It made the offer last week and the ITP board has recommended its members to accept it.

The takeover move was foreshadowed by Prince Littler, the ATV chairman, in his recent statement circulated to stockholders with the annual accounts, and confirms the close link that has existed between the network and the program company since the inception of commercial tv in Britain.

ITP, which is equally partnered with the Jack Wrather Organization in the recently formed Independent Television Corp., has been Britain's biggest packager of filmed and live tv shows and developed into the major dollar earning organization in tv, having brought into Britain over the past three years approximately $15,000,000.

Under the new ITC banner, it will be producing a minimum of four to five series a year in Britain, in addition to the live schedule, which includes "Sunday Night at the London Palladium," "Saturday Spectacular" and "Startime." It has been associated with the production of 14 vidpic series, among them "The Adventures of Robin Hood," which is now in its fourth year, as well as "The Invisible Man" and "William Tell" series, both of which are still in production. Next on its sked is "The Four Just Men" which will be made by Sapphire Films with Jack Hawkins, Vitttorio de Sica and Dan Dailey starred.

In addition to its British production activities, ITP also acts as Eastern Hemisphere distrib for a large range of American programming material, as well as its own British output.

Eurovision Feed On Parliament Opening

London, Oct. 21.

The State Opening of Parliament, which will be televised for the first time next Tuesday (28) will be beamed to seven Eurovision countries. They are Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, France, Switzerland, Italy and Denmark.

It's planned to fly possible recordings of the complete tv broadcast to Australia as soon as possible after the event. The BBC, which will handle production and technical arrangements, will use four outside broadcast units for coverage, employing 12 cameras. The commercial web will take a feed-in of the television but will provide its own commentary.

NBC Ownership Stake in New Aussie Station

London, Oct. 21.

NBC has bought a substantial ownership interest in a new Australian television station. The Australian government okayed the network's financial participation in a station to go up next year in Brisbane. This constitutes the first time that an American network has ever had a straight ownership arrangement in outlets outside the United States.

NBC received a 10% interest in one of the two commercial outlets to be constructed in Brisbane, Australia's third largest city. NBC teamed up with ATV, the commercial outlet in England, in the Brisbane buy, with ATV also getting 10%. When more than one foreign group is interested in an ownership share in Aussie tv, foreign financing is allowed up to a maximum of 20%.

The Australian buy, which the network has been waiting to clear with the government for the past several months, is designed as the first steps in a general overseas expansion by NBC. The U.S. network has acknowledged it's interested in any commercial operations that might be set up in Italy, and it has been shopping around other countries for tv stations.

A year ago, Gen. Sarnoff, head of RCA, which owns NBC, predicted an international tv hookup within the decade. It is expected that its Australian station will take part in the international feed. But for the moment, NBC officials express belief that overseas tv stations can be as financially re-

Britons Turn Deaf Ear To Political Telecasts; Labor Party's 5% Aud

London, Oct. 21.

The two British tv networks—commercial and BBC—have discovered there isn't much public interest in political broadcasts. During the week of the Labor Party Conference, each of the two webs had a nightly program but on no occasion did more than 5% of the audience tune in.

On all occasions the commercial web collared the higher section of the viewing audience and got its top reception on the night of Oct. 2 with a viewership of 1,383,300 as against a modest 96,000 for the BBC. The differential, however, was not always so marked and on two of the remaining three evenings the BBC programs attracted about one-third of the viewing audience.

Adler Helms NBC Setup in Europe

London, Oct. 21.

Gerald Adler has been named managing director of NBC International (Great Britain) Ltd., succeeding Romnev Wheeler, who returns to the U. S. this week to take up an official post in Washington. Adler's appointment took effect as of yesterday (Mon.). He also becomes European director of NBC International.

Adler, who has been in London for the last 18 months as director of European programming for California National Production, was formerly a talent negotiator for NBC in New York.

NBC International (Great Britain) is a newly-formed company which has a management service contract with TWW, the commercial television programming company which operates in Wales and the West of England. The British company and the International outfit aim to extend their management services operation throughout Europe, embracing radio, as well as tv. They are also to examine the possibility of theatrical distribution in Europe for selected vidfilms for which there is no suitable tv outlet.

Apart from helming the company, Adler will also be administering co-production on behalf of CNP, and is on the prowl for suitable subjects which could be lensed in Britain. The International company will also make a pitch for spot sales representation in Europe and will consider making investments in European tv. It also proposes to place scripts and formats for shows in which NBC hold the rights.

In addition to Adler, the personnel of NBC's London office includes Lane Blackwell, European sales manager; and J. Robert Myers, tv consultant to TWW and management service consultant to NBC International.

*Source: Trendex, October 1958 vs. October 1957; all sponsored evening programs (excluding news and religious programming) for the prime evening hours – 7:30-10:30 P.M. Important: these figures are from the latest (and only) official Trendex reports available to the television industry . . . and not from a special study prepared for any specific network.

All tortoises kindly stand back

This is strictly a hare-racing story.

Aesop notwithstanding, no tortoise ever saw the day when he could beat a hare. Give us instead two hares, wide awake and strong of limb, tearing up the cabbage patch. There's the race!

It's the race you have right now in the television industry, with two fast-stepping networks coming lickety-brindle around the first turn.

At the moment, the front-runner is CBS. Only a hare's breadth behind (and gaining by leaps and bounds) is ABC – the lively challenger whose opening spurt this fall left the third network turned turtle.

(October Trendex reports: ABC's average rating for all sponsored evening programs: 17.2 — up thirty-five per cent from a year ago! CBS: 20.7 — up eight per cent from a year ago. The third network: 16.8 — down eleven per cent from last year!)*

ABC, these autumn nights, seems scarcely to touch the ground. Twelve of its shows are first in their time slot — a hop, skip, and jump ahead of the third network, and a prodigious inroad on CBS' lead of a year ago.

And most revealing tale of all: in time periods where ABC's sponsored evening programs met CBS shows head-on, ABC came out ahead more than half the time! ABC programs beat the third network by an even bigger margin. In fact, ABC beat both networks at once almost forty per cent of the time!

They're settling down, this pair, for the stretch run. The one straining to hold the margin... the other striving to swallow it. Neither has ever been known to nap.

More exciting than Aesop any day. (Or night.)

VARIETY-PULSE FEATURE CHART

VARIETY's weekly chart, based on ratings furnished by Pulse's latest reports on feature films and their competition covers 155 markets. Each week, two different markets will be listed, with the 10 top-rated features tabulated.

Factors which would assist distributors, agencies, stations and advertisers in determining the effectiveness of a feature show in a specific market have been included in this VARIETY chart. Listed below is such pertinent information regarding features as their stars, release year, original production company and the present distributor included wherever possible along with the title. Attention should be paid to such factors as the time and day, the high and low ratings for the measured feature period and share of audience, since these factors reflect the effectiveness of the feature and audience composition, i.e., a late show at 11:15 p.m. would hardly have any children viewers, but its share of audience may reflect dominance in that time period. In the cities where stations sell their feature programming on a multi stripped basis utilizing the same theatrical throughout the week a total rating for the total number of showings for the week is given, the total rating not taking into account the duplicated homes factor. Barring unscheduled switches in titles the listed features for the particularly rated theatrical filmed show are as accurate as could be ascertained. Under Time Slot, S. O. stands for Sign-Off.

Jerry Lewis Hates TV Critics

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Speaking to a panel of newsmen on an interview-type show on KTLA Thursday night, Jerry Lewis unleashed an angry tirade against television critics, terming most of them "caustic, rude, unkind and sinister."

Lewis, whose first spec of the season was on NBC-TV two days later—last Saturday—had kind words only for L.A. Mirror-News syndicated columnist Hal Humphrey and L.A. Times critic Cecil Smith, the latter on the panel.

Most critics seek to "magnify their importance" with vicious reviews, he contended, adding "they're burying the business they're paid by. A critic should help the medium and report the news."

Lewis said he wasn't exaggerating the power of the press, that when a Hollywood newsman printed something, it was picked up around the country by other newsmen and "embellished," that eventually it resulted in the audience subconsciously "hating" a performer when he came on tv.

Said the comedian caustically: "If a reviewer writes a performer is a nice guy, he may be approached at the golf club the next day and told he's a sissy. This type of reviewer is a discredit to the good ones."

Commented Lewis: "I'm very aware of the potency of the press."

Scandinavia Likes Yank TV Fare; 'Lucy,' 'Perry Mason,' '64G,' Others

Scandinavian tv is using a good deal of American program fare and copying this country's video methods in many respects. The Scandinavians have their counterparts of Ed Sullivan and the "$64,000 Question."

Harry Rasky, producer of the CBS-TV "UN In Action" program in its eighth season on the CBS-TV web and which celebrated UN Week last Sunday (19) with Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt as principal speaker, just returned from a three-month survey of European countries including Sweden, Denmark, Norway and Finland.

Sweden, according to Rasky, is the most advanced in tv programming. It now has three tv outlets but hopes to have 50 stations in operation by 1965. Denmark is second and expects to build seven stations in the not-too-distant future, he said.

The Swedes possess approximately 163,000 video receivers with an estimated audience of one million, and is under government supervision with two hours of programming nightly. Denmark has some 150,000 sets, with less than a million observers and also is on a two-hour nightly operation, sans commercials.

Finland, Rasky reported, has a government station with only two hours a week on the air. However, one Finnish commercial video outlet operates one hour a day. Finnish viewers have no trouble bringing in Russian video entertainment and propaganda, if they so desire, but apparently the natives have a healthy dislike of Communists and consequently Finland's government isn't too concerned about infiltration via tv.

As for the Norwegians, there's no tv in that country at the present time. The Norwegians, it appears, are a cautious lot and evidently waiting to see if the whole thing will blow over.

Rasky said that as a result of the onetime popularity of the "$10,000 Kroner Question" (about $2,000 in American money) in Sweden the sale of tv receivers jumped from 30,000 to 100,000. It appears that a 14-year-old boy, famed for his knowledge of aquarium fish, lost on the way up to the grand prize but when a public outcry resulted, he was brought back and went on to reach the pinnacle. Government broadcasters, however, decided at this point to take the show off the air. A Swedish version of the Barry-Enright "21" program also commanded considerable attention among Swedish viewers, Rasky said. The country's Ed Sullivan, the CBS producer reported, is a lad named Lennart Hyland, a top sportscaster, quiz show conductor and variety show emcee. Unlike Sullivan, he is jovial in appearance.

In Denmark, tv viewers have been getting quiz shows entitled "Double or Quits" and a carbon copy of our "$64,000 Question." Rasky said the popularity of Denmark's "$10,000 Kroner Question" forced theatres to abandon their Sunday night performances and clergymen also complained bitterly that parishioners were scramming from church services long before the final hymn was sung in order to catch the video quiz show.

Scandinavian tv stations also have been transmitting many American shows with subtitles or native language dubbings. Among the shows that are popular: "Range Rider," "I Love Lucy," "Our Miss Brooks," "Champion, the Wonder Horse," "Jungle Jim," "Fabian of Scotland Yard," "Robin Hood," "Hitchcock Presents," "Perry Mason" and "Mr. Adams and Eve," a particularly outstanding attraction in Sweden.

Rasky said that about one-third of Sweden's tv schedule is devoted to public service programming but apparently the populace and the daily press are constantly muttering that there's too much educational matter on the air and not enough entertainment.

90-Min. Telepix

mula worked out. But, unlike the movie industry, tv has lived with residual payments and the outlook for agreement is much better.

The promise of a ready syndication market for bluechip network entries, when the features run dry, should be an impetus for taping more shows, if filming is avoided to retain live qualities. What about the "Hallmark Hall of Fame" possibilities on tape is one of the questions now being bandied around?

Screen Gems opened the 90-minute telefilm "feature" market by taking its filmed "Playhouse 90" entries and including them in its cinematic package. SG's "90's" now are being played in feature slots across the country.

National Telefilm Associates bought reruns of the hour-long 20th-Fox and Warner Bros. telefilms, originally networked as the "20th-Fox Hour," "Casablanca" and "King's Row." They are being stripped on the NTA Film Network with John Conte acting as the filmed host.

Pioneering efforts on the 60 and 90 minute telefilm rerun possibilities already have been successfully effected. The outlook on future efforts, both film and tape, appears bright.

WNEW-TV

was figured out by WNEW's film chief Elizabeth Bain and by SG's syndication director Bob Seidelman.

Actually, this is not the first time SG has made an attempt to hypo WNEW feature output, but the Col subsid never advertised it. A few months ago, the distribbery quietly brought back 50 pictures from WCBS, in order to resell them to WNEW before they became too stale for prime exposure. The WCBS pact had run only two years of a several-year deal with SG.

Some of the U-I and Columbia features accruing to WCBS in this unusual "shortrun" pact were "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town," "Canyon Passage," W. C. Fields' "Bank Dick" and "Three Smart Girls."

WNTA-TV Hits Jackpot With Shirley Temple Oldie

A Shirley Temple oldie has done it again.

WNTA, Newark-N. Y., ran "Little Miss Broadway" on Sunday (19) and racked up a neat 10.9 rating for the 5 to 6:30 p.m. period, according to Arbitron. It put the station in the No. 1 spot in the seven-station market, giving the NTA Film Network affiliate a 33.1 share of audience. Closest competitor in the time period were WCBS-TV and WABC-TV, each with a 4.8 rating and a 14.6 share of audience.

The 10.9 Arbitron for "Miss Broadway" gave WNTA-TV its highest rating to date, a 419% increase over the same period last week when the station received an average quarter-hour of 2.1.

Five other features (four reruns) are slated for the "Shirley Temple Film Festival" over the 63-station NTA Film Network lineup. They are "Captain January," "Wee Willie Winkie," "Poor Little Rich Girl," "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," and "Heidi." All except "Poor Little Rich Girl," had their initial exposure last Christmas season on a similar NTA web. Current Shirley Temple pix are fully sponsored, all advertisers being clients of the Grey agency.

Murray Warmouth Gets His Sponsors

Minneapolis, Oct. 21.

After VARIETY had given national publicity to the fact that U. of Minnesota gridiron coach Murray Warmouth, following a disastrous season, had lost out on his Sunday night television show that had paid him $8,000 annually his first three years here, supplementing his annual $16,500 university salary, two sponsors stepped into the breach.

The Minneapolis Morning Tribune picked up the VARIETY yarn and played it up on the front page. A few days later the two bankrollers put in an appearance—and bought the football films and put Warmouth on tv via a Sunday morning WCCO-TV show.

Instead of "The Murray Warmouth Show" it's called "Minnesota Football" and instead of 60 minutes it runs 45.

Also, instead of the $8,000 Warmouth and his predecessors were paid, he'll receive only $2,000. And, instead of the former $5,000 that the university was paid for the films, it'll get only $700.

It would have been the first time in local video history in this football hotbed sans such a football show with films of the previous day's game and the coach narrating them and being interviewed about other football matters.

Present sponsors are the Twin City Federal Saving & Loan, which bankrolls dozens of other local tv and radio shows, including many sport programs, and whose head is a rabid football fan, and the Malkerson Motor Co., whose president is a university regent and also a football lover.

HOPE QUIPS HIS WAY THRU PULSE AWARD

Bob Hope was named The Pulse "Man of the Year" for 1958, at the 17th annual luncheon of the research firm held at N.Y.'s Hotel Plaza, Mon. (20). Hope was represented at the luncheon, held for executives of the broadcasting and advertising industry by Esther Williams and by proxy in a film in which he quipped his way through a thank you message. ("This is the biggest thing that's happened to me since Gov. Faubus made me an honorary slave.")

Dr. Sidney Roslow, president of Pulse said in part: "Bob Hope has taken his humor, his comedy and his entertainment to every place where English is spoken and to every place where people can laugh . . ."

Previous recipients of the "Man of the Year" award include Marion Harper Jr., president of McCann-Erickson; Robert Kintner, prexy of NBC; and Ed Sullivan and Steve Allen.

79,120 Mile-High Signal Relayed Back to Earth Validates Use Of 'Space Vehicles' for Global TV

Washington. Oct. 21.

For the first time, radio signals have been transmitted to a receiver in outer space and relayed back to earth. This proves that a worldwide radio and television system via earth satellites is possible.

Air Force Maj. Gen. Bernard Schriever disclosed Friday (17) that the experiment was carried out as part of the Pioneer moon shot attempt.

Schriever, who directed the effort, said signals were sent and rebroadcast when the rocket was at its highest point 79,120 miles from earth.

The signals came from transmitters in Hawaii and Cape Canaveral and were picked up by the "doppler command" receiver in the Pioneer and rebroadcast. The relayed Hawaiian signals were detected in Manchester, England. Those emanating from Cape Canaveral and rebroadcast by the rocket were picked up in Hawaii.

In a report on the experiment, Schriever said it "validates the idea of using space vehicles for world-wide communications."

Government and industry circles in both the U.S. and Russia have grown increasingly enthusiastic about the idea of space radio and tv relay stations since Sputnik I soared into successful orbit last year.

The U.S. hopes to launch before the end of next year a 100-foot inflatable "reflector" sphere which may pave the way for a future network of broadcast satellites.

And studies are already underway on the design and feasibility of other kinds of reflector satellites for broadcast purposes. According to scientists at the newly-created National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the "reflector" satellite program is receiving "substantial" dollar support.

Russia's interest in the field was underscored in a recent broacast by the Soviet North American radio service. Nikolai Potisayev, the Red scientist who authored the script, declared that an East-West tv exchange by means of a satellite antenna network is technically feasible "in the not too distant future."

He spoke of satellites orbitting at about 21,000 miles altitude. At this distance, nearly one third of the earth's surface would be in range, and the space station would remain stationary in relation to the earth.

You Betcha

There's some sort of a domestic hassle brewing over the sale of a script, tentatively titled "Hughie," to Fred Coe for the March 26 "Playhouse 90," with Arthur Penn to direct.

Author is Sandy Scheuer. Question is whether hubby Steve Scheuer, editor of the syndicated TV Key, will give the show a highlight listing that night.

WNEW-TV's Big Chunk Of Macy's Billings, But Most Clients Are Now National

Macy's department store has just come up with $100,000 in annual billings for WNEW-TV one of only three local accounts remaining on the N. Y. station. In the past several months, the indie, which once existed on local biz alone, has 88 sponsors, 85 of whom are from national ranks.

As a mark of its acceptance by the national accounts, station recently got the full Gotham tv budget of Elgin watches. It has Du Pont, Standard Brands, Vick, Consolidated Cigar, Tasty Cake, many for the first time. Coca-Cola is the newest of the national bankrollers to sign.

WNEW has carried shortterm Macy biz for sometime, but, station says, the store has picked up its first longterm deal. It's 52 weeks with the usual options, with the $100,000 based on a full year's business.

Bennett Korn, station boss, attributes much of the business to the Nielsen-reported fact that WNEW-TV now reaches 95% of the metropolitan area tv sets. It's a study of unduplicated coverage over the period of a month.

CBS Radio Coin

CBS Radio drew considerable biz this week from Republican National Committee, Kiplinger Magazine, Lever Bros., American Tyrex, Congoleum-Nairn and Gulf Guaranty Land Title Co.

GOP chieftains, via BBD&O, purchased 30 minutes for President Eisenhower's political address tonight (Wed.). Lever Bros. bought units of CBS Radio daytime dramas.

Kiplinger will sponsor "Changing Times" and Tyrex ties up with the "Rusty Draper Show" and other features. Congoleum-Nairn is contracting for daytime dramas and Gulf Guaranty is purchasing "Impact" segments of "Galen Drake Show."

Femme Stars

femme stars made it early, but have found the going more difficult since.

One exception is CBS Films' "Annie Oakley," starring Gail Davis. It was launched in Jan., '53, and it's been riding national spot since, with Continental Baking renewing for another two-year ride. Thirteen new episodes will be made next year, bringing the total number of episodes to 97.

For the most part, the only shows in which femmes have starred have been comedy, and insofar as Ziv is concerned, that's a specialized field into which it only occasionally ventures. Overall, though, the impact of the distaffers has been confined to the comedy field—Joan Davis, Eve Arden, Ann Sothern, Spring Byington, Gale Storm are the handful who've hit home.

As to the current slate, there's Miss Sothern, back in a new format; Miss Storm, with "Oh, Susanna"; Miss Byington, in "December Bride"; Donna Reed, in her new ABC'er; all comedies, and Loretta Young, fronting her own anthology. On the live end, there are only a pair of singers, Dinah Shore and Patti Page.

UN's 'Dateline U.S.' Series A Reality as 30 Stations Guaranty $50,000 Fund

To insure additional video coverage from the United Nations, whose own radio-tv budget is evidently limited, approximately 30 U.S. tv stations have banded together and guaranteed better than $50,000 to produce 26 quarter-hour telefiims under the handle of "Dateline: U.S." A group of commercial video executives, who have now allied permanently as the U.S. Broadcasters Committee for the UN, have been working on the financing for several weeks.

First of the series will be released to participating stations this week. The Committee has established local rates of $200 per station in N.Y., Chicago and L.A., $100 for stations in cities with over 1,000,000 sets, $50 in cities with over 225,000 sets and $25 in cities with over 100,000 sets. Since there is more than one charter outlet in cities such as Portland, Ore., Columbus, O., Indianapolis, and Detroit, rule is that each will pay full local tab. WRCA-TV is signed to carry "Dateline" in N.Y.

UN says that the nut for each quarter-hour will be better than $2,000. Films, to be shot for the stations by UN's radio and visual services division, is designed to supply the "interpretive background of current developments."

'All Shook Up Boys' Driving Mature People Away from Radio: Bormann

Chicago, Oct. 21.

Radio has now evolved into a "two world" medium of hostile concepts that are destined to clash in a showdown for survival.

That's the premise from which RTNDA keynoter Jim Bormann departed last Thursday (16) in a speech which urged responsible broadcasters to meet the threat of growing jukebox programming with top quality news service. "News with integrity is the secret weapon," he said, which serious broadcasters must use to subdue "the disk jockey newsman who stands as an alert sentinel in his echo chamber," an enemy of the standards that serious newsmen represent.

Bormann, by the way, is news director of WCCO, Minneapolis-St. Paul and past prexy of Radio Television News Directors Assn., whose 12th annual conclave wound up in Chi over the weekend.

Having reached the crossroads, Bormann said, the broadcast industry now faces the problem of which philosophy shall prevail, and this boils down to the question of whether radio is a medium for entertainment and information or merely for entertainment alone. For the "all shook up boys," as Bormann termed the jukebox endorsers, "freely admit they would prefer to get along without news—just grind out music from sign-on to sign-off. 'News,' they say, 'doesn't fit our format. And besides it's not our responsibility to educate or inform the public'."

The effect of this attitude, said Bormann, will be to disenchant mature people with the worthiness of radio news. He suggested that if the deejay becomes recognized as radio's sample purveyor of news, the whole cause of broadcast news is doomed because the public will lose confidence in it.

Jukebox programmers, whom Bormann labeled "radio's beat generation," have in the main "chickened out on their responsibility to provide honest, enterprising news coverage . . . They proceed to ding up what they think will pass for a newscast with sound effects, weird weather reports, phony predictions of things to come, 10-second nagging editorials and a starvation diet of news." These broadcasters, he said, apologize for news with the promise that more music is only a few minutes away.

The conflict comes to the fore now in the present dilemma of the AP wire service, Bormann pointed out. A report from Associated Press to RTNDA contained the following paragraph:

"It appears certain that the status quo cannot be maintained indefinitely. Agitation to bring AP firmly into one camp or another can be expected to increase in vigor. In view of the dissimilar news needs of the two groups . . . it appears that a single radio wire can no longer adequately meet the requirements of all broadcasters."

The AP report described the needs thus: "The majority segment — apparently growing in number and voice — seeks an abundance of short items to supply a multiplicity of daily news programs. The other groups want more than the headlines: strong detail . . . some background and interpretation. In short, the whole story."

Bormann pointed out that the adult audience of radio is at stake. The rise of irresponsible news gathering will hurt the whole effort, he said. "Showmanship is necessary, but sugar-coated news is insidious."

As for television, Bormann feels that oddly enough the new medium is more settled than the older ones, that its problems today are more budgetary than journalistic and that it is growing quickly to maturity. Radio, on the other hand, is going through an evolutionary stage, he says, and the changing pattern of programming necessarily affects radio news.

Fort Wayne—Norman C. Widenhofer will resign Nov. 3 as assistant manager of WGL in charge of programming, to join the public relations and advertising firm of Willis S. Martin Co., Fort Wayne, where he will serve as consultant in radio and television programming and planning.

YOUTH WANTS TO KNOW

Steve Floethe at 17 a Vet B'caster With Eye on Expansion

Seventeen years of age and already a veteran broadcaster, Steve Floethe, of WSPB, Sarasota, Fla., has formed Steve Floethe Presentations with an eye on expansion. Youth recently completed a "Teenager in Europe" program over WSPB based on tapes made while on a student tour abroad. He's now working on a teenage pop music show in addition to helping cover local highschool football games. He's a senior at the school. The station supplied the recording equipment for the European trek of Floethe, whose vet status stems from the fact that this is his fifth year in radio, doing emcee bits, live music shows and disk jockeying.

He's son of Richard and Louise Lee Floethe, writer-artist team whose latest book (for Harper & Bros.) is "Terry Sets Sail." Mrs. Floethe, former actress, is a cousin of composer Richard Rodgers

Sullivan on a Shuttle Routine While Prepping TV 'Salute to Alaska'

Anchorage, Oct. 21.

Ed Sullivan's "Salute to Alaska" television show late in November will be a half-and-half hour-long account of life in Alaska.

Half the show is to be devoted to civilian Alaska—the people, the customs, the life. The rest of the program will be his account of military life—how the soldiers and airman hack it on the big and small Army and Air Force bases from Kotzebue north of the Arctic Circle to metropolitan Anchorage and the big Elmendorf AFB.

Sullivan's 21-member crew and cast have been shooting footage for the past week and will return to shoot some more.

Sullivan plans to flip Jill Corey and Jack Carter to Alaska for some of the sequences, but he also wants homegrown talent. Eskimo dancers and local nightclub entertainers will be included.

His partiality to animals wasn't dropped when he came to Alaska. Sullivan, whose Sunday night program has been shown on Alaska tv stations for several years, said:

"We're even bringing a monkey to Alaska—he'll be on ice skates."

Inside Stuff—Radio-TV

An NBC task force is at work in Texas and Louisiana filming bios of two great natural disasters—the Rio Grande floods of 1954 and the hurricane destruction of Cameron Parish in 1957. Object is to show that, with knowledge, survival in a nuclear crisis is possible. Joel O'Brien is producing with Nicholas Dancy as film consultant; Jerry Karf, unit manager; Moe Levy, camera crew chief; William Welch, scripter. The disaster bios will be aired on "Ten for Survival," Educational TV Project series to start Tuesday, Oct. 28. Produced in cooperation with the U.S. Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, programs will be sent live to intereonnected educational-tv outlets over NBC's regular network facilities on 10 successive Tuesdays at 10:30 p.m. NBC affiliates will carry the programs on a delayed basis. "Ten for Survival" is one of two program series to be presented this fall by NBC in cooperation with the Educational-TV and Radio Center, Ann Arbor.

Moonshoots are old hat, Orrin E. Dunlap Jr. pointed out the other day. Dunlap, RCA exec and former radio editor of the New York Times, was reminded this week by Dr. Lee DeForest, that 30 years ago the daily had reported news of echoes from beyond the moon.

Carr V. Van Anda, m.e. of the Times in 1928, showed Dunlap an item from Nature, a British periodical, that a Scandinavian scientist had come upon radio echoes from behind the moon. Dunlap did a detailed story and then followed it up with additional observations from American radio men including Dr. DeForest.

Eighteen years later, long after Dunlap's stories were forgotten, U.S. Army Signal Corps' radar experts shot radio signals at the moon and caught the echoes. This 1946 event was front-paged in the Times with a Jack Gould by-line. The headline read: CONTACT WITH MOON ACHIEVED BY RADAR IN TEST BY THE ARMY.

Nineteen-man national board of Radio & Television Directors Guild is meeting in N.Y. today (Wed.) through Friday to formulate demands on a new industry contract. The guild's six local chieftains met yesterday to lay the groundwork for the contract skull sessions.

Contract with the employer groups, including the networks, ends Dec. 31. Union has 900-odd members, 550 of them in N.Y., 250 in Hollywood, the rest spread over Chicago, Cleveland, Washington and Detroit.

General membership meeting of the N.Y. branch of the Academy of Television Arts & Sciences will be held Oct. 28 at Toots Shor Restaurant. It'll be the first of regular quarterly membership meetings.

Last spring, ATAS membership asked the meeting schedule be increased from once to four times a year. Robert Lewine, NBC program veep and local prexy, will chair the meeting, which begins at 8:30 p.m.

Al McDowell, KDKA radio newscaster in Pittsburgh, made a tape with Mary Martin on her concert touring attraction, "Music With Mary Martin," before she played a one-nighter in Pitt at the 3,800-seat music hall, the Syria Mosque, last week. Star was so pleased with the result the station gifted Miss Martin with copies that she plans to use ahead of her appearance in other cities on tour.

All stations in Suffolk County, L. I., sign off at sundown with exception of WGLI and WTFM. These new sister stations have been doing aggressive newsgathering jobs recently as result of their after sundown operation. A Babylon priest was on WGLI-WTFM minutes after the Pope's death and the two outlets also became the "Moon Watch" station when they piped in reports from Mackay Radio Labs in Southampton thus getting the Pioneer's radio signals. Last week's air force transport crash just a mile away from the station's transmitters on Southern State Parkway was covered 14 minutes after the disaster by reporters Jerry Stevens and Carl Meyers with beeperphone.

Fraus of four top performers— Bob Hope, Dean Martin, Ray Milland and David Niven—are set to guest stint on Jack Benny's CBS-TV's show Sunday, Nov. 2.

Credits delivered to VARIETY on National Telefilm's "How To Marry a Millionaire" premiere were at odds with the facts. Si Rose and Seaman Jacobs, who were listed as the scribes for the NTA network's "This Is Alice," were in fact the writers for "How To Marry a Millionaire." John O'Dea wrote "Alice."

WLIB, N.Y., which programs for the Negro market, has come to the aid of a Hempstead Negro church, faced with threatened foreclosure. Since getting a plea from the pastor, station has gone on the air with fund raising appeals.

'National Security Not Endangered By Loyola Station'

Washington, Oct. 21.

Ties with Rome through Catholic hierarchy does not prevent Loyola U. from owning and operating New Orleans television channel 4, the U.S. Court of Appeals ruled here in an unanimous opinion.

But an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court for an ultimate decision on the issue seemed certain. The challenge is being made by James A. Noe, Louisiana broadcaster and former state governor who was an unsuccessful applicant for channel 4. Also involved is the organization, Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State.

Before the Court of Appeals was the argument that the Jesuit-controlled New Orleans university is an "alien-dominated" institution prevented by the Federal Communications Act from holding a tv permit. A provision in that law bars tv and radio permits to an alien or representative of an alien or to alien-dominated corporations.

But the court, in its 3-0 opinion, found that the limitations in the law were based primarily upon the plan of preventing alien activities against the Government in wartime.

"The relationship of Loyola to the Society of Jesus," Judge George T. Washington, a direct descendant of the first U.S. President's brother, wrote in the court opinion, "hardly seems to endanger our national security. Certainly the mere fact that the rector is appointed by an ecclesiastical superior who is an alien is not enough to bring Loyola within the interdiction of the cited statute."

The university rector's named by the Jesuit superior general, a Belgian citizen living in Rome, on the recommendation of the provincial supervisor, the head of the New Orleans province of the society.

The fact that Loyola is a Catholic university "is not an independently significant factor for comparative consideration," the court said.

"The religious orientation of a licensee is an irrelevant factor," Judge Washington said.

A third applicant for channel 4, the Times-Picayune Publishing Co., withdrew from the case after purchasing the only competing daily newspaper in New Orleans, the afternoon Item. The company, after talks with the Justice Department's Anti-Trust Division, agreed to divest itself of its radio property, as previously reported, and to pull out of the tv case.

I CAN DESTROY THE SUN
With Maurice Denham, John Robinson, Robert Ayres, Leslie Sands, John Barron, Jennifer Wright, Carmel McSharry, Robert James, Paddy Webster, Jan Conrad
Producer: Sydney Newman
Director: Wilfrid Eades
Writer: Jimmy Sangster (from an idea by Ingram D'Abbes)
60 Mins.; Sun., Oct. 12, 9 p.m.
ATV Network, from London

Trite dialog might have spoiled a fascinating idea, but taut direction and two or three firstrate performances made "I Can Destroy the Sun" a holding hour's entertainment. A series of anonymous letters arriving on the desks of government officials sets a scientific cat among the pigeons and swiftly involved Britain, America and Russia at high level. Writer of the notes claims that he can destroy the sun and will do so if the governments concerned do not get together and outlaw the H-bomb.

At first, the letters are regarded as the outpourings of a crank. But strange happenings in the heavens, as prophesied by "the crank," persuade the higher-ups that it is just possible that he might be able to carry out a threat which could destroy the world. Several tense situations arise from this theme and they are carried out plausibly, though in scientific language which is mainly mumbo-jumbo.

Maurice Denham gave a shrewd, observant performance as the scientist who ultimately was proved to be the writer of the threats, and John Robinson as the British government official, Robert Ayres as the US representative and Jan Conrad as the Russian were all convincingly suave and diplomatic. There was a rather topheavy performance by Leslie Sands as a security policeman. A pity, because to him fell the task of delivering the message in lingo understandable to the layman.

Voytek's decor provided a highly impressive laboratory and the special effect which permitted viewers to see the explosion of an outer planet gave a real kick to the production. Rich.

DIE ROTE OPTIK
(The Red Optics)
With Thilo Koch, narrator
Producer: NWRV, Hamburg
Director: Thilo Koch
40 Mins.; Mon., 9:25 p.m.
West German TV, from Hamburg

Thilo Koch, an expert on his political subject, comes along here with a highly interesting, informative and also shocking item. Latter concerns the means and methods of the Soviet-German television. Koch can skip any polemics, he just shows excerpts from East German TV programs. And these excerpts speak for themselves: Propaganda down the line. Nearly the entire program is in the service of the party. Many of the Red programs are aimed at juveniles. They know over there that the young generation is more important than the old one and can be convinced and misled more easily. Conventional entertainment plays a secondary role.

Koch needs only few introductory words to the various excerpts. He leaves it more or less up to the viewer to form his own opinion. They (the Reds) show a West German church (in Luebeck) which has not been restored as yet. They take, in this case, a pro-Church attitude although everyone knows that Church leaders are prosecuted in their own territory. At another occasion, they show via a cartoon show a cardinal with an A-bomb in his hands. And then endless speeches by Commie leaders, completely false depictions of social conditions in W-Germany, children's education with giving Sputnik ("Look what the Soviet Union has achieved and how miserable the American sputniks are") a fulsome praise, marching of the young pioneers, pro-Sovietic songs, and the like.

Besides the open hate propaganda and political slander, the political satire (under the motto: ridiculousness is killing) plays an important role. Most of these programs lack wit and taste but constant ridiculing of western politicians and personalities helps also the "good cause." They have also a daily newsreel (completely Partylined up, of course) and a special program, "Tele-Studio West," for West German viewers. Feature films, mostly of East German, Russian or Satellite origin, are also often shown. Many of the DEFA pix are brand new.

Since DEPA and the East German TV are State-owned, there is no competition. And no financial worries either. So many films are shown via tv even before their theatrical preem. There are now 160,000 tv set owners in East Germany. Taking into consideration that there are about six persons at one set, number of viewers comes up to one million. TV is already now one of the biggest publicistical means, soon it will be the biggest in East Germany. Hans.

Foreign TV Followup

Sunday Night at the London Palladium

Sunday Night at the London Palladium (12) was virtually an all-Yank night, with four of the five acts American and only comedian Tommy Cooper hoisting the Union Jack. It was an uneven show, with Cooper and Ethel Smith, the wizard of the electric organ, grabbing most of the honors.

With the Tiller Girls kicking off the proceedings in their usual precision fashion, the bill first introduced the Deep River Boys, featuring Harry Douglass. This now familiar act lacked its usual snap in its two numbers. "Everybody's Singing Hallalujah" and "That Itsy-Bitsy Feeling," but it got the bill away to a cheerful start. Next came American comedian Al Bernie, with a relaxed, amiable routine about the joys of being a bachelor. His followup, a song giving him the chance to work in a score of impressions, was less favorable. Some of the impressions were of people not too familiar to British audiences; others, alas, were too familiar and Bernie's interpretations hardly stood up.

Ethel Smith, excellently directed, proved that she has few equals with the electric organ. Her lesson in how to play the organ, with witty patter, introduced some remarkable noise effects and it was a pity that time didn't permit her to play at least a couple of straight numbers. The Barry Sisters, making their British tv debut, are an elegant couple and their choice of songs, "Just Rolling Along," "Fascination Waltz" and "Lazy River of Dreams" was a usefully-balanced program.

Finally Tommy Cooper ostensibly acting as a dumb stooge to a magician, excellently portrayed by Roy Jeffries, registered plenty of yocks, but this act is now already too familiar.

"Beat the Clock" again took up some valuable time not very profitably and Bruce Forsyth, the emcee, while gaining confidence every week still lacks sufficiently powerful comedy material to carry off a likeable, but not over-strong personality. Alfred Locke's production and the musical backing of Cyril Ornadel's Palladium orchestra reached their usual high standard. What the show still needs is a few sock acts. Rich.

Chelsea At Nine

There was a pretty wide range of talent on the bill of Granada-TV's "Chelsea At Nine" show (14), but despite the variety of acts, the offering fell far short of expectations and proved to be an unsatisfying entry which failed to get into its stride.

Heading the layout was Joyce Grenfell, a more than competent performer, who was in good form, but apart from her it was the resident song and dance line, the Granadiers, who gave the show its real sparkle with a couple of well worked out numbers. Miss Grenfell squeezed some good comedy out of a sketch which ribbed BBC's series of visits to the stately homes of Britain. She earned a lot of laughs for her takeoff of the titled lady of the house showing viewers around. It was good observation comedy delivered in Miss Grenfell's inimitable style.

American comedian Jay Lawrence, making his British tv debut, had a tough fight to get laughs with a couple of hackneyed situations, namely a prize fight commentary and a newsreel broadcast. From France came Varel and Bailly and the six well drilled Les Chanteurs De Paris who made a mild contribution to the offering with a couple of unmelodic numbers and a stodgy style of presentation. George Malcolm, the man who has trained the Westminster Cathedral Choir, demonstrated his prowess on the harpsichord with a classical rendering and then spoilt it all by playing his own "jazz" composition made up of practically every jazz cliche in the book. A little bit of fire was added to the show by the Trio Caprichos Espagnol. Bary.

A—Z
With Alan Melville, Lys Assia, Larry Adler, Eamonn Andrews, Robert Atkins, Adrianne Allen, Anna Massey, Daniel Massey, Gerald Moore, Eric Robinson Orch, Beryl Kaye Dancers Writer: Alan Melville
Producer: Bryan Sears
45 Mins., Wed., 7:30 p.m.
BBC-TV, from London

The BBC has taken a safe step by starting a new series of "A-Z" programs and is assured of a sizable following as it progresses through the alphabet, introducing artists whose names tally with the letter of the week. The show, which is based on an idea by Wolf Mankowitz, had a successful 26 weeks run last year, when some of the top names of show business were featured. Alan Melville, who apart from emceeing the offering, makes considerable comedy contributions, has a sharp wit and a glib tongue, while Bryan Sears' production is tidy.

In the first of the new series, which naturally dealt with the letter "A", there was a good cross section of entertainment featured. The only direction in which the program could be faulted was in its order of presentation, which opened with a longish filmed interview with Adrienne Allen and her children Anna and Daniel Massey —a theatrical trio who chatted informally with Melville about their homelife and careers. Another interview was with Robert Atkins, who runs the Open Air Theatre at London's Regent's Park. Musical items were supplied by Larry Adler who gave a polished performance of some of his own compositions; songstress Lys Assia who warbled well on a couple of catchy numbers; and w.k. accompanist Gerald Moore, who had some amusing recollections and played a waltz by Schubert.

Fred Astaire was featured in a clip from "Carefree," and versatile radio and tv personality Eamonn Andrews did a standout job of storytelling about the drinking habits of an Irishman. But by far the best spot in the show was supplied by Melville with a scathing takeoff of Armand and Michaela Denis. He played both parts and his mimicry was perfect. The Eric Robinson orch was excellent throughout. Bary.

DER TOD AUF DEM RUMMELPLATZ
(The Death In The Amusement Park)
With Werner Peters, Heinz Drache, Stanislav Ledinek, Paul Edwin Roth, Renate Kuester, Ursula Lillig, Wilhelm Grothe, Helga Keck, Hanns Lothar, others
Writer: Harald Vock
Director: Joachim Hess
45 Mins., Sun., 8:45 p.m.
West German TV, from Hamburg

The first vidpic produced by NWRV (North West German Radio) is very successful. Made in Hamburg's Real studios, it's a convincing thriller that can stand comparison with so many an American item of same category. Special compliments also for atmosphere and dialog which, both unusually tight, contribute much to the overall success. It was written, incidentally, by Harald Vock, a former police reporter. One can see that at many occasions.

Story has been taken from the files of the German crime department. Only names of persons and localities have been changed, everything else is true. It concerns a young girl who carelessly takes to an amusement park 900 D-Marks which by her chef's order should actually have been brought to the bank. The money in her possession becomes her fate: she is robbed and murdered. There are several suspects and complications until the murderer is finally caught.

Direction by Joachim Hess is first-class. He keeps the action running at full speed. Cast includes several well-known stage and film names, such as Werner Peters, Heins Drache, Stanislav Ledinek and Paul Edwin Roth. All are very convincing. Also production dress is fine. In all, a well-made and suspenseful detective vidpic, considerably beyond the German average. Hans.

Boston—Leonard M. Zelick, former news specialist and staff announcer with Triangle Publications' WFBG-AM-TV, Altoona, Pa., was named news editor of WBZ-WBZA Friday (17) by Paul G. O'Friel gen. mgr. of the Boston and Springfield outlets of Westinghouse.

What Happened In St. L.? Exhib Puts CBS on Spot

Washington, Oct. 21.

The Federal Communications Commission and—for the first time—the U. S. Supreme Court are juggling a new television hot potato (a la Harris Subcommittee).

This is the St. Louis channel 11 donnybrook, best known for influence charges against Tex McCrary and CBS. But it's also fat with significant legal questions about FCC's powers.

CBS was awarded channel 11 in March, 1957, but later that year—without starting construction of the station—received FCC approval to buy KWK-TV, channel 4, and transfer channel 11 to 220 Television, Inc., one of the original unsuccessful applicants.

St. Louis Amusement Co., another loser in the channel 11 contestant, has been swinging away at CBS ever since.

Amusement Co., a pix exhibitor, was floored twice by the U. S. Court of Appeals here after FCC spurned its objections to the channel 11 transactions.

Now, Amusement is up and battling again—on two fronts and with ammunition garnered from the Harris subcommittee hearings last spring.

The two fronts:

Earlier this month, it asked the Supreme Court to review a July 8 ruling by the appeals court which had disallowed Amusement's right to challenge the validity of the channel 11 transfer. Upholding FCC's position, the bench said that as the law is now written and interpreted, Amusement was not a "party in interest." When a station is sold, FCC can only consider whether the designated purchaser is qualified—not the arguments of others who might want the channel.

In asking for Supreme Court review, Amusement claims it was a "party in interest" and had a right to intervene in the disposition of channel 11. The exhibitor argued it was an original contestant for the outlet, and if the license ultimately were voided, might win a second go-round.

Furthermore, Amusement accused McCrary, CBS President Frank Stanton and Board Chairman William S. Paley of concocting a plan for McCrary to see three FCC members while the original channel 11 decision was pending late in 1956.

"To say the least," Amusement appealed, "the action has the odor of an attempt to tamper with the Commission."

This is the first time charges stemming from the Harris hearings have officially been called to the attention of the Supreme Court.

Front two:

Amusement fired two more petitions at FCC. One, on Oct. 2, called for forfeiture of the license for channel 11. The other, filed last Wednesday (15), was broader, demanding complete revocation of the permit and its subsequent switch to 220 Television. Both raised the charges about McCrary's conferences with FCC members, declaring the episodes were "unethical, improper and unlawful."

CBS, in its reply last Thursday (16) to the first petition, said the influence charges were "wholly without foundation." The web said McCrary was not acting as its agent but as a newsman when he talked to then FCC Chairman George C. McConnaughey, and members T. A. M. Craven and John C. Doerfer (now chairman). And Amusement, it said, was seemingly assuming a "gadfly role" basing its allegations on a "distorted version" of the house testimony.

Tape May Succeed Where Telepix Failed on Music-Variety Formats

Except for a few notable cases like Liberace, musical and variety formats have hardly been successful syndicated telefilm fare, and consequently the market is virtually barren in that respect. But chances are that singers and comedians are going to play a major part in video tape syndication, at least in its formative stages.

For one thing, it's reported that Guy Mitchell is going to do a half-hour tape series for syndication, with KTLA in L. A. producing. Word is that General Artists Corp. has signed the singer for the series, but there is no information on the distributor at the moment. A second report is that GAG is also trying to make a deal with KTLA for Julius LaRose.

A deal like Mitchell's has certain advantages in tap syndication. While it's true singers have not been lucky on film, they have had substantial success in live formats. It seems audiences like their tv music and standup comedics to have the feel of instantaneous telecasting. Since the hi-fi qualities of tape so closely approximate live, industryites are thinking of other syndication deals involving singers and comedians.

An equally important factor in picking such types for tape is that production for musical and straight comedy shows is perhaps half the cost of a show carrying a storyline, and the former can be done in the facilities of a local tv station such as KTLA or KTTV, L. A. At the outset therefore, syndicators feel they should eschew the expensive dramatic shows on which they built their catalogs.

These anticipated steps are considered in keeping with the simplified formats of the handful of tape shows that are already on the market. Even at this early stage in the tape game, the industry is running out of fresh concepts for courtroom recreations and is forced to seek other inexpensive, easily produceable ideas.

munerative as its U.S. owned & operated stations.

Initially, the Australian government allocated only six tv stations, three in Sidney and three in Melbourne. The pattern is two commercial and one government-run station in each city. In the new grants, 10 stations have been allocated in all. Following the same pattern as in Sidney and Melbourne, three have been designated for Brisbane, three for Adelaide, and in both Perth and Hobart, one commercial and one government station have been allocated. It is not known at this time whether the Australian government will exercise its own allocations and invest immediately in the Perth and Hobart non-commercial outlets. But they will, it was reported, in Brisbane and Perth.

The Melbourne Herald, which already has Aussie tv interests, will own the controlling share in one of the Brisbane stations and a secondary share in one of the Adelaide stations. It's understood that various other Aussie newspapers have bought heavily into the newly granted outlets.

Most of the stations are expected to go on the air with 12 months, at the outside 14 months.

purchased at least four floors of a Milan skyscraper (on which the antennas have been erected) plus nearby sites on which to build sound stages and studios. Reported value of the entire Milan TVL setup is over $1,500,000.

Another factor entering the current fracas is the long-standing feud between Rome and Milan over which city was to rule the Italo television picture. Matter has been the subject of a hot and furious intramural battle within RAI-TV ranks for some years now, and is surely to be revived under present circumstances. Observers here however feel that at least with regard to commercial video in this country, Milan, with its heavy industrial dominance will win out over Rome, and that the HQ of the inevitable commercial network-to-come, regardless of who runs it, will be in the North-Italian center.

Whatever the future developments of the hotly debated local-tv picture, with its many bureaucratic facets keeping details and facts under wraps for so long, it's pointed out here that the undoubted winner will be the Italian public, which has long been clamoring for a second and more varied television outlet.

WQXR-FM's Bid

A request to the FCC by WQXR-FM, N.Y., for a power increase, since it is the first request of its kind, has been taken as a sign that FM is beginning to shed its timid "step sister" mantle in an effort to become more competitive with AM. Station, belonging to the N. Y. Times, last week applied for the right to triple its effective radiated power, which if it happens, the station says would make FM coverage "compatible" with the coverage of WQXR-AM's 50 kw beam.

In its FCC application, the FM'er said that the grant to increase power would add 300,000 potential listeners to its lineup.

mouth proved even more important than display ads. On her second outing she had them in her camp to knock "GE Theatre" down to second place in the competitive Sunday night 9 to 10 race.

Chi's Color Display Ads

Chicago, Oct. 21.

Apparent increase this year in purchase of daily paper ads to plug new shows finds stations making like big spenders in print with pretentious buys. WBKB, the ABC anchor in Chi, broke the color barrier last week with a full page, two-color ad in the Sun-Times for its new "Weather By Radar" telecasts. It's the first time a Chi station has ever bought color in the daily gazettes and one of the few times a whole page was purchased for a single show.

Late evening strip of "Radar," by the way, was a fast sellout even before the show went on the air, with Martin Oil buying two nights a week and Home Federal Savings the other three.

Minneapolis—In a different combined public service-entertainment disk jockey show approach for this area, WDGY record spinner Bill Diehl is using his Saturday night 10 o'clock three-hour request program to raise funds for the Minnesota Association for the Mentally Retarded. Dialers send Diehl 25c in order to have their requested numbers played.

ment's expulsion of CBS and Associated Press representatives "and reduce further the amount of information available to the American people about Soviet Russia."

Russians now insist that newsmen obtain prior okays from the Soviet Export Film for every story on which they plan photographic coverage and submit all exposed film and narration for approval.

Even if the film is approved, it would thus be delayed in shipping at least 24 hours and Soviets also are asking for $1,000 for each 100 meters (328 feet) of exposed film shot made in USSR, regardless of how much footage is used on the air.

This on top of what has been happening recently in Moscow (banishing of CBS' Daniel Schoor and Paul Niven and closing down of CBS' News Bureau, plus numerous other Communist ukases) has been making an always tough and tension-ridden situation considerably tougher and grimmer problem for U. S. newsmen covering the Soviet Union.

metropolitan booksellers are elated with results. This year book sellers stocked up in advance and thus weren't caught flatfooted as in the case of Stendahl last year. Early morning ratings also indicate a constantly growing audience for all aspects of learning and consequently major colleges in the metropolitan area are prepping for more ambitious courses for the spring term over commercial tv outlets.

Regents of New York State are reportedly satisfied with results of their current program structure over WPIX and now are doing their utmost to promote more and more tv receivers desperately needed in classrooms and assembly halls.

Nor is META been idle this fall on the commercial channels. Its most recent endeavor was the introduction of a Russian course for college credit over WPIX. Additionally, META is presenting French lessons, a contemporary theatre analysis and look-sees at both Latin America and the Far East over WPIX, and all presented with academic stature.

When Sam Cooke Digges, Fred Thrower, Bill Davidson, et al, meet at the next industry convention, they'll be wearing blue blazers, dirty buckskin shoes and peeking at Latin "ponies," according to insiders.

Gleason

around as in 'The Honeymooners,' and that goes for everybody you can think of. Ed Sullivan is a good example—the guys out here know that Ed typifies them. When the girls first went for a skinny kid like Sinatra it was great for the guys who said to themselves that he's just another feller. That was the keynote to Bogart and many another start. The only two exceptions of real goodlooking guys I can think of are Gable and Robert Taylor and both just happen to be very fine actors—you have to be, let's say, to make you believe a handsome profile gent like Taylor is "Billy the Kid,' and you know the public believed it."

Gleason has more views: (1) Three-dimensional tv may keep the present sponsorship system going and stave-off pay-see; and (2), "I then see a complete turnaround and the comeback of the live theatre, in such proporation that the same thing that drove them from the theatre will work in reverse—television will drive them back into the theatres. Actors and writers will have gotten so wealthy from the electronic medium that they will be the ones to accept the challenge of a return to the live theatre. They will be the ones who will anticipate the public's disenchantment with getting its mass entertainment piped into the home. By then everybody will be so stereoed-up and do-it-yourself, electronics-at-home shows and showmanship that they'll welcome getting out of the house. Nostradamus Gleason has spoken!"

WRCA-TV'S BANNER 9-MONTH BILLINGS

Most successful nine-month period in WRCA-TV's history has just been completed with billings up 14% for first three quarters of this year over the same period in 1957.

William N. Davidson, NBC veep in charge of WRCA and WRCA-TV, said sales records were established for every month of 1958 with September registering an alltime high by showing an increase of 22% over the corresponding 30 days in 1957.

Davidson attributed the billing upsurge to considerable increase in share-of-audience with an overall rise for the three-quarter period of 14% over the same nine months of 1957, according to ARB. He said "Hi Mom," "Dr. Joyce Brothers" and the "Jack Paar Show" contributed considerably to the boost in audience.

Sandy Sheldon's $31,500 Suit Vs. Frank Cooper

Producer Sandy Sheldon is suing Frank Cooper Associates for $31,500 over alleged failure to pay him for participating in the making of "Keep It In the Family," stanza on ABC-TV earlier this year. Suit came to light when N. Y. Justice Justice Henry Clay Greenberg denied a motion by Cooper to dismiss the complaint.

Sheldon said in his suit that Cooper failed to fulfill an oral agreement concerning Sheldon's participation in the development of a format. Deal, Sheldon said, carried the proviso that if the stanza was aired, he was to produce it at $500 a week if it was sustaining and for more coin if it was sponsored.

Since the program was a sustainer, Sheldon is asking the $6,500 allegedly promised him as producer and another $25,000 for "wrongful use and appropriation" of his ideas.

Gardner & Levy: New TV Producers With a Big Respect for $3,000,000

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Most producers moving into television from other media, particularly motion pictures, are quick to criticize the medium, and more specifically, the tv sponsors and ad agencies. Exception to the rule is the producing team of Jules Levy and Arthur Gardner, making their teledebut with "The Rifleman" and finding the criticism unfounded, and in their opinion, unjustified.

Gardner & Levy deal through three agencies, Benton & Bowles, Gardner and Geoffrey Wade, though most of their liaison is funneled through the former, and have found Madison Ave. helpful, rather than restrictive. "We've submitted 17 scripts to date, and on 98% of them, the comments from the agencies have been constructive and helpful. They've dealt with suggestions on how a characterization can be sharpened, or a plot detail made clearer."

Gardner & Levy feel that a producer moving into television should accept the medium on its own terms, rather than criticizing it indiscriminately. "Television is basically an advertising medium. If the producer wants to make a shocker, or any other kind of product that doesn't belong in the livingroom, he should simply leave television and do a feature film. But when he's working for an advertiser who's shelling out $3,000,000 a year for a series, he's certainly got to respect the wishes of that advertiser.

"These people know what they're walking into. They know that the advertiser is buying programs to sell his product, and he's after the kind of entertainment that sells his product best. If they can't accept television on those terms, why are they working in the medium? They should be doing pictures or plays." Team, incidentally, has produced several indie films through United Artists.

Producers concede that the western formula may not require as much restrictive policy on the part of agencies and sponsors as an anthology series, but they insist that's also beside the point. As long as the advertiser is paying the freight, what he says should go, they feel.

NBC Press Junket

estaters additional go-rounds with talent and announcements at the shindigs. For example, at Sunday's Colgate brunch at Sardi's East, George Burns, Peter Lawford and Phyllis Kirk did the table-hopping routine so that virtually every newsman in the house got a crack at each of them.

On Saturday night, first official night of the junket, Perry Como hosted a buffet at the Essex House doing a standup routine all evening with the visiting firemen. On Sunday, it was Steve Allen at the Hawaiian Room of the Hotel Lexington. Monday, Gillette hosted a sports dinner at Leone's, following an NBC Radio luncheon where the web planted a star at each table, brought its "Bandstand" band into the Persian Room of the Plaza for entertainment, and set up a round-robin of NBC foreign correspondents, in the flesh and via transatlantic phone, for a quickie report on the state of the world. All of which gave the newsmen more copy than any of them could handle, even if they had the strength.

Agenda for the rest of the week doesn't involve a letup until Saturday, what with the tv affiliates meetings, a banquet, and other activities. As the topper, the newsmen get a weekend at the Concord Hotel in Kiamesha Lake in which to recuperate.

Editorial Torch

saleable programming segment, that it gives both the station and the advertiser stature and a social conscience, and that it has greater power than editorials of the print media. "Anonymity is sterility," Renick said, "and that is the shortcoming of newspaper editorials." Renick said broadcast editorials were necessary and natural functions of stations in communities covered by only a single newspaper or in those in which the corporate ownership of two gazettes had merged.

Yet, for all its evident virtues, the RTNDA body continued to view the "big new idea" as a problem child.

Harold E. Fellows, prez and board chairman of National Assn. of Broadcasters, nailed down the principal danger in an address on Friday (17), at the same time stressing the importance of full news coverage at stations at a time when the public's need for information is "greater than ever." By clear implication, Fellows cautioned that it could be harmful to the cause of broadcasting when unqualified stations—i.e., those unequipped for full news service—undertake editorializing. "Knowledge," he said, "begets the right to opinion."

"The purpose of making events known is to dispel ignorance," Fellows said, in point of which he urged that editorials be understood as a means of clarifying as well as advocating, that "within reason it should be the established policy of a broadcasting station to give all the pertinent and valuable viewpoints." He said that any matter which deserved editorial comment ought to be assigned enough time for delineation so that reasons as well as conclusions could be made clear.

Among the hard realities the cause of editorializing has yet to buck is the general knowledge that newspaper editorials are among the least read features of the average gazette. In a day of ratings-mindedness this truth casts a decidedly negative vote at many stations and damns the whole concept, regardless of its other virtues.

Said Fellows in re this problem: "Those who read editorials are normally a part of the leadership group in any given community. There is a qualitative aspect to be considered . . . The broadcaster should anticipate that the facility he directs will draw itself to a deserved and valuable reputation for courage and leadership."

wise and since the time of the purchase, Revlon has been trying to get it a nighttime network berth. Trade reports have it that Revlon would like to get it or the "Keep Talking" program currently being aired sustaining CBS-TV, Tuesday at 8 into the "Question" slot on CBS-TV Sunday at 10, providing both Revlon and P. Lorillard are released from their 26-week commitment on "Question."

Ratings for "Question" have been steadily going down causing the unhappy sponsors to seek either a change in format of the show or a replacement entry.

'Concentration' Vice '21'

Having mothballed "Twenty-One" as a result of sagging ratings and nasty accusations from disgruntled contestants, Pharmaceuticals Inc. is ready to roll with "Concentration," as the Thursday night replacement starting Oct. 30. Jack Barry, who emceed the doomed "Twenty-One," will continue in the same role in the nighttime version of the NBC daytime audience participation program.

Considerable behind the scenes powwowing between Pharmaceuticals Inc. and NBC execs went on before decision was made to bury "Twenty-One" and to replace it with a suitable product. In addition to "Concentration," the sponsor agreed to buy other NBC fare, namely "The Arthur Murray Party" on alternate weeks, plus five alternate-week-quarter-hour periods of three Monday-through-Friday daytime shows, "Treasure Hunt," "Concentration" and "It Could Be You." Hugh Downs will continue to emcee daytime "Concentration," also a Barry-Enright production.

On the law enforcement end, both the District Attorney's office and Grand Jury have been busy quizzing former contestants and program personnel of "Twenty-One," "The $64,000 Challenge," "The $64,000 Question," "Dotto" and other giveaway shows.

This week the police laboratory confirmed that letters James Snodgrass, "Twenty-One" contestant, mailed to himself before the show with pre-fed answers, were not unsealed since the days they were mailed. This damaging bit of evidence has now been passed along to the Grand Jury.

Val Parnell

to be appointed shortly by the Moss Empires board.

Commenting on his resignation, Parnell said this was a great wrench for him after a life-time spent in variety. He had served the music hall all his life as his father, Fred Russell, had done before him.

Parnell recalled that he took over the Palladium at a time when a lot of people were saying that cinema would kill the music hall. He didn't believe that and he was "never more right." He added: "The fact that I am now working in the far wider field of tv does not mean I have lost faith in the people's desire to see live performances and feel the sense of the occasion which a visit to the theatre implies. There is room for both.

"The London Palladium is part of my life, whether for the audience who goes along there, or for the audience that sees it at home. I am proud of the fact that since ATV started, the London Palladium has become the world's greatest vaudeville theatre of the air, just as it is the world's greatest vaudeville theatre of the living stage."

Treyz

has worked, too, Treyz contends, and backs up his claim with figures to prove that ABC-TV's percentage increase in viewers has risen more sharply than that of the other two networks.

"We're certainly trying to be creative," Treyz declared. "We're not interested in carbon copies. For example, we haven't gone out and tried to find another Loretta Young. It's all a question of quality, if we can't program quality, we'll stay at home, 'Colt .45,' for example, is a quality item in the eyes of the public."

Treyz described the WLW-A affiliate as "one of the most loyal affiliates we have" when it comes to programming network offerings.

to government control because stations must be licensed.

The fact that radio and tv are intended to "observe government in action, report is performance and criticize if need be, government officials and politicians take a keen "and sometimes obtrusive interest in broadcasting," he pointed out.

Fellows also made the point that the space age's onset makes people increasingly dependent upon radio and tv for reports and comment and requires a strong, vigorous broadcasting system, "not one perforated by meaningless legislation and regulation."

McGannon and his colleagues met with the ambassador in the latter's dining quarters at the embassy in Washington. Menshikov is reported to have said that he personally did not catch "The Plot to Kill Stalin" but had been given an account of the story line. He reportedly said "The Plot to Kill Stalin" was totally inaccurate and the presentation of such a drama was a poor way of maintaining good relations between nations.

fluences reactions to commercials and a situation comedy type show in most instances is a better vehicle for getting across the pitch than a show dealing with violence.

The fight to identify the program with the product sees clients attempting to integrate commercials with the show and using the star of the program in many instances to give the message.

WCAU-TV's Bid On Pubaffairs

Philadelphia, Oct. 21.

WCAU-TV, CBS-owned and operated Philly outlet, has added a Department of Public Affairs headed by John A. Schneider, station's general manager. New department will be responsible for the planning and telecasting of all public affairs programs.

Format of this division is similar to the News and Public Affairs Division at CBS, and is the only one of its kind in the local market area. It is also claimed to be the most intensive operation of its stature attempted by an independent local tv station. In size and resources it is surpassed only by those of the nets.

Personnel of the project include Jack Dolph, program director; Don Lenox, director of public affairs; Charles Shaw, news director, and Margaret Kearney, educational director.

Program roster includes "Shop Talk," workers discussing their specialties (live); "FYI," arts session (film); "Big Blackboard," with educational authorities exploring varied fields; "Face of Philadelphia," town's history and problems, with filmed portions; "Return," interviews with famous statesmen of the past on current problems; "Bill Bennett Show," farms and gardens; "What in the World?", return of the Peabody award-winning stanza.

Pharmaceuticals In CBS-TV Daytime Buy

Pharmaceuticals Inc. produced some daytime coin at CBS-TV this week when it purchased a quarter-hour of "Edge of Night" soaper on Mondays and also signed for Tuesday and Thursday alternate quarter-hours on the Arthur Godfrey daytime stanzas.

Pharmaceuticals added to its Godfrey sponsorship with this purchase. Same client also sponsors Godfrey's CBS-TV nighttime show on alternate weeks.

Jocks, Jukes and Disks

By MIKE GROSS

Bernie Nee (Joy). "THRU A PRAYER" (Hawthorne*) is a neatly constructed and delivered religioso item that could pick up spinning time as the Christmas season approaches. "THE VISION OF BERNADETTE" (Joy*) is also in the inspirational vein and strikes a sincere mood.

McGuire Sisters (Coral). "I'LL THINK OF YOU" (Kahi†) has a neat lilt and a typical McGuire Sisters' approach that will guarantee spins. "SWEETIE PIE" (Melrose*) has a gay bounce that should spring up in some jukes.

Kirby Stone Four (Columbia). "THE PUSSYFOOT" (Mills*) is a lively entry out of the Broadway tuner, "Goldilocks," that gets a lot of spark from the group's zippy treatment. "DON'T CRY JOE" (Harms*) should have some spinning appeal for the anti-Top 40 jockeys.

The Four Coins (Epic). "THE WORLD OUTSIDE" (Chappell*) is another version of the updated "Warsaw Concerto" that could make some noise. "ROSELLE" (Peer†) runs around in too many directions for any impact.

Tony Martin (RCA Victor). "LOLITA" (Warren†) is an overly sticky ballad that the crooner takes too seriously. Even the title link with the bestselling novel of the same name won't help. "SHE SERVES A NICE CUP OF TEA" (Alamo*) has a novel lyric idea and will get a number of jocks to dish it out on their turntables.

Johnny Desmond (MGM) "C'EST SI BON CHA CHA" (Leeds*) brings the oldie up to date with a cha cha beat and will pick up spins if the trend started by "Tea for Two" lasts. "BLACK HAIRED BEAUTY" (Studio†) is set in marching tempo that doesn't get anyplace melodically or lyrically.

Margie Rayburn (Liberty). "AND HE TOLD ME A LIE" (Monarch*) has a lilting ballad style that Margie Rayburn builds into a spinning potential. "TO EACH HIS OWN" (Paramount*) gets a pleasing revival that makes for tasty programming.

Sylvia Syms (Columbia). "I WISH I KNEW" (Bourne*) is Sylvia Syms' first start for Columbia and it's molded out of a ballad form that fits her styling so the jocks ought to give it a try. "LATELY" (Alamo*) has the slow ballad feel that usually appeals to the late-hour spinners.

The Gaylords (Mercury). "I'M LONGING FOR LOVE" (Robbins*) has a chance for a spinning stepout because of the sprightly spirit in beat and delivery. "L'AMORE" (Tempo*) continues the Italian mood with a fair lilter.

Johnny Sardo (Warner Bros.). "I WANNA ROCK" (Witmark*) has the familiar rocking action that goes over well with the teen mob. "USED HEART" (Sheldon†) follows the rocking ballad pattern in a way that could build a following for the new singer.

Jackie Clark (XYZ). "PAJAMA PARTY" (Conley†) whips up the kind of musical and lyric angles that the teeners understand so it may get to go places in the spinning market. "WALKIE TALKIE" (Conley†) is a swinger with sure-fire juke appeal.

The Sparks (Arwin). "SOMETHING HAPPENED" (Daywin†) is an okay entry in the rocking vocal group idiom and it may pick up teener approval. "ROBIN RED BREAST" (Sparrow†) flies at a brisk pace pegged for teen terping.

Norman Brooks (Scope). "BELLA MADELAINE" (Interdisca†) brings back Norman Brooks in a happy adaptation of the French oldie, "Alouette." "BLUEBIRD OF HAPPINESS" (T. B. Harms*) tries to spread its wings again in this Jolsoneque styling but its takeoff chances are slim.

Danny Davis Orch (Cabot). "TRUMPET CHA - CHA - CHA" (Saxon†) is part of the cha-cha-cha disk kick and Danny Davis' trumpeting makes it worth a spin. "LONESOME TRUMPET" (Vista†) is in a bluesy groove with Davis tootling effectively.

The Goofers (Port). "SCOTCH ON THE ROCKS" (Melhedd*) bagpipes its way through some wild musical action that could appeal to the juke trade. "THE HEAD HUNTERS" (Roncom*) could capture some listeners who dig musical frenzy.

Bobby & His Orbits (Seeco). "BANDSTAND DANCING" (Garlock†) ties in with teener fads in melody and lyric angles so Bobby & His Orbits should get to mean something with the blue jean set. "FELICIA" (Garlock†) has the rocking flavor that should help the group win its place in the teenage sun.

Tommy Wade (Style): "THIS ISN'T THE FIRST TIME" (Rosemeadow*), a clever ballad with a strong beat, is handled in swinging style. Could be big. "BEGINNING TO SEE THE LIGHT" (Alamo*) is a nifty workover of the standard.

Baker Knight (Jubilee): "MY HEART CRIES FOR YOU" (Massey*), a hit several years ago, returns with a slightly rocking beat in this good vocal by Baker Knight. "AIN'T NOTHING BUT LOVE" (Random†) is a routine fast-tempoed entry.

*ASCAP. †BMI.

Best Bets

GEORGE HAMILTON IV ..... THE TWO OF US (ABC-Paramount) ..... Lucy, Lucy

George Hamilton's "The Two Of Us" (Sequence) hits a soft ballad mood with the kind of crooning touch that will take it for a big payoff. "Lucy, Lucy" (Greta†) is a pretty, folk-styled item with lots of listening appeal.*

PEGGY LEE ..... LIGHT OF LOVE (Capitol) ..... Sweetheart

Peggy Lee's "Light of Love" (Singleton†) is a bright, swinging entry fashioned in the gospel groove and built for strong play on all levels. "Sweetheart" (Portrait†) has a nifty beat making it a spinning natural.

THE CHANELS ..... THE REASON (Deb) ..... Skiddily Doo

The Chanels' "The Reason" (Draxon-Freida†) is another of those rocking ballad offerings that come out of left field for a big score. The new group is sure to build plenty of teener excitement. "Skiddily Doo" (Draxon-Earl†), however, won't mean much anyplace.

FONTANE SISTERS ..... JEALOUS HEART (Dot) ..... Encore D'Amour

The Fontane Sisters' "Jealous Heart" (Acuff-Rose†) is one of the best rides given this much-covered country item and will get plenty of spinning action. "Encore D'Amour" (Tule†) works up an okay lilt for some turntable attention.

THE GALANES BROS ..... TING A LING A TANGO (Leeds) ..... Fire In The Night

The Galanes Bros' "Ting A Ling A Tango" (Leeds) shapes as a winner with its attractive little tango flavor and expert delivery. "Fire In The Night" (Leeds*) glows with some okay dramatic effects but it doesn't look like too hot a commercial prospect.*

GERRY & EDDIE ..... I'M AS READY AS I'LL EVER BE (Sunbeam) ..... Nobody Else Can Handle This Job

Gerry Granahan & Eddie Fontaine's "I'm As Ready As I'll Ever Be" (Columbine†) works the rocking beat in a solid manner that will develop into hot jock and juke item. "Nobody Else Can Handle This Job But Me" (Sunbeam†) is hot enough in melody and delivery to light up the jukes.

Album Reviews

The Christmas disk competition seems to be getting stiffer each season and the companies are warming up to the battle by getting their product into the stores early. Among the standout Yule packages in the October release are Harry Belafonte's "To Wish You A Merry Christmas" (RCA Victor) with Belafonte in top form on an attractive Yule program; Johnny Mathis' "Merry Christmas" (Columbia) in which the crooner takes over 12 seasonal standards and caresses 'em in his bestselling disk fashion; Tennessee Ernie Ford's "The Star Carol" (Capitol) concentrates on the more serious side of the season and the fans who took to his packages of spirituals and hymns before will make this a hot Xmas package; Mitch Miller's "Christmas Sing-Along With Mitch" (Columbia) follows the pattern established by his previous join-in-song sets and should do extremely well in the market. The 26 items are sung with the proper spirit by the pros in the groove and the set is handsomely packaged so that the lyrics to all the tunes are easily read for the sing-along; Alan Mills' "Christmas Songs From Many Lands" (Folkways) is another attractive item for the disk buyer. It's in a more esoteric groove than the others but Mills' global Christmas (sung in English by the way) makes for delightful listening.

Jimmie Rodgers: "Sings Folk Songs" (Roulette). Although Jimmie Rodgers has clicked in the pop field, he's retained the folk flavor of his country background. In this package he shows his flair with a style that will appeal to the adults as well as his teenage fans. "Waltzing Matilda," "Lord Randall" and "Black Is The Color" are in the 12-tune wrapup.

Tab Hunter: (Warner Bros.) This package probably would be a big item with the young femmes on the basis of the Tab Hunter name and the cover photo of his face alone. In addition to the marquee lure, however, Hunter also shows that he has an appealing way with a song. Working with an orch and chorus directed by Marty Wilson, Hunter whips into the ballad and rhythm items with an ingratiating spirit that attracts attention. The standout repertoire of evergreens also helps his cause.

Creed Taylor Orch: "Shock Music In Hi-Fi" (ABC-Paramount). Here's an offbeat instrumental package that will appeal to those tiring of the mood music flood. The compositions are mostly the work of Kenyon Hopkins and Creed Taylor with aid of sound effects and screaming women gives it a wierd and moody feel. Titles such as "Heartbeat," "Haunted House" and "In Bedlam" set the tone of the package.

Charles Paul: "Console Magic" (RCA Victor). The organ, which has been getting new recognition in the disk market via its spotlighting in Perez Prado's clicko "Patricia," is effectively showcased in this package by Charles Paul. His musicianship is ably demonstrated on a string of standards that range in mood from "Stars Fell On Alabama" to "Ain't Misbehavin'."

Cyril Stapleton Orch: "Just For You" (London). For those who can't get enough of mood music, this new Cyril Stapleton package should be just their dish. His style is clean and crisp with a proper romantic tone or an appropriate riff as the arrangement demands. It all adds up to easy and pleasant listening.

The Four Aces: "The Swingin' Aces" (Decca). This package was cut before Al Alberts, group's leader, scrammed for solo disking on Coral. His lead vocalizing in this set helps steer the group through such fine items as "I'll String Along With You," "Amapola," "I'm Confessin'," and "Gone With The Wind." It's a solid LP for those who like standard pops by a standout group.

Eddie Bergman Orch: "Let's Face The Music and Dance" (Coral). By blending waltzes, fox-trots, dixieland and rhumba, Eddie Bergman has come up with a lilting LP pegged for home terping. The beat is unpretentious but slickly developed. He works through full songs and medleys by such as Cole Porter, Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern and Richard Rodgers.

Benny Fields & His Minstrel Men: (Golpix). The touch of nostalgia, and the marquee lure of the "Minstrel Men," Jack Benny, Milton Berle, George Burns and Phil Silvers, ought to help this set roll across the counters. Benny Fields, the interlocutor, sustains the minstrel flavor in patter and song and the guest shots add up to good recorded fun.

Buddy Charles - Ace Harris: "Zonky!" (Audio-Fidelity). A lot of zingy keyboard sounds have been assembled by Buddy Charles and Ace Harris for this "Zonky!" set. Their jazz feel rolls along the ivories with precise strokes and such faves as "Honeysuckle Rose," "Chinatown, My Chinatown," "One O'Clock Jump" and "Perdido" seem to benefit by their touch.

Warren Barker Orch: "Waltzing Down Broadway" (Warner Bros.). Mood music fans and showtune buffs are in for a treat. Warren Barker's interpretation of waltzes out of Broadway musicals is a pleasing peg and should delight disk buyers as well as deejays hungry for new programming material. Barker's selections are culled from a dozen of the top musicals of the past decade. Gros.

Mrs. Victor Young Sues Decca on '80 Days' Coin

Los Angeles, Oct. 21.

Decca Records is caught in the middle of a hassle between the Mike Todd and Victor Young estates over royalties due on Young's "Around the World in 80 Days" album.

Mrs. Rita Young, widow of the late composer and administratrix of his estate, brought action against Decca in Superior Court here last week, charging diskery was $16,856 behind in payment of royalties.

While acknowledging that amount of royalties owed by record company was that stipulated in suit, Decca, through its v.p. Lu Gilman, reported that its N. Y. office had been instructed by the Todd estate that all royalties from the album should be paid to them. Consequently, the diskery is withholding all payments until the two estates settle the matter.

Modugno Leaving For Rome on 'Volare' Film

Domenico Modugno, who made a worldwide splash with the "Nel Blu Dipinto Di Blu" song, is returning to Rome within the next couple of days to star in a pic titled after the English version of his hit, "Volare." He wound up his personal appearances in the New York area yesterday (Tues.) at the Walker Theatre in Brooklyn.

Modugno's "Nel Blu" hit for Decca, one of the fastest breakthrough disks in recent years, has now gone over the 2,000,000 copy mark.

PUBS' DISK-IT-YOURSELF KICK

Music Trust Funds Due for Major Revamp in AFM Pacts for Disks, Vidpix

The Music Performance Trust Funds, which have been part of the American Federation of Musicians contracts for well over a decade, are due to be drastically cut back in the upcoming negotiations of the AFM with both the disk industries and the vidpix producers. The Funds, originally conceived by former AFM prexy James C. Petrillo as a way of combatting the effects of canned music, now collect royalties from both the diskers and the vidpix makers and allocates the coin for cuffo concerts in which union musicians are used.

Several straws in the wind indicate that the television Trust Fund may be completely scrapped in the bargaining process. The newly elected AFM prexy Herman D. Kenin has already indicated that he's willing to trade trust fund payments for more tooter employment and has already entered into several deals along these lines with the Music Corp. of America and Jack Webb's vidpix operation.

The AFM is asking the vidpix makers to use live music rather than canned library material on their background soundtracks, in return for which the Trust Fund is giving up its 5% bite of gross sales. Many Coast musicians have attacked the Funds on the grounds that the 5% royalty practically forced the tv film producers to use library music, much of it recorded overseas.

The AFM negotiations with the disk industry are due to open in a couple of weeks after both sides finish amassing statistical data to support their bargaining positions. Some disk industry execs have indicated they will not oppose the continuation of the Trust Fund, but they certainly will reject any proposition to increase royalty payments beyond the approximately 1% now in force. One disk exec, moreover, stated that he wanted to see the working musicians get the money that was diverted to the Funds in the last contract talks five years ago. At that time, the equivalent of a 20% wage increase for the studio tooters was channeled into the Funds. This was one of the major irritations that led to the setup of a new union, The Musicians Guild of America, on the Coast.

Speaking before a membership meeting at Local 802, N. Y., Monday night, Kenin said he would ask for a 21% wage increase to go direct to the recording musicians.

RCA 6,000-Store Tie With Botany to Push LPs By U.S.-Touring Melachrino

RCA Victor has wrapped up another advertising-promotion tie-in with a non-show biz company to push mood music packages by Melachrino during the British bandleader's current tour of the U.S. In cooperation with Botany 500, manufacturers of men's wear, Victor is preparing a special 45 EP, highlighting selections from six of Melachrino's LPs. The disks will be distributed through approximately 6,000 Botany retail outlets.

Both Victor and Botany have pencilled in an extensive advertising campaign in the consumer mags and on tv to spotlight the Melachrino EP. Melachrino, meantime, will make his first U.S. tv appearance on the Steve Allen show Nov. 2. The British maestro has been one of the consistently bestsellers on the Victor label with his "Music For . . . . ." series, now reaching the 2,000,000 sales marker.

William I. (Bill) Alexander, Victor's ad-promotion-publicity chief, set the tie-in with Botany.

Chi Symph's D.C. 6G

The Chicago Symphony, under Fritz Reiner's baton, grossed a solid $6,000 with its Sunday (19) concert at Constitution Hall here.

It was the symph's final date of a 10-city tour.

Otis to Mercury A&R

Chicago, Oct. 21.

Gap left by the recent departure of Bob Shad from Mercury Records' a&r team has been plugged with Clyde Otis, vet songwriter-conductor, who'll base in New York along with Hal Mooney.

Otis, who has been freelancing during the past 12 years (mostly a&r and baton assignments), cleffed such tunes as "Looking Back," "The Stroll" and "That's All There is to That." Artists he's worked with include Nat King Cole, Johnny Mathis and Elvis Presley.

Jack Webb, AFM In 5-Yr. TV Pact; MGA Signs Schary

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Jack Webb's Mark VII Ltd. has signed a five-year agreement with the American Federation of Musicians calling for the use of live music, and an individual music session for each show.

This marks the third tv company that has made a deal with the AFM since the Musicians Guild of America became the new bargaining agent for musicians in the major studios. Previously, Desilu and Revue agreed to use AFM musicians for scoring of its tv product.

Under this new deal, musicians will be paid $50 per show as a minimum, with a 10% increase in all economic items after three years. The AFM has also eliminated the traditional 5% formula calling for payments to the Music Trust Fund for the new pattern of trading Trust Fund money for live musical work. Negotiations were conducted between J. R. Rodgers, veepee of Mark VII, and Eliot Daniel, prexy of Local 47, AFM.

Meantime, the rival MGA now has signed a collective bargaining agreement with Dore Schary Productions similar to the Sept. 3 pact with the majors. This marks the second indie company to make a deal with MGA. Previously, Hecht-Hill-Lancaster signed with the Guild.

JOY, TRINITY, LEEDS IN SPIN

The logic of the current music biz is forcing more and more publishers to become diskers. At the present time a publishing firm without a diskery tie is becoming a rarity.

Latest publishers to enter the disk production biz are George Joy (Joy Music) and Lou Levy (Leeds Music). Another twist in the pub-disk tieup is the production of masters for sale to the disk companies. The Joe Csida-Charlie Grean-Ed Burton firm are the newest entry into this phase of the business.

Joy, like Leeds, is using its publishing tag for the disk label. Joy is bowing with Bernie Nee's "Thru A Prayer" backed with "The Vision of Bernadette" while Leeds is hitting the market with sides by the Galanes Bros. and the Page Cavanaugh Trio.

The move into the disk biz by Joy and Leeds follows the line established by Hill & Range with the Big Top label, Tommy Valando with Sunbeam Records, George Paxton with Co-Ed Records, Larry Spier with the Greenwich label and the forerunner, Mills Music, with its American label.

Leeds' step into the disk production biz is being spearheaded by Hy Grill who has been in charge

UA Taps Altshuler As Ad-Pub Chief

Robert S. Altshuler has stepped into the post of advertising and publicity chief of United Artists Records, the film company's disk subsid. It was the first exec appointment made by Monte Kay since he became v.p. and general manager of the label a few weeks ago. Altshuler is in a new spot and will supervise the packaging of LP albums for UA in addition to handling the ad-publicity chores.

He previously was publicity and promotion director of Prestige and Riverside Records, both prominent in the jazz field. He was formerly a radio announcer in New England and had a jazz show on the air for WLAW, Lawrence, Mass.

Kenny Lutman, who was handling publicity and disk jockey promotion for the UA diskery, has exited the company.

Radio Industry Wants Cutback In ASCAP's Take, But No Blackout Due

The $10,000,000 take of the American Society of Composers, Authors & Publishers from the radio industry will be on the line shortly when negotiations open for a new licensing pact. Even in advance of the talks, the all-industry radio music license committee, repping a cross-section of indie stations throughout the country, has indicated that it will ask for a "substantial reduction" in ASCAP licensing fees. The radio broadcasters have been meeting recently to prepare for the ASCAP talks.

While ASCAP, on its part, has no intention of taking a cut in its present blanket license rate of approximately 2% of the gross, there is little likelihood of a radio blackout of ASCAP tunes such as happened back in 1940. Under the consent decree, ASCAP licensees have the right to ask the N.Y. Federal Court to set reasonable fees if they are dissatisfied with ASCAP proposals.

ASCAP is likely to ask the radio broadcasters to follow the pattern of the tv industry last year in making a virtually straight renewal of the previous contract. The radio industry, particularly a broad segment of indies who favor the "Top 40" format, are not as dependent on the ASCAP catalog as the tv broadcasters, who favor the standards.

For the past few years, ever since the rock 'n' roll vogue began, Broadcast Music Inc. has been dominant on the bestselling disk lists from which the radio programmers work. The proportion of ASCAP to BMI tunes on radio has always been weighted substantially in favor of ASCAP, on an overall basis, but there are numerous outlets now on which BMI tunes get very heavy play.

Jessel's 'Minstrel' LP

Oakland will conduct the session in three weeks.

Nashville Preps 7th Jockey Meet As C&W Booster

Nashville, Oct. 21.

The seventh annual country & western disk jockey convention to be held here Nov. 21-22 will be tied in with the 1,000th program of "Grand Ole Opry" and the fact that the c&w field now racks up $50,000,000 yearly volume.

Bob Cooper, general manager of WSM, which carries the "Grand Ole Opry" program has blueprinted a deejay panel that will include such subjects as "What You Can Do to Make Country Music More Profitable For Your Station," "Successful Country Music Promotions," "Better Methods For Programming Country Music," "What Is Country Music" and "The Growth of Country Music and Its Place In Your Future." "D" Kilpatrick, manager of the "Grand Ole Opry" and head of the Festival Committee, is lining up a roster to participate in the panel discussions. Joe Culligan, veepee of the NBC Radio network, is set as one of the speakers.

As in previous years, the disk companies will host various activities at the conclave. The action is set to begin on the morning of Nov. 21 when Cadence Records will sponsor a breakfast at the Andrew Jackson Hotel. Dot Records will follow with a luncheon at the same inn and then RCA Victor will pour at a cocktailery at the Hermitage Hotel. The same evening, the

Alan Freed Asks Mass. Court to K.O. Indictment In Rock, Roll 'n' Riot Case

Boston, Oct. 21.

Arguments on quashing indictments that were returned against disk jock Alan Freed in connection with the rumpus following his rock 'n' roll show at Boston Arena May 3, were heard by Judge Charles Fairhurst in Suffolk Superior Court yesterday, Monday (20). The judge took the motion under advisement.

Atty. Paul T. Smith, w.k. criminal lawyer, for Freed, sought to have the indictments quashed on the grounds that they violate the declaration of rights in the Massachusetts constitution and the 14th amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Freed was indicted in May on charges of inciting to riot and inciting to destruction of property. He pleaded innocent and was held in $2,500.

Asst. Dist. Atty. Edward M. Sullivan contended that the indictments should be sustained and the case set down for trial.

U.S. A&R Chief to Steer Rank's Brit. Label at Outset; Diskery Buys Distrib

London, Oct. 21.

The Rank Organization's record company, Rank Records, is paging top American artist and repertoire managers to come to Britain to handle the first couple of years of the label's life. Malcolm McGrady, general manager of the label, told VARIETY following Rank's buyout of one of the leading British disk distribution firms, Thompson, Diamond & Butcher.

McGrady intends to fly to the States within the next few days for talks with several a&r men prior to setting a deal with one of them. The plan is for the American to come here and train a successor.

Unlike many other would-be new labels which have had to quit because of an alleged closed-shop operated by distribution companies, the Rank platter outfit, backed by the financial resources of its parent company, has been able to buy its way into business.

Deal legalities will be settled by the end of the month and the company has arranged for J. O. Thompson and J. Diamond, both of whom have been with TD&B since its inception in 1920, to stay on as joint managing directors. No change is visualized in the operating policy or personnel of the disk outlet.

"Top Rank," as the new label has been dubbed, will be on the market early in the new year. No artists have yet been signed because, said McGrady, it would be unfair to the person appointed as a&r manager. He added that the a&r man would be given a free hand.

Barney Young Keeps BMI Busy On the Legal Front; Asks Summary Judgment

Broadcast Music Inc. rarely finds an all quiet on the legal front. Now that the ASCAP songwriters' suit against BMI has become relatively inactive pending various rulings from the courts, publisher Barney Young, a veteran litigant against BMI and others, has begun to stir up the scene with his juridicial barrage.

Last week, Young filed for a motion of summary judgment in his multi-million-dollar antitrust suit against BMI and the major networks. Under such a motion, Young claims that there is no genuine issue of fact in his suit against BMI, et al., and wants the courts to award him the case as a matter of law. The motion is similar to the one made by BMI recently in the ASCAP tunesmiths' suit when it asked for a dismissal of the latter's action on legal rather than factual grounds.

In his suit against BMI, Young is asking for $7,500,000, as well as some other forms of relief, on the grounds that the defendants allegedly conspired to prevent him from engaging competitively in the performance rights business. The suit stems from an attempt by Young several years ago to license his works directly to the broadcasters.

MULTITONE-SILHOUETTE SCANDINAVIAN DEAL

Multitone, a publishing company which is owned jointly by four of Sweden's top diskeries, Metronome, Karusell, Decca and Philips, has acquired the Scandinavian rights to the Silhouette Music catalog, owned by jazz composer Quincy Jones. The Silhouette firm also has numerous originals by Dizzie Gillespie, Horace Silver, Julian Adderley, Ernie Wilkins and others. The Swedish disk companies already have cut much of this material and control most of the recordings available in the U.S.

Multitone also has acquired U.S. pop tunes from Trinity Music, Towne Music and Hecht-Lancaster & Buzzell Music. Deals were made through Claes Dahlgren of Multitone's N. Y. office, Orion Development Corp.

Swedish Philips Buys Sonora of Stockholm

Stockholm, Oct. 21.

The Swedish Philips company has bought the Sonora Record Co. here. Sonora was founded in the early 1930's by Eric Ljundberg who died at the beginning of this year.

Only a few months ago, Sonora made a deal to represent a group of U.S. labels, including Gene Norman Presents, Whippets and Dixieland Jubilee. These deals have also been taken over by Philips. Sonora also operated its own publishing firm.

By MIKE GROSS

Under the prexyship of Arnold Maxin, MGM Records has doubled its take during the January-to-August period of this year compared to a similar period in 1957. According to surveys the level of MGM's pop single sales has been lifted from 1% of the total market to 7% while its album biz has been raised from a little less than 1% of the market to 2.4%.

Maxin, who became MGM topper Jan. 1, is now blueprinting activities for a further buildup of the label in '59. Main objective in Maxin's program is to lift the label into the "upper strata" by developing a major symphony orchestra and to make a dent in the original Broadway cast album field. His plans also include the development of closer relationship between the Metro studio and the diskery.

Along the latter line, Maxin is now working out angles whereby he'll get in on the studio activities before the product is made so that he can figure out diskery tie-ins, such as title songs, theme music and even the possible insertion of one of the label's artists into the production. However, Maxin asserts that the disk-pic tie will not be promoted if the groove values are not apparent. His main interest, he says, is to make a profit for the disk company and secondly to exploit the film.

3 Golden Records

Contributing to MGM's pop single sales rise under Maxin's aegis were three 1,000,000 sellers. They were Connie Francis' "Who's Sorry Now?," Sheb Wooley's "Purple People Eater" and Tommy Edwards' "It's All In the Game."

Currently racking up hefty sales for the company are Conway Twitty's "It's Only Make Believe," Joni James' "There Goes My Heart" and Tommy Edwards' recently released "Love Is All We Need." Label's album line is spearheaded by the "Gigi" soundtrack, which has now passed the 350,000 mark. Also clicking are Maurice Chevalier's "Yesterday" and "Today" sets and Morty Craft's "Jazz In Black Tie."

A contributing factor to the label's sales splash, according to Maxin, is the separation of the pop singles and package goods sales efforts. "They cater to separate markets," he says, "and should get a different sales approach." He added that the pop singles line should be treated like an indie disk operation while the album line needs a class approach.

Handling the sales end for the label are Charles Hasin and Morty Craft. Hasin, as general sales manager, coordinates the pop singles action with Craft who also doubles as diskery's pop artists & repertoire chief. Similar treatment is being given the MGM subsids, Cub, Metro, MetroJazz and he lowprice Lion lines.

Maria Callas' Superstitious Footstool Spirited Away; Air Plea Gets It Back

Atlanta, Oct. 21.

Beginning her first concert dates for the big U.S. gravy payoff, Maria Callas of the Met roster opened the season for the Atlanta Symphony to a sellout, the 5,200 seats of capacity. Her conductor for the occasion, Nicola Rescigno, was also visiting Atlanta for the season's kickoff.

Greek-American diva from Italy sang with one foot perched atop a prized footstool and in a post-concert rush to the stage of some 200 persons a typical Confederate souvenir-collector made off with the stool, spoiling Madame's party which followed.

Callie Huger put news of the misfortune on station WSB, told of its sentimental and superstitious value to singer. Telephone call, purportedly from 70 miles away, admitted copping the stool and —conscience stirred—promising its return. The promise was kept.

It was then shipped to Callas in Manhattan care of her new impresario, Sol Hurok, whose publicists possibly had nothing to do with the whole incident.

Inside Stuff—Music

"Peter Gunn," the NBC-TV series, is sparking lots of disk interest. Music for the show is written by Henry Mancini and published by Northridge Music, one of Larry Shayne's firms. Ray Anthony has cut the theme for Capitol and RCA Victor has an album conducted by Mancini of original music from the first 10 shows. Mitch Miller, Columbia's pop artists & repertoire chief, caught Lola Albright on the first two shows and inked her to a Col pact to sing the songs she performed in the "Gunn" showcasing.

Coral Records has come up with a new recording twist in producing a triple-tracked disk which gives three different endings to the same song. Disk is "Tommy, Richard and Harry," by the Dick Jacobs orch with Peggy Powers on vocal. The endings turn up at random, depending how the needle falls into the groove at the spot where the triple-tracking begins.

Joseph A. McDonald, former treasurer of NBC and now with the Washington law firm of Smith, Hennessey & McDonald, is lecturing on "New Uses of Music," before the Copyright Luncheon Circle at Toots Shor's restaurant in New York, Friday (24). The luncheon is inaugurating the seventh year of meetings held by the Circle.

Karl Otto Westin, Broadway and music columnist for a Swedish daily, the Aftonbladet, has been named U.S. rep for two overseas publishing firms, the Wilhelm Hansen Musik-Forloag in Copenhagen and the Nordiska Musikforlaget in Stockholm. Westin is himself a Scandinavian publisher and a composer of film scores.

Langston Hughes' lecture tour will be tied in with his MGM album, "The Weary Blues With Langston Hughes." The five-month trek is being handled in conjunction with distributors, dealers and disk jockeys. Arrangements also are being made to sell the album in lecture halls and auditoriums where he'll appear.

Gil-Gone's 'Dugongs'

George Pincus has acquired "The Song of The Dugongs" for his Gil Music firm. Tune was inspired by the Reuters dispatch last week of the discovery of the dugongs, mermaid-like creatures, off the coast of Africa.

Song was cut by Jimmy Martin and will be released via George Goldner's Gone Records.

Carlton's Masters

Joe Carlton, prexy of Carlton Records, picked up the master of "My Life Is In Your Hands" by 16-year-old Vic Donna from Jack Angel and Sid Askanas, N.Y. disk producers.

Don Genson, Carlton's Coast rep, latched on to Big Al Downing's slice of "Miss Lucy" from the indie White Rock label.

In the Trinity Music setup, which is run by Csida-Grean-Burton, the disk aim is primarily to make masters for established disk company approval. To develop this push, firm has hired Norman Leyden as a&r director. Leyden is resigning as musical director of the Arthur Godfrey show (CBS-TV) to take over the a&r spot with C-G-B.

Other firms that have established disk outlets for master-disk selling have been Shapiro-Bernstein with its Skidmore label and George Pincus with his Pincus Platters.

newly formed Country Music Assn. will make its bow with a dance for the industry at the Jackson.

The following day, Broadcast Music Inc. will host a breakfast and Columbia Records will come up with a luncheon. WSM takes over in the afternoon with a reception and buffet dinner to be capped with a 7:30 p.m. to midnight visit to the Ryman Auditorium and a performance of "Grand Ole Opry." Efforts are now being made to bring back former members of the program's cast during its 33 years of broadcasting. More than 175 "Opry" stars and sidemen are expected to be on hand for the Ryman Aud shindig.

It's anticipated that more than 2,500 c&w disk jockeys and programmers will attend the meet this year.

Ben Selvin, artists & repertoire chief for the RCA Thesaurus division, headed for the Coast last week to record transcribed shows with Lawrence Welk.

AGVA PUTS CLAMP ON BRIGHT

Fast's New Role a Puzzler; Is It Whip, Watchdog or Heir Apparent

total gross but the forer, all agree.

With the selection of Ernie Fast as assistant national administrative secretary of the American Guild of Variety Artists at the national board meeting, held last week at the Hotel New Yorker, N. Y., the union is regarded as setting its sights on a new course. Not only is the path of one-man rule regarded as on the wane, but Fast's new post is being pictured as the introduction of a "no-man"in the present AGVA regime.

Whether Fast was put in by opposition elements as a possible successor to Bright, as a watchdog, or as a whip remains to be seen. Board members voting for the change have declared that there are still new areas of organization that haven't been explored. Perhaps, they say, Bright has been too busy to take care of all the facets in connection with the job. It is known, for example that even in New York, where Bright is based throughout the year, there are many cafes still without minimum basic agreements. Others have said that representation of more than one area is needed in the top-level deliberations of the executive committee or the administrator's office. Mistakes that have been made, they further declare, could have been avoided had there been some degree of consultation.

Fast is regarded as being an independent thinker in the union. It has been reported that he has stood up to Bright as well as Bright's predecessor Jack Irving on many occasions. It is also well known that when Bright first gained his present post he sought to have Fast dismissed. This might have been because Fast had been independently proposed for the union's top post in opposition to Bright. Since then, Fast has been one of the more active organizers in the union.

Fast's stepping into the assistant national administrator's secretary office has made necessary a bit of rearranging of posts. Dolores Rosaler, who had been assistant to the national administrative secretary, no longer holds that post. She is now in charge of the bond department. Helene Tetrault, in charge of the agency franchise department, remains undisturbed.

First veepee Rajah Raboid in his report to the union declared that the nomination of an assistant national administrative secretary was necessary to the Welfare of the union.. He stated that the men in the field resented taking orders from a femme during Bright's absence from office, and an experienced hand in this field must be named at once.

Fast will remain midwest regional director and will handle both jobs simultaneously. No salary increase for Fast has been voted as yet.

LIST NOMINEES FOR ARA NOV. ELECTIONS

Artists Representatives Assn. will hold its election meeting Nov. 10 at the Friars Club, N.Y. A board of governors will be elected which will in turn elect the officers of the organization.

Those nominated include Hattie Althoff, Larry Barnett (MCA prexy), Ray Beaudet, Joe Glaser (prexy of Associated Booking Corp.), Roy Cooper, Howard Haussman (William Morris), Dick Henry, Ben Kuchuk, Jimmy Mark, Tom Martin (General Artists Corp.), Bill Peterson (Circle Artists), Vic Rocco, Milt Shaw (Shaw Artists prexy) and Eddie Smith. James Grady, of Grady Enterprises, is expected to be nominated in place of Dave Jonas who declined.

Associated reps who have been nominated are Eddie Elkort, of GAC, who has been president of the organization for the past few years; Charlie Green, of Mercury Artists, and Joe Singer, of the Morris office.

Ky. Fair Up To 232G; Rise In S'Easterner

Louisville, Oct. 21.

The 1958 Kentucky State Fair chalked up a record profit, even with attendance figures off, and some special attractions which didn't draw. Credit for the rise in overall take is given to boost in outside-gate admish to 75c, plus a tightening of administrative costs. Profit reported to the State Fair Board was $232.197. Gross income was $810,107. This was the largest profit ever earned in the three fair as the present Fairgrounds, and Fair officials believe probably the largest of any Kentucky Fair.

Outside gate admissions accounted for the bulk of the 1958 profit, bringing $212,666. Other attractions which helped to put the 1958 Fair in the black were the horse show, $31,3354; commercial exhibits (exposition wing), $34,848; Olsen shows, midway, $46,785; other midway booths, $42,590; and parking $48,427. The Roy Rogers show made $22,802 for the Fair.

Some of the attractions disappointed. Big losers were the Bob Crosby Show, which lost $13,067 for the Fair, and the rock 'n' roll show, losing $2,325. The Fair broke about even on two high-school football games. On a U of Kentucky

Jill Okays Twin Billing With Jonathan Winters At Pitt's Twin Coaches

Pittsburgh, Oct. 21.

Jill Corey has agreed to take equal billing with Jonathan Winters at Twin Coaches, thereby averting another crisis for the 1,200-seat room on Route 51. Originally Xavier Cugat & Abbe Lane had been booked in for nine days beginning Friday (24), and when he cancelled out, prompting owners Rose and Tony Calderone to file a complaint with musicians union, Winters and Miss Corey were inked to replace the Cugat-Lane combo.

For Miss Corey, it was a continuation of an old contract; she had been pencilled in early in the summer but management let her postpone the date so she could take a Las Vegas job and a spot in a Columbia picture at considerably more money.

But Miss Corey was adamant about first billing and Winters wouldn't stand still for that. After a fuss almost up until the last minute, booker Joe Hiller got a concession from her; she'd get the same type as Winters. Singer also demanded right to close the show but finally agreed to leave that optional, depending on how the layout shapes up.

NAT'L BD. MEET ENDS 1-MAN RULE

By JOE COHEN

The American Guild of Variety Artists is no longer a one-man show. Steps taken at the national board meeting which ended in the early hours Saturday (18) morning at the Hotel New Yorker, N. Y., were designed to clip the growing power of national administrative secretary Jackie Bright, and to attempt to restore the democratic processes of the union.

The most important action at the meeting was the appointment of Ernie Fast as assistant national administrative secretary. He will retain the post of midwest regional director along with his added duties. The move was taken over the strenuous opposition of Bright and a group closely allied with him. However, after some reconsideration, he went along. Just what prompted the change of heart was kept off the record.

Another item that will tend to decentralize power was the passage of a resolution to increase the out-of-town members on the executive board. As soon as this was passed, Bright adherents, to prevent appointment of those hostile to Bright, pleaded for an election on this score. A Bright supporter, Bobby Faye, and prexy Penny Singleton were elected.

Another important move to curb Bright's power was defeated at about 5 a.m. Saturday. It was described as being "politicked to death." This resolution would have empowered the president and first vice president (Rajah Raboid) to supervise expenditures of the AGVA Sick & Relief Fund, now under exclusive jurisdiction of Margie Coate.

Singleton-Raboid Team

The ability of the board meeting to clip Bright's power is ascribed to the recent election which put

New Orleans Refuses Permit to Musical For Narcotic Fund Benefit

New Orleans, Oct. 21.

A city solicitation permit for a musical variety show was denied Charles H. Edwards of Dallas, Tex., by finance director Robert E. Develle.

The show was to be held for the benefit of the International Narcotic Research Foundation Inc. Ted Weems and his orch and acts from stage, screen, radio and tv were to appear, according to Edwards. It was scheduled for next Monday (27) at Municipal Auditorium. Edwards claimed that he had sold several hundred tickets.

Develle said the application for the permit does not comply with sections of the city code. He added that "there is insufficient evidence that the solicitation is for a bona fide charitable, religious, educational or benevolent purpose."

Develle told Edwards he could appeal to the mayor or the city chief administrative officer, but Edwards failed to serve any notice of appeal.

Edwards said he is a national director of the foundation, and that it was organized under Texas laws in January, 1956.

An entire stage revue is being built around the headliner, with acts to be booked.

Cuba Would Be A Bosom Friend Of Paris' La Nouvelle

Havana, Oct. 21.

Havana nitery operators are now eyeing nudity as a major lure following the sock reception given the bare bosoms in Las Vegas. The Havana Riviera is dickering for the complete transplanting of the show at La Nouvelle Eve, Paris, to that hotel.

The big click start given the Stardust Hotel with the show imported intact from Le Lido is the inspiration for the Riviera deal. The Dunes Hotel, Las Vegas, also was put into the profit column as soon as Harold Minsky put his nudes on the stage.

The Riviera is currently on a native show policy with periodic change of headliners. Olga Guillot has been pacted for Nov. 11. The hotel did a show headed by Roberto Iglesias and had Carmen Amaya for one session.

The Nouvelle Eve layout would probably be brought over for the winter season if a deal can be worked out in time.

Pitt's New Arena Drops Line to Fortify Its Bills With Names in Pairs

Pittsburgh, Oct. 21.

New Arena has decided to drop the Craig Daye Dancers and use the money to build up its act value. Line of girls had been there since downtown room opened nearly two years ago. In past, the spot has generally used one headliner and a supporting act but is now going in for a couple of turns weekly of comparable stature. Last week it was Marion Marlowe and Georgie Kaye, currently Corbett Monica and Maureen Cannon and following them, Gretchen Wyler and comedy team of Allen & DeWood.

While New Arena is abandoning the dancing ponies, another Triangle cafe, Lenny Litman's Copa, which featured a line for a long time, has gone in for a chorus again. Five Copa Lovelies opened there last night (Mon.) for an indefinite stay. Group was assembled and choreographed by Pat Patterson and Judy George, formerly of the Miriam Sage Dancers, who were at the Copa over an extended period. Misses Patterson and George married Pittsburghers several years ago during the run of the Sage line and have been living here ever since.

Cole's Chez Paree Longie

Chicago, Oct. 21.

Nat King Cole and the Chez Paree have entered into a five-year deal for singer's exclusive appearances here. It's said to be the nitery's first such pact with an artist.

Deal calls for Cole to play a total of 16 weeks, starting in 1959.

Morris Lansburgh's "Cavalcade of Stars" plan to provide free auditorium entertainment to guests of six Miami Beach hotels is being promoted as a means of helping the inns in the area. It's figured that anything that will bring excitement to the resort will aid the Miamis.

Under the plan, which originated with the management of the Crown Hotel and was brought to Lansburgh because of his numerical and financial strength, there will be three evenings of free entertainment by top names at the convention hall adjacent to the Deauville Hotel, to which guests of the Deauville, Casablanca, Sherry Frontenac, Versailles, Sans Souci and Crown will be invited. Tickets will not be sold.

The plan is figured to cost around $750,000 for the season which will include supporting talent, publicity and advertising, music, etc.

Lansburgh says that the entertainment offered on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays will leave important evenings free to visit other niteries, dog track, etc. Lansburgh, together with producer of the show, Frank Young, and Jerry Sussman, operator of the Crown Hotel, were in New York last week to kick off the exploitation with a cocktail party at the Harwyn. Full-page ads on the venture broke Sunday (19) in N. Y. and elsewhere.

All insist that they do not want to monopolize the entertainment of the Beach, they haven't bought all the names in the market and figure that the ballyhoo created throughout the country with this series of ads and publicity will give glamor to the entire hotel industry.

Can't Hurt

Agencies agree with Lansburgh and his principals that the program of Associated Hotels (corporate name for the Lansburgh chain) will not hinder the rest of the Florida entertainment industry. It's point-

K.C.'S 6,100 DRAW WITH EDIE & ERNIE AND NAGS

Kansas City, Oct. 21.

As a highlight of the fall events here, the annual American Royal Coronation kicking off the livestock and horseshow week, proved a draw even though transplanted bodily from its former downtown locale. Virtual capacity of something over 6,100 turned out for the event Friday (17) in the American Royal's own arena in the stockyards district.

They came to see the crowning of the queen, Nancy June Moore, daughter of a leading family; Edie Adams & Ernie Kovacs, the Canadian Mounties and the Rodeo Kids, as well as what could be done with the big arena in the way of dressing it up for this high society event. Added to the agenda, as has been customary in recent years, were the Future Farmers of America band and chorus.

The arena made the grade, its transformation being complete down to royal blue tanbark, with bunting galore and other accoutrements. Still there remained problems of acoustics that showed up acutely on vocal portions of the proceedings. It particularly limited the Adams-Kovacs offerings and made theirs a tough assignment.

Deeps are scoring in vaude here following a return visit to Scandinavia. It's their 10th year in the U.K. and their 15th visit to Scot-

Rajah Revs Up Versus Rex

[HIGHLIGHTS OF AGVA BOARD MEETING]

Rajah Raboid, AGVA first vice president, took no chance on having anyone eavesdrop on his conversations while in his bedroom at the Hotel New Yorker. After registration, he discovered that he had a room adjoining that of Rex Weber, the union's comptroller. He therefore ordered that a one-and-a-half horsepower motor be brought up and placed in the room next to the adjoining door. The resultant hum from the electric motor made any eavesdropping impossible.

A political gimmick to insure election was revealed at the meeting with the reading of a letter of protest from Helani Alama, who was defeated for the post of national board member from Honolulu by Lulu Mansfield. Miss Alama protested that a letter sent by the successful candidate for recording secretary, Sally Winthrop, asked for Miss Alama's vote in her candidacy because she was supporting her. The letter charged that the only difficulty in that pitch was that Miss Winthrop sent the identical note to Miss Alama's rival for the post. The aftermath of this gambit was a demand by several members of the board for information as to how Miss Winthrop obtained access to the mailing list.

The national board members had a chance to see the new AGVA Country Club & Recreation Center, Fallsburgh, N. Y. Instead of the usual business meeting starting Monday (13), busses transported the entire group for an inspection tour that day. Proceedings started the following morning.

Nat Abramson, head of the WOR Artists Bureau and former chairman of the AGVA Welfare Trust Fund, reported on the status of the fund in place of chairman George A. Hamid who was away on a business trip. He reported a 10-day extension in getting bids for the new insurance contract. Current contract is held by Lloyds of London, who are certain to put in a new bid on the venture based on their past experiences in coverage of this policy.

* * *

Per usual, VARIETY came in for a considerable portion of the deliberations. This year, sentiment increased for admission of the press on the grounds that AGVA had nothing to hide. This proposal came from several sources. Again the ban was continued.

Former eastern administrator Dick Jones, victor in a libel suit against Jackie Bright, tab of which was picked up by the union, was an interested spectator at the meeting. Charges leveled by him against national administrative secretary Bright were given a highly dramatic reading by president Penny Singleton in her capacity as union president and chairman of the national board.

Another choice bit of correspondence was aired by Rajah Raboid. He cited Miss Singleton's warning to Bright that dismissal of Barry Houston as Detroit organizer could result in another action a la Dick Jones. Houston recently entered suit for $25,000 against the union.

* * *

One of the less tasteful pranks executed at the national board meet came to light when Karl Wallenda, the famed highwire act, confronted the board with an anonymous letter that he had received which was decorated with a skull and crossbones and a swastika which warned him to get out. The meeting immediately spoke in favor of calling in the police and the FBI, when one member spoke up admitting that he as well as four others in their cups had concocted the scheme.

Sue L.A. Police On Permits for Acts

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

A taxpayer's suit seeking to enjoin the Los Angeles Police Commission from enforcing the city ordinance which requires special permits for all live entertainers in cafes and restaurants was filed last week in Superior Court by Eliot Daniel, prez of Local 47 of the American Federation of Musicians.

Daniel claimed the ordinance, passed last spring, is "illegal, unconstitutional and discriminatory" against live entertainers. The entertainers must secure their permits from the Police Commission, and suit seeks to enjoin the commission from enforcing the law.

ed out that many of the top names on the roster bought by Lansburgh would not ordinarily be available to cafes. For example, Harry Belafonte and Maurice Chevalier no longer play niteries. Jerry Lewis has priced himself out of the Florida orbit; Liberace and Patti Page recently played there and didn't break records. Phil Silvers and George Gobel are not available for regulation nitery dates because of teevee commitments. Mischa Elman is one act who has no night club act. Robert Merrill's milieu isn't cafes.

According to agency thinking, the bulk of the names either aren't available to cafes or haven't been doing too well in them. There are others who do very well in niteries, and some who wouldn't draw too much.

Besides, the names are on, mainly, for one night. It's inconceivable to the percenters that a New York plutocrat, accustomed to the Fontainebleau or the Americana or others in very high price level, is going to change his habitat in order to see a free show. Even should he be of such a mind, it is unlikely that he would change registration in March so that he can see Jerry Lewis there.

The agencies are going along on the theory that it will ballyhoo the entire area.

There is also the theory expounded by the Lansburgh group that this bally will be able to stave off a drop in rates which had seemed to be in the wind. Should the plan be able to fill these functions, then it will be worth its entire $750,000 budget, they say.

SANDS JOINS CIRCLE

Vic Sands has joined the cocktail department of Circle Artists Corp. He formerly held a similar post at General Artists Corp.

In addition, Sands will handle several nitery accounts.

Miss Singleton in as president and Raboid as first veepee. Between both, it was evident that they would attempt to give strength to both offices and try to elevate them on the policy-making level. Hitherto, these offices have been either figureheads or, in Gus Van, Bright and Georgie Price's case, administrative.

Miss Singleton in her report stated that she would look into every facet of the AGVA operation, just as Bright did when he was president and Jack Irving the administrative secretary. She pleaded for an end to "pettiness" and "prejudice" after observing that there was a disturbing pattern of disunity in the organization. She also cited the "tyranny" of many administrative processes within the union.

'Bill of Particulars'

Raboid's report took longer inasmuch as in his talk he proposed the two resolutions which were debated into the morning. However, it was conceded that he gave the administration and many of its adherents some uneasy moments. He cited a steady stream of abuses in administration. For example, he pointed out that the AGVA News, the union's publication, had become virtually a house organ for one man. He recalled that he sent to the editors a pitch for members to vote which was rejected.

Raboid openly charged a "dictatorship" and a condition which made criticism of the administration "perilous" to members. He criticized Bright for bringing charges against Paul Valentine and for barring Russell Swann and Sally Winthrop from functioning as board members for four months on charges of conduct unbecoming a board member. Raboid declared that the constitution has no provision for such charges. He also criticized the New York staff for going enmasse to the Mexico City convention in June, leaving "no one to mind the store."

The officers had smoother sailing after Raboid stated that he did not covet Bright's job. Prior to that, a hard-core junta had jumped up and down with points of privilege, questions, points of order and points of information. Raboid said that there was no plot to oust Bright. As to charges that it was possible for four or five men on the exec board to run AGVA, he proposed an enlarged board.

Bright De-Glossed

Bright's report, in contrast to a previous board meeting when it required nearly the entire time of the meeting, was less than two hours' duration. He was very much subdued, and touched on major subjects of which some were designed to answer charges by Raboid.

Bright asked for and got another $10,000 loan for the AGVA Country Club & Recreation Center, which was hit by Raboid in his speech. Raboid declared that the home should have been located in a 25-room house in Florida and with another to be opened in California or Nevada.

Raboid also lambasted the constant huddling by Bright and AGVA attorney Harold Berg. He proposed that each of them be seated on either side of the president so that their conversations could be heard. He also hit Berg for on-the-spot rulings which had no basis in the AGVA constitution.

Put on the Record

Early in the meeting, there was a show of force by the pro-Bright group. The request by Raboid for a closed session was voted down after bitter debate. As a result, some of the charges which would have been discussed privately were put on the record.

It was evident that although Bright still has the necessary votes, with a nod to one of his adherents bringing some response such as a point of order or a tabling of the motion, it was becoming increasingly dangerous for him to insist on his way all the time. There is now an increased number of opposition members and more are on the fence, voting both ways.

Elect Evans to Board

In another action, nomination of Cy Reeves to the national board was defeated and Joe Evans was elected. Miss Singleton was named to be a representative on the AGVA Welfare Trust Fund in place of Reeves who resigned. There was an acrimonious debate on that score as well, inasmuch as Berg had ruled that since board member Jay Lester was Reeves' alternate on that body, his elevation to a full member automatically followed the resignation of Reeves. The membership refused to buy that ruling.

One of the less edifying aspects of the convention was Al Tucker's plea for retention of his spot on the Appeals Board, although he said that he didn't seek that post because of the $25 per diem involved. Elvira (Mrs. Rajah) Raboid, also a board member, has resigned that spot because she didn't want to be accused of profiting on the union. She decried the fact that everyone was seeking this post while not seeking posts to which no per diem money was attached. Bobby Faye and Sally Winthrop, both prominent Bright supporters, were also named to the Appeals Board.

Gambling Bill

the season would curtail their activities.

Besides, it's felt that with the present setup of the Florida entertainment structure, it may not be possible to support both gambling and name entertainment, because of the possibility that name values would surge to the point of no return. As it is, Florida name prices are nearly on a par with Las Vegas.

Some innkeepers aren't too keen on the efforts to get the casinos going. In the old days, when the games were going at spots such as the Colonial Inn, Hallendale, Fla., there was a class business, the tax problems were somewhat different, and the Florida economy could support such an endeavor. Many fear that conditions have changed appreciably since then.

Details of Measure

Tallahassee, Oct. 21.

The proposal to legalize casinos in Dade county, which encompasses Miama and Miami Beach and some other towns, adjacent to the Beach resorts, faces a stiff fight in the State Legislature.

As presently envisioned, the new law would give the counties where the casinos are located the full benefit of gambling revenue. This is in direct contrast to the legislation passed in 1940 which permitted pari-mutuel betting at the tracks and gave the Legislature power to allocate and distribute funds derived from the betting to all the counties in the state in equal amounts. Popular support for the measure came because the state distributed the money to 67 counties along with other state taxes from gasoline and cigarets, the revenue being used for education and other vital county needs.

It is possible that the sponsors of the casino measure could get the necessary votes to pass on the grounds that Dade County particularly needs the money, and passage of the casino bill would insure the rest of the state the money now coming in from the pari-mutuels. It is known, for example, that last year's bad winter weather curtailed revenue in Miami Beach and several building programs had to be cut back. Should there be another disastrous winter much more than the $80,000,000 cutback would be needed to start building programs to insure the improvements in roads, schools, etc., that keep the Beach in first-class shape.

There is also the possibility that the pari-mutuel laws will be extended to include any county that wants it. There was considerable opposition to this when it was first proposed last year. Among proposals likely to be made is the extension of dog racing, now permitted only at Daytona Beach, Pensacola and Tropical Park, and permission to hold horseraces at night, a measure which will be fought by the dog tracks and jai alai frontons. Pari-mutuels are now permitted at five horse tracks, 15 dog tracks, and four jai alai frontons. Should more counties want to get into the act, a lively battle is expected and gambling interests would join in to achieve its ends.

When Stage Effects Were for Real

By JESS FREEMAN

Recent reminiscence apropos London's Hippodrome recalls an instance, circa 1910, of a spectacle called "Sands of Dee," the work of a producer of the time named Parker. This was the heyday of gigantic "stage effects" and he wanted an incoming tidal wave to move toward the audience. Real water was to drop from reservoirs in the flies.

At rehearsal the producer kept being dissatisfied with the effect and shouted to the stagehands, "Give me more water, boys." This was a challenge the grips could not ignore and the next tidal wave really roared home, passing across the footlights and orchestra pit and flooding the main floor, fortunately empty.

Running for safety, the producer turned to shout his pleasure, "That's what I wanted!"

Inside Stuff-Vaude

John H. Harris, producer of "Ice Capades" and head of the theatre circuit in Pittsburgh which bears his name, will get back from Moscow just in time to be the "Fall Guy" at Saints and Sinners (Humpty Tent) annual charity dinner at the Ankara there Sunday night, Nov. 9. Harris is in the USSR, along with his musical director, Jerry Mayhall, and "Capades" treasurer, George Eby, International Chief Barker of Variety Club, to arrange for the icer to play there in the spring. Bookings will be under Cultural Exchange program, with S. Hurok as the sponsor. Fall Guy shindig in Harris' honor will be emceed by Bob Prince, local sportscaster, and is bringing in a number of out-of-town name showmen.

Joby Baker, nitery comic, got word while playing the Twin Coaches in Pittsburgh with Johnny Mathis last week that Columbia Pictures had signed him to a seven-year deal and spotted him in a major role with Paul Muni in "The Last Angry Man." Baker will report Nov. 10 in New York, where picture will be on location at the time.

A $750 pay raise for the members of the Boston Licensing Board was approved by both branches of the Legislature last week (16) in the dying hours of its 1958 session. The bill boosted the salary of Clarence Elam, chairman, to $9,750 and the other two members to $9,250. The pay of Joel L. Miller, executive secretary, was upped $500 to $9,000. Their salaries are paid by the city of Boston.

game it did not participate in profits, but had expenses of $1,264. Profits over the past three years totaled: 1958—$232,197; 1957—$172,895; 1956—$156,547. Attendance figures for the three years were: 1958—432,379; 1957—471,544; 1956—500,000.

Southeastern Gate Rises

Atlanta, Oct. 21.

Record final day (11) of 44th annual Southeastern Fair soared turnstile count for 10 days of event at Lakewood Park fairgrounds to 359,804, breaking previous 1956 record of 353,250.

What put Fair over this year on final day was two appearances of tv personality Dick Clark, including a live telecast of his ABC-TV American Bandstand show in front of grandstand in park. This swelled normal attendance by 10,000 teenagers. Count for that day was 65,287.

Three days of bad weather hurt attendance this year at beginning of run. The 1958 totals ran 40,000 above 1957 count.

Texas Fair Gate Climbs

Dallas, Oct. 21.

State Fair of Texas, in its 73d annual 16-day run, Oct. 4-19, racked up a new attendance record with 2,680,000 turnstilers. Admission was again 75c for adults and 40c for children. Turnout exceeded the 1956 record of 2,672,253—which dropped in 1957 to 2,540,967. World's largest state fair, situated in an 187-acre showplace—where the permanent investment is $35,000,000—drew a weather windfall, with only light rain three days.

Top lure was the touring company of "The Music Man," with Forrest Tucker and Joan Weldon. Musical had a hefty advance sale of over $200,000, and puts "Music Man" in third spot as alltime b.o. fair show in the 4,120-seat Music Hall. ("South Pacific" grossed $394,422 in 1950, and "My Fair Lady" pulled $337,500 in 1957—all for 24 performances.) Scale this year was $4.95-$1.65.

The 18th edition of "Ice Capades" set a new attendance record in the 5,000-seat Ice Arena, scaled from $3.30-$1.50. Icer shows, during the expo's run, have annually drawn over 100,000 patrons.

Cotton Bowl one-nighter shows found a loser in Tennessee Ernie Ford, with Molly Bee, Bobby Winters, Tippy & Cobina, Birk Twins, Johnny Matson and the Miriam Sage Dancers on Oct. 5. Tab was $1.75, but drew only 5,200.

Chez Paree, Chi

Chicago, Oct. 14.

McGuire Sisters (with Murray Kane, Capri Sisters), Jay Jason, Chez Adorables (6), George Cook Orch (11); $1.95 cover (dinner show), $4 minimum.

Leaving nothing to chance or their disk rep, the McGuire Sisters click with an act well prepared for the cafe circuit. Trio's as attractive and vocally well-tooled as they come nowadays, but it's the showmanly extras that certify their saloon status and declare dandy dividends.

Tunes, for the record, include plenty of their Coral cuttings, "Sincerely" and "Sugartime" among them, and even an operatic aria. Act has special treatment for the oldie "Hey Daddy," and Phyllis (the Sis in the middle) amuses with a skein of vocal impreshes. Any tablers who've perchance strayed come back pronto when the unbilled Capri Sisters (teenagers) come on with identical costuming for a nifty "Me and My Shadow," then solo a brief "Goodnight Sweetheart." McGuires resume in outlandish garb for a medley that enables some pretty fair footwork. Murray Kane, trio's manager-arranger-conductor, helms George Cook's tunesters (11) for fine support.

New to Chi, comic Jay Jason looks a cinch repeater at the flagship. He's a rapid-fire standup, tireless and brash enough to coax laughs even for stale gags. There's good reaction for spoofs of tv's late show and old war films, and the palming breaks out for a nostalgic vocal bit on some erstwhile show bizzers. Jason's in the Chez groove, though even for this club he resorts too often to Yiddish patois including debatable expressions.

Chez Adorables (6) nail oke response with a salute to Gotham and a number titled "Falling in Love." Show's a three-weeker, with Tony Martin and Sue Carson opening Nov. 2. Pit.

Bon Soir, N. Y.

Kaye Ballard, Mickey Deems, Mae Barnes, Jimmie Daniels, Three Flames, Murray Grand; $5 minimum.

There's never any skimping of entertainment down at the Bon Soir in Greenwich Village. For more than two-and-a-half hours the song and comedy are dished out in heavy quantities and by the time first show breaks near 2 a.m. no tabler can complain of being short-changed. Even the between-act pleasantries by the Three Flames and Murray Grand help fill what otherwise would be an entertainment void.

Bill this sesh is toplined by Kaye Ballard, back from Las Vegas with a bagful of fun. She's a zany with a comic attitude that reaches everybody. Material is new and excellently paced, running from topical Alaska and hula-hoop gags through a nine-year-old influenced by tv comics and some straight warbling a la Fanny Brice, which she did for an MGM album, of "Nathan" and "My Man." Her special material songs, too, are top calibre. The one in which she essays a tippling dame Christmas toasting Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith and her bluechip stocks is a rib-tickler of high order. She gets a nifty accomp throughout from Arthur Siegel at the keyboard.

Also in the comedic vein, but in a much quieter groove, is Mickey Deems. A likable lad with a low-gear approach, he hits the mark as he ably dissects aspects of marriage, children and advertising. He runs through his material slowly but with sharp strokes and he seldom fails to get his message across.

Holding over from previous show is Mae Barnes, the beefy pixie. Her songalog is light and gay, winning large audience response. Jimmie Daniels, the room's emcee, opens everything up with a medley of showtunes in a pleasing manner. Gros.

Shamrock Hilton, H'st'n

Betty Reilly, Billy Williams Orch (10); private club; no cover or minimum.

Betty Reilly, "The Irish Senorita," draws good applause from a small opening house. It is Miss Reilly's misfortune that she follows Gordon MacRae & Sheila Stephens, who broke all house records, into the International Club's Continental Room at the Shamrock Hilton.

The blonde belter opens with "Heat Wave," and for 45 minutes runs through a variety of standards, rock 'n' roll, Latin-American tunes and impressions. The best bits come when she muscles the more robust Mexican melodies, and her forgeries of Roberta Sherwood and Bette Davis.

Miss Reilly works hard, and seems to enjoy it. She accompanies herself expertly on some numbers with an electric guitar. The few slow spots in the show seem to be the result of bits of material that could stand some drydocking.

The Billy Williams orch backs the act in its usual competent manner, although on opening night the band muffled a couple of the thrush's punchlines.

Miss Reilly departs on Oct. 29 after two weeks, to be followed by Myron Cohen, also in for a pair. The house should pick up after word gets around that the femme, little known here, is really a top entertainer. Skip.

Town Casino, Buffalo

Buffalo, Oct. 14.

Domenico Modugno, Jimmy Casanova, Magill Twins, Evelyn Joyce, Ed Aumont, Clare Young, Moe Balsom Orch (9) under Myron Roman; $2 minimum, 80c cover.

For his second presentation of the season, Harry Altman, in the interest of stricter operational economy, has cut down the personnel of the house company drastically, but has more than compensated for it by highlighting the dance and chorus routines and by the introduction of several new acts and faces. Domenico ("Volare") Modugno throws the whole presentation into high gear and brings it down the home stretch with an uproarious reception, especially from the women.

If anyone thinks of this "Volare" guy as just a paisan with a guitar, he's due for a surprise. Working with practically no instrument at all, he whams out a number of Italian ditties which are rapturously received. In appearance, he is a sort of poor man's combination of Don Ameche and Liberace with plenty of volume but not too much vocal quality. Debonair in appearance and pleasing in delivery, he is a natural with the ladies. In fact, if and when his English improves, he could do all right in pictures or on the stage—if he holds out that long.

At his premiere performance, he drew one of the most tumultous receptions heard in a long time and had the rafters really ringing. His "Volare" with audience participation scored a knockout and earned him sock returns for his bow-off.

Evelyn Joyce has been added as femme vocalist teaming with Ed Aumont on the duets. Their opening "That's Entertainment" is especially well projected, this and Clare Young's "Two-A-Day" proving agreeably topical and registering well with the crowd.

The production numbers, which continue to show the fine hand of Dave Bines, are paced in fast tempo and show more than ordinary precision for a unit of this kind. Myron Roman's orch direction keeps the stage and orchestral proceedings moving at a sparkling coordinated clip and his violin obbligatos add color to the musical side of the production.

The Magill Twins also have been added for some satisfactory straight and acrobatic tap dancing. Jimmy Casanova offers a smartly different single though overloaded with blue asides. His closing old-man bit seems too long but was relished by the customers.

Opening night brought a combination of ladies night patrons and Canadian Thanksgiving visitors who jammed the joint for the supper show and left a queue of several hundred waiting in line for the second performance. Burton.

365 Club, San Francisco

San Francisco, Oct. 16.

Rusty Draper, Richiardi Jr. & Co. (5), Moro-Landis Dancers (10) with Bill Carey, Bill Clifford Orch (9); $1-$1.50 cover.

Rusty Draper and Richiardi Jr. are surefire in this fast, 65-minute show which also introduces the slick Bill Clifford band.

Draper comes on with "Sunny Side of the Street" and "Up the Lazy River," goes into "Shifting, Whispering Sands" and "Just Because" and then does a funny specialty and an electric guitar medley. He follows with "Gambler's Guitar," "Cherry," "If I Could Be With You," "Volare," knocks out some cornball humor and another standard specialty of his and winds up with "Are You Satisfied?" This is excellent entertainment and crowd loves it.

Richiardi is a clever magician with a pleasing personality and a fine flair for showmanship and rates a fine hand.

Moro-Landis line clicks with a pair of nicely staged numbers and Clifford's orch offers smooth, smart support throughout. Show runs through Nov. 13 and figures to do big business. Stef.

Shoreham, Wash.

Washington, Oct. 17.

Ximenez-Vargas Ballet Espanol (17), Al Donahue Orch (10); $2 cover.

Ole! In excitement, showmanship, imagination and originality, the Ximenez-Vargas Ballet Espanol is a nitery act which is muy grande. In the heel-stomping and castanet set, these 17 kids (none over 30) are flamencolossal.

You have to shuffle the calendar considerably to hit a date when the Shoreham Hotel Blue Room or other club around Washington had a more entertaining show. When Allan Bralove picked the group for his fashionable place, he faced the problem that they were virtually unknown here. But satisfied customers talk. The future for these attractive and talented Spaniards here and in the country generally should be bright. Jose Greco has competitors of the highest class.

The show is staged with interesting variations. The dance floor and a moving stage get a heavy pounding at times, of course, especially in a great solo number (a single spotlight on the feet for drama) by Roberto Ximenez. He co-heads the troupe with Manolo Vargas.

But there is also a Spanish-style softshoe. One routine is heavily sexy; another as innocently folklike as a skip around the Maypole. Two pianos alternate with guitars; castanets with finger-snapping and hand-pounding.

Dance technique and tone switches from the type of footwork popular in various Spanish provinces to the greatly modified versions of same which wound up in the Western Hemisphere, especially Argentina and Mexico.

Without exception, the performers are bueno, even magnifico. The girls are beautiful, and those dresses fitting like a second layer of skin exhibit charms appreciated internationally. The men are lean and handsome with that Valentino stare. Costumes are colorful, attractive. A satisfying selection of Spanish gypsy songs is sprinkled in.

Al Donahue and his orch, signed for the season, play for dancing. The band has made a big hit here with a large catalog of superior arrangements. Lilo follows the Spaniards Nov. 4. Carp.

Hotel Delmonico, N. Y.

Hugh Shannon, Yoko Mitsuo, Soula Litvitch; $3 minimum.

The Hotel Delmonico has had cafe entertainment at various times during its history. It has revived its supper room idea under the direction of John Fontaine, and it seems like a comfortable after-theatre haunt that should certainly draw a portion of the haute monde.

The major entertainer on this session is Hugh Shannon who has been playing for eastsiders for lo these many years. He knows their likes and seemingly has a wide personal acquaintance as was evident on the opening night when the room's capacity was bulging.

Shannon is a personable performer at the piano and his singing comes off well, despite a voice that is pretty near a recitative. His manner is sophisticated and his stress on lyrics gives the tunes some added meaning. Pianistics can carry the melody. The numbers are mainly from the musicals, and some are punctuated with special lyrics that heighten effect. He comes off especially well here.

The lull music is by fiddler Yoko Mitsuo, and Soula Litvitch is at the piano. An unscheduled set of performers are the waiters carrying the flaming swords of food. Very colorful. Jose.

Mister Kelly's, Chi

Chicago, Oct. 14.

June Christy (with Ben Aronov), Phyllis Diller, Marx & Frigo Trio; $1 cover, $2.50 beverage minimum.

June Christy and jazz walk arm in arm, but for those who don't dig the cool piping (almost a modern idiom tenet), there's a sense of uninspired sameness by the singer's fourth or fifth lyric. Fortunately, Kelly's is her kind of showcase, as her only previous stand here demonstrated, meaning there are enough cats around to keep the waiters moving.

Set caught (14) faulted on perhaps one score—it could have had better pacing. Catalog as such, though, was surefire via such items as "All God's Children," "Midnight Sun," "I'll Take Romance" and "How High the Moon." Misty quality of singer's pipes helps give her stuff nicely subtle shading, and all's fine technically. Marx & Frigo Trio, with Ben Aronov at keyboard, provides deft backstopping.

In the warmup, the first-timing in Chi, Phyllis Diller bubbles forth hybrid comedy that doesn't quite come off. Trouble's not so much in style—that of an addled blonde—as in tepid material, per such hoary one-liners as "I wanted to come to Chicago in the worst way—and that's how I got here." Her unstylish ridicule of bosoms large and small deservedly hooks spotty chuckles for its dubious taste. A bit with weird femme hats comes off okay, though, largely for its visual values.

Miss Christy is in for three frames, Miss Diller for two. Gene Baylos and Peggy Dietrick open Nov. 3. Pit.

Havana Riviera, Havana

Ramon Veloz, Raul de Mesa, Elsa & Waldo, Gina Martin, Trio Ojeda, Voice of Milo Rodriques, Line, Felix Guerrero & Casino de la Playa Orch; $4 minimum.

The Havana Riviera revue "Guatique" seems to be a staple by now. Having undergone a tightening-up process, it is a fast-moving and highly entertaining layout that shows considerable improvement since it first hit the boards a few months ago.

The basic structure has the added feature of being utilitarian as well. Although designed to blend with native entertainers, the framework is such that it can accommodate imported acts as well. In the current show, the outsiders are Elsa & Waldo, Contental comedy dancers who have been accepted as staples in the States. Coming on with an introduction from a brief ballet sequence, this dance duo hits the audience hard with a burlesque of the tour-jete.

The regulars on the show are topped by Ramon Veloz, a personable singer who registers a high audience rating. Veloz tends to bring out the ardent Latin flavor in his tunes. There's a lot of serioso endeavor and his appeal brings home the applause.

Gina Martin, on the distaff side, is an effective production aide, blending in well with the ensemble song and dance work. Other assists are by the Trio Ojeda, a vocal and instrumental male group, Raul de Mesa and the group singers produced by Milo Rodrigues. Altogether, an effective combination that provides a good brand of native entertainment.

The production is by Roberto Alonso who has endowed the show with a lot of movement that carries interest throughout. He has utilized native themes excellently. Incidentally, he's the brother of ballerina Alicia Alonso. The music is by the Felix Guerrero and Casino de la Playa bands, which provide both the showbacking and strong dance incentives. Jose.

Paradise Room, Atlanta

Atlanta, Oct. 15.

Margie Walker, The Coronados (3), Don Grimes Orch (6).

A tuneful show featuring a recording trio of fresh young voices proves a pleaser at Henry Grady Hotel's Paradise Room.

Show gets underway with bandleader Don Grimes doubling as emcee and introing Margie Walker. A redhead, Miss Walker sings "Love and Marriage," intermingling chatter that actually detracts from the entertainment. Same is true of her "I Don't Care." She gets laughs with some quick costume changing in full view of audience, having fun with new styles, such as trapeze, sack, balloon, empire and so on. Miss Walker works in a glaring white light, which isn't good for her.

Seldom has Paradise Room patrons been treated to a more intriguing vocal blend as Coronados put on display. Two brothers and a side get a big mitt with songs like "Let's Get Acquainted," "Money Tree" and "Two Different Worlds." They bear down on a medley of nostalgic tunes, getting customers to join in "Wonder Who's Kissing Her Now." Then for the teenage set (sparse at show caught) they whoop it up with a round of rock 'n' roll pops. Luce.

Statler-Hilton, Dallas

Dallas, Oct. 17.

Myron Cohen, Bob Cross Orch (12); 2-$2.50 cover.

Myron Cohen, in his second date here, packed the plushy Empire Room at opening (16). His fortnight should better the terrific biz he drew in his May, 1957, date.

This time around Cohen works even more smoothly and gives a better, longer show. His 45- minute stint includes entirely new material—bulk of it in Yiddish dialect—and he scores heavily with each yarn. Respectful ear-bending is a tribute to Cohen's story-telling talent; except for the yocks and hefty mitting he has the tablers leaning to listen. He goes ahead with his first funny bit, and stays that way—having to beg off. Bark.

Savoy, London

London, Oct. 14.

Jay Marshall, Leslie Roberts' Silhouettes (8), The Gimmas (5), Francisco Cavez and Ernesto D'Angelo Orchs; $3 minimum.

Having climbed back on the cabaret bandwagon, the Savoy restaurant has made a bold departure from convention with a complete reorientation of its musical lineup. It now has two new combos in residence, one a standard aggregation headed by Francisco Cavez and the other a loud, vigorous and rhythmic ensemble of five fronted by Ernesto D'Angelo.

The latter aggregation, billed as the Savoy Sorrentinos, brings a new lively spirit to the sedate Savoy atmosphere. The Sorrentinos put the emphasis on gaiety and their infectious rhythm is an invitation for the customers to leave their ringside tables for the floor. On the other hand, Francisco Cavez's Neapolitan Music, which has a conventional lineup of sidemen, strikes a downbeat note, more in keeping with the familar restrained Savoy tradition.

The current cabaret bill is headed by Jay Marshall, a suave American magico whose polished line of patter is in keeping with the dexterity of his act. He's a smooth operator in the best sense of the word, plays down his tricks and likewise on his gab. But it all adds up to a socko and thoroughly polished entertainment.

By contrast, the Gimmas are one of the liveliest and accomplished tumbling acts to be seen on the boards on this side. This male European quintet hits the high note when a trio get back into its original position after a three-high tumble. Unique stunt merited spontaneous ringsider tribute.

The dancing line, billed as the Leslie Roberts Silhouettes, comprises eight attractive and fresh-looking young girls who terp admirably and show their style handsomely in a gay Highland eightsome. Myro.

Downstairs at the Upstairs, N. Y.

Julius Monk, Portia Nelson, Don Evans, Carl Norman; $3 minimum.

Julius Monk has a very profitable double-decker in the Upstairs and Downstairs Rooms of his plush entertainment plant. The Downstairs Room, an adjunct of the Upstairs Room, has the highly successful revue "Demi Dozen," while the lower level with its two pianos and single entertainer keeps the waiting line happy, and frequently provides a good enough reason to drop in.

The change of entertainer this session brings in Portia Nelson, long a familiar figure around New York's supper clubs and who has a knowledge of working conditions in virtually every intimery in town. As such, Miss Nelson hits her marks effectively. Her material is well-tailored for the chi chi elements, and there seems to be a smart tone about her tunes. The verbiage, unfortunately, seems hard to follow, and much of the lyrics are designed for the chi'c set. In this instance, it seems to be good thinking inasmuch as the Monk patronage fits into that category. The best of her tunes is the tango burlesque.

At the pianos are Don Evans and Carl Norman who provide a note of authority to the backing. Jose.

Harrah's, Lake Tahoe

Lake Tahoe, Oct. 14.

Teresa Brewer, Terry Tones (4), Lenny Gale, Del Courtney Orch (12); no cover or minimum.

With the regular season at an end since Labor Day weekend, Harrah's Club remains the only Tahoe bistro offering big name entertainment, and the diminutive Teresa Brewer is playing to SRO nightly.

Introed by the Terry Tones singing "All Aboard the Happy Train," Miss Brewer delights the audience immediately with her happy styling and excellent pipes. During this number she whisks offstage to make a costume change while the Terry Tones choo choo around the two mikes, returning in a pale green bouffant formal. "Melancholy Baby" and "There'll Be Some Changes Made" follow with warm response from the ringsiders. "Lulu," impishly vocalized in costume of the flapper era, brings big yocks. Changing into a white formal, Miss Brewer goes into medleys of her disclicks before closing with a real ring-ding production of "In the Naughty Naughty Nineties," appropriately costumed.

Lenny Gale offers hilarious, fast-paced jokes together with his standard imitations of the usual

New Acts

JACK LA DELLE
Songs, Music
22 Mins.
Gatineau, Ottawa

Jack La Delle's stint gets a clicko rating because of two things: nice use of a pleasant set of pipes and absence of gimmicking in his handling of several instruments. La Delle's act moves softly but with an even pace spiced by comedy-spiked gab that holds it together. Soft crooning of several standards comes between straightforward handling of clarinet, cornet, Hawaiian and Spanish guitars and a crooked soprano saxophone to a solid closer of New Orleans jazz.

His ability in both chant and toot slots needs no added dressing and he wisely plays them both sans frills. La Delle has a Design-label album on the stands. He's solid for television, niteries. Gorm.

KEPPOS TRIO
Acro
13 Mins.
Gatineau, Ottawa

Keppos Trio, male and two femmes, perform routine acro bits on carpet and table but work in some extra zip to set the stanza in a slot slightly higher than most such items. Enthusiasm of the younger girl, an effervescent blonde, adds to the pace, and thrill work of the threesome keep the session moving steadily.

It's a nice stint for any nitery or stage and would add to a video bill. Gorm.

array of stars. His imitations are polished but some of the patter has been around and should be changed. He is a clever comic and mostly lays off hackneyed mimicry. Doro.

Hotel Muehlebach, K. C.

Kansas City, Oct. 18.

Jean Fenn, Larry Green Orch (8); $1, $1.50 cover.

Jean Fenn is known here from several appearances at the summer Starlight Theatre, but has never been seen here in a floor act. A stately blonde and polished singer, she radiates charm and combines it with her vocalling for a 40-minute turn that speaks class all around.

That she knows her way around in both popular and classic music is evident as soon as she has been at the mike but a few minutes. And the audience in the Terrace Grill gives her rapt attention throughout.

Miss Fenn covers a wide range of music, going from the waltz from "La Boheme" to "West Side Story" tunes, "Wish I Was," and "Begin the Beguine." Midway she presents straight opera, with the "Vissi D'arte" from La Tosca, and the house was never more attentive. She runs through the Continental languages, "Pigalle" in French, "Lichtensteiner Polka" in German and "Autumn Concerto" in Italian, than has a special version of the "Merry Widow" waltzes and a Frenchy bit, "M'amselle Oo-la-la'," as a fitting closer. Behind her leading the Larry Green Orch in Jay Rubaroff likewise doing a classy job. Miss Fenn is in through Oct. 30. Quin.

Eddys', K. C.

Kansas City, Oct. 17.

Carmen Cavallaro (& Trio), Tommy Reed Orch (8); $1-$1.50 cover.

Carmen Cavallaro has been a welcome attraction in several previous engagements at Eddys' Restaurant, the last about a year ago, and he is as welcome as ever this time around. The house had one of its biggest nights to open and reservations are strong for the coming fortnight.

As in the past couple of appearances Cavallaro has a trio backing him up with guitar, string bass and drums. This, added to his stellar pianistics, makes for a night club concert in rhythm that is always aces among the attractions to play here. That Cavallaro is a favorite here was evident from the first number, with the house solid in response throughout.

He obliged with a long list of his fanciful and rhythmatic arrangements, from the intricate types such as "The Continental" to the sweeter ballads such as "Nearness of You" and "All the Things You Are." There are Afro-Cuban entries, old standards, flurries into classical, and the powerful "Rhapsody in Blue" (tab version) and "Malaguena" to close surefire. Stays through Oct. 30. Quin.

House Reviews

Apollo, N. Y.

Sarah Vaughan, Miles Davis Sextette, Symphony Sid, Lambert Trio, Johnny Richards Band (18); "Four Boys and a Gun" (UA).

The Harlem vaudeer changes its pace after a week of Jocko Henderson's rock 'n' roll session, bringing in a topnotch jazz session fronted by Sarah Vaughan, and Birdland regulars Miles Davis and the Johnny Richards band. Rounding out the solid program is the jazz singing trio of Lambert threesome with Hendricks & Ross.

Miss Vaughan skillfully belts out tunes which range from ballads to scat and bop numbers, proving she is one of the few warblers around who can blend both the pop and jazz idioms in first-rate performance. Her style, marked by unusual vocal mechanics, is refreshing and easy to listen to.

Backed by a rhythm trio, she opens with a snappy "Sometimes I'm Happy" and relaxes the pace for her recently recorded "Day by Day" ballad. Fine repertoire includes "They All Laughed," "Don't Blame Me," "Misty" and winds up with "How High the Moon." Miss Vaughan not only sings flawlessly but she has stage polish to go along with it.

Frank Schiffman's "Jazz Festival" bill includes Lambert's slick trio. Group registers well, scoring with numbers from "Sing a Song of Basie" album as well as other tunes. Jon Hendricks' witty lyrics plus the ability to deliver with a fine set of pipes all add up to some solidly blended music.

Miles Davis, an established trumpet man, gives out with some progressive music. Davis has surrounded himself with jazz specialists to form a sextet and without benefit of introducing numbers rolls through a half-hour session. Backing the current bill is Johnny Richards and his 18-piece band. He is an arranger for Stan Kenton and it shows, for his band has the same sound as Kenton's. He runs through some hot bits which include "Omo Ado," "Band Air," "Dance of the Lost," and "Cimmarron."

All in all, the Apollo bill is one of the best for the house in months. It delights the jazz fans and they can't complain about the price. Bern.

Empire, Glasgow

Glasgow, Oct. 16.

Toni Dalli (with Bert Williams), Billy Anthony (with Colin Keyes), Benson Dulay & Co. (3), Trio Sparkes, Vic Gordon & Peter Colville, Johnny & Suma Lamonte, Marie De Vere Trio, Bobby Dowds Orch.

Here's another lightweight layout that doesn't merit positioning in a No. 1 vaude house, despite obvious attractiveness of its main acts. Toni Dalli, recently in from a trek to the U. S., scores pleasantly and with some degree of gabbing wit in operatic tunes, and exits to warm mitting. He garners sympathy of outfronters, and amuses with a dance bit.

Recording singer, with shock of dark hair, has a modest approach that contrasts with more aggressive style of other disk acts. His songalog ranges from "Around the World" and "Granada" to his new waxing, "More Than Ever" and "Golden Days."

Billy Anthony, in a new-style hairdo with pony tail, has less of the zip and verve of previous appearances, and has regarbed herself into an easy-on-the-eye thrush with slinky s.a. and a quieter choice of song. Registers with an Al Jolson bit, and also with "Devotion." Has obviously paid more attention to lighting and gowning, shows qualities of experience and know-how, and is less brassy than on earlier dates hereabouts.

Benson Dulay, assisted by a femme partner and some stooges, amuses with magico routines, using audience participation via some small juves, one at least being "planted." Trio Sparkes are a lively Australian acro-comedy trio with potential.

Vic Gordon & Peter Colville, cross-talk pair, to register at show caught, and should switch choice of material pronto for large houses such as this. Act, even in second-segment sketch, is slow and n.s.g. Johnny & Suma Lamonte balance and juggle skillfully, and exit to strong palming. The Bobbie Dowds resident orch does usual capable showbacking. Gord.

Industrial Show

General Motors Motorama

"Imagination in Motion," produced by Maurice Evans; Howard E. Crawford, director; June Taylor choreographer; music and lyrics, Glenn Moore and Buddy DuFault; Orch (24); Don Shirley, scenery decorator; Peggy Clark, lighting; Bill Cecil costumes executed by Helene Pons. At Waldorf-Astoria, N.Y., Oct. 16-22, '58.

General Motors is putting its best corporate feet forward with its new Motorama show. After an absence of a year, GM is returning to bigleague industrial show business with a layout that is a topnotch production and, coupled with a complete and drastic overhaul of all five of its lines, is sure to give GM a tremendous initial impact in the quest for sales.

Exhibit which opened in New York at the Waldorf (16) consists of separate displays for each division with various individual engineering features set off in their own booths around the area. Main room, in this case the Grand Ballroom, includes the 95-ton stage imported from Detroit, plus several cars in static display including GM's newest experimental job, Firebird III.

Show itself opens with a trick lighting intro which flashes on a huge screen that serves as stage curtain. Screen swings up to the ceiling for quick lead-in to opening production number featuring June Taylor Dancers, and nine singers, which establishes show's theme of "Imagination in Motion." From there the spec uses various turns to illustrate the features of "controlled power" including the Great Glasso, equilibrist who does his balancing bits effectively. Eight showgirls are garbed in various striking costumes to set off various design features of the new line.

A six-minute Technicolor and VistaVision film depicting the developmental progress of the new Firebird III gives a good behind-scenes touch that is certain to be a hit with the more technically minded and is palatable to the uninitiated.

Screen rises again and this time the back curtain is raised to reveal cars behind small gates on the stage, plus two perched high up and to the sides in the balcony between which nestles the 21-piece orch under Gil Stevens' baton. Production singers and dancers give each car a vocal and visual buildup which is climaxed by each car rising off the stage, via articulated arms moving forward toward the audience, coming down and doing a complete turn just above the heads of the audience for sock results. After each auto has taken its bow, the Taylor terpers return for final number, a hula hooper that scores nicely. Finale consists of all five cars descending into the aud and turning about for a topnotch winderupper.

Production is first-rate and though marred by a couple of slips in the opener, is sure to smooth out with time. Direction by GM's Howard E. Crawford is lively, leaving no gaps in the 40-minute show. Miss Taylor's choreography is simple yet imaginative and is performed with precision. Music and lyrics by Glen Moore & Buddy DuFault are competent though not outstanding. Sets by Don Shirley and costumes by Bill Cecil contribute significantly to a standout presentation.

Best summation of the show was made by a GM exec: "If you are going to do it, do it right." They did. Syd.

Preem Conflicts Stymie Off-B'way; Can't Afford to Buck Main Stem

Off-Broadway is again falling over its own conflicts of scheduled opening dates. The situation is regarded as damaging principally in relationship to reviews.

One of the major off-Broadway advances in recent years has been its recognition by most of the major N.Y. drama critics. However, in preeming more than one show on a given night, off-Broadway producers are apparently jeopardizing their chances of getting full firststringer coverage, since a toss-up situation exists for the critics.

Off-Broadway, unlike Broadway, has no central organization through which it clears opening dates so as to avoid conflicts. The clearing house for Main Stem shows is the League of N.Y. Theatres. Actually, some of the opening night conflicts that develop off-Broadway are the result of competitive Broadway show preems.

The off-Broadway producers are naturally more reluctant to open in opposition to a Main Stem preem than an off-Broadway debut, since the firststringers customarily give preference to the Broadway product. When the competition is relegated to off-Broadway it's usually a gamble on which show the critics will pick, although the choice doesn't necessarily have to be unanimous.

Upcoming competitive openings off-Broadway include "Time of the Cuckoo," Sheridan Square Playhouse, and "Foenix in Choir," Rita Allen Theatre, next Monday (27); "Look Back in Anger," 41st St. Theatre, and "Diversions," Downtown Theatre, Nov. 7; and "Journey With Strangers, Greenwich Mews; and "Triad," Theatre Marquee, Nov. 20.

"Foenix" had originally been skedded to open next Tuesday (28), but switched the date to avoid conflicting with the Broadway preem of "Patate." Other off-Broadway shows that switched opening dates so as not to be in competition with Broadway bows include "Man Who Never Died" and "Salad Days."

"Man" was originally scheduled to open Nov. 19 at the Jan Hus Theatre, but moved its preem to Nov. 15 to sidestep a conflict with the Main Stem preem of "Shadow of a Gunman." Similarly, "Salad Days" altered its preem from Nov. 11 to Nov. 10 rather than oppose the Broadway debut of "La Plume de Ma Tante."

Bernstein-Nederlander To Lease Erlanger, Chi; Deal Starts Next Fall

Operation of the Erlanger Theatre, Chicago, will be taken over next year by Herman Bernstein and James Nederlander. The house is currently under lease to the Marcus Heiman estate, under the direction of Cy Grody, nephew and executor. The present lease extends through next Aug. 31, and the Bernstein-Nederlander tenancy begins the following day, for a 10-year term.

Bernstein, who is a Broadway general manager (for producers Leland Hayward, Lindsay & Crouse, et al) and managing director of the CBS-owned Alvin Theatre, N.Y., and Nederlander, who is partnered with his father, David, and brother, Joseph, in the operation of the Shubert and Riviera Theatres in Detroit, have formed the B & N Theatre Corp. to run the Chicago house. Bernstein is president of the firm and Nederlander secretary-treasurer.

Bernstein will book the Erlanger from New York. It's planned to retain George Wilmot as house manager and the same boxoffice staff and other personnel.

Frisco Ballet Off Again

San Francisco, Oct. 21.

San Francisco Ballet Company, which returned from four-month Latin America tour only a fortnight ago, will embark Jan. 15 on a four-month Middle East and Africa trek.

They're favorites of American National Theatre & Academy, which expend State Dept. funds.

Indiana Books Tourers; 2d Legiter for Indpls.

Indianapolis, Oct. 21.

Indianapolis, which has been a one-theatre town since 1948, will have a second legit house this season. The 3,200-seat Indiana Theatre has switched from a film policy and is getting its first touring show Nov. 6-8 with "Tunnel of Love," starring Eddie Bracken, as the season's initial Theatre Guild subscription offering.

Dale McFarland, general manager of Greater Indianapolis Amusement Co., operator of the theatre, is also seeking other legit bookings for the house, plus concert attractions. Already set for next Wednesday (29) is Benny Goodman's band. The last previous legiter to play the Indiana was "Great Waltz" in the mid-1930's.

The Murat, which had been the sole local legit house since the razing of the English in 1948, opens its season Oct. 30-Nov. 1 with "Diary of Anne Frank," and thus far has also booked the Jerome Robbins "Ballets U.S.A." for Nov. 3-4 and "Li'l Abner" for Nov. 13-15.

$377,762 'Music' Profit to Date

The production cost of the touring company of "Music Man" was virtually covered by an advance profit guarantee on its Civic Light Opera Assn. bookings in Los Angeles and San Francisco. The production, which cost $216,012 as of an Oct. 4 audit, received a minimum profit payment of $150,000 for a 13-week split between the two Coast cities.

The road edition, which preemed in L. A. last Aug. 18, played six weeks and two days there prior to moving to Dallas, where it ended a fortnight's stay last Sunday (19). It opens in Frisco tomorrow night (Thurs.). Business has been in the same smash groove as for the original Broadway company, which has been selling out since its preem at the Majestic Theatre 45 weeks ago.

As of the Oct. 4 accounting, the profit on the Kermit Bloomgarden-Herbert Greene (in association with Frank Productions, Inc.) two-company operation was $377,762. Of that amount, $300,000 was distributed equally between the management and the backers, giving the latter a 50% return on their $300,000 investment.

READY WINTER SEASON AT MANANA, FT. WORTH

Fort Worth, Oct. 21.

A winter season is in prospect at the Casa Manana "rounds" theatre here, from Jan. 19 to March 23, three musicals and two operas being planned. Production quartet of James H. Snowden (president), Melvin Daous (producer), Michael Pollock (stage director) and William Baer (musical conductor) will repeat their duties of the nine-week, five-show summer season which opened the venture.

The winter encore and the proposed repeat next summer are all results of the city's $500,000 bond issue, voted by the public to build the aluminum-dome arena. Showmen hope to pay off the bond in due course, the municipality meantime collecting a nominal rental.

Scaled $1.50 to $3 ($3.50 weekends), the policy of imported leads and technicians and 90% local personnel, drew near 85% of capacity last summer with "Can-Can," "Carousel," "Pajama Game," "Merry Widow" and "Call Me Madame." Winter properties will lead off with a three-week presentation of "Annie Get Your Gun." The folk opera, "Susannah," of the N.Y. City Center Opera, and the comic opera, "The Abduction from the Harem," are set, as is "Silk Stockings."

Rouben Ter-Arutunian is set designer for "Maria Golovin."

Power of the Press

London, Oct. 21.

A casual passerby at the Adelphi Theatre might not realize that two of the house boards refer to the same show.

One sign quotes Sunday Times drama critic Harold Hobson as saying "Auntie Mame" is a "total disaster." The other announces that the house is sold out.

Out-of-Bounds Issue Erased By State Dept.

Washington, Oct. 21.

A Solomon's choice for Sol Hurok has been rendered unnecessary by the U.S. State Dept. after it looked like either San Francisco or Detroit would not be able to play the Soviet dance troupe, Beryozka, on its coast-to-coast tour of the country.

Another instance, currently with the Soviet pianist, Vladmir Ashkenazy, who is "out of bounds" as a Russian to Brooklyn and Newark, the "retaliatory" measure was protested strongly by Detroit's impresario, C. W. Van Lopik. Until then it was either/or between Frisco and Detroit, State agreeing to allow one exception but not both.

Both cities have since been okayed by State.

Van Lopik pointed out that a Soviet delegation of steel manufacturers had visited Detroit recently and been shown inside a number of defense-related plants in that area. "If steelmen, why not a cultural group?" he asked.

State originally answered that Detroit was opened to the visiting Communist steelers because an American delegation of touring steelmen had been allowed into a "closed" Russian city similar to Detroit. The U.S. "closed city" policy operates on a "tit for tat" basis with USSR.

TIP to End Stock Sale Oct. 30 at 400G Total; $28,800 in 'Goldilocks'

Theatrical Interests Plan Inc., a legit investment-production firm, is withdrawing its stock sale Oct. 30. The firm's capitalization is expected to hit the $400,000 mark by then.

As of last Monday (20), the income from the stock sale totalled $387,120. The firm, which invested in a number of plays last season, is involved thus far in only one of the new season's entries. That's "Goldilocks," in which the corporation has a $28,800 stake.

Shows in which TIP invested last season were "Look Homeward, Angel," "Dark at the Top of the Stairs," "Two for the Seesaw," "Music Man," "Jamaica," "Sunrise Campobello" and "Summer of the 17th Doll," the latter the only flop. The organization is also involved in the management of "Angel" and has a deal to co-sponsor a Producers Theatre presentation next season.

TIP also has an agreement with Kermit Bloomgarden to co-produce "Cry for Happy" and, on its own, controls the legit rights to Honor Tracy's novel, "The Straight and Narrow Path." Besides the investment-production activity, the organization is consultant to Broadway Theatre Alliance, the legit booking subsid of Columbia Artists Management.

George Mully is staging the off-Broadway presentation of "Look Back in Anger."

43 Strawhats Had $4,822,200 Gross; 6 Outdoor Spots Topped the Field

Business on the strawhat circuit was below par last summer, but picked up a bit the final few weeks. That's the conclusion of a number of barn managements, supported by a summary of VARIETY's weekly boxoffice estimates.

The unusually poor weather, with abnormal rain and unseasonable cold spells, was blamed for the disappointing attendance for the early part of the season, being particularly hard on the outdoor operations and tents. However, the quality of shows may have been an important factor, as the weather was still far from ideal for the latter portion of the summer, when biz was better.

Since the VARIETY boxoffice estimates covered only 43 of the 150-odd strawhats franchised by Actors Equity, and in some of those cases were for only a single week's business, they are clearly not a precise measure. However, the reports generally covered the more representative spots and were comprehensive in the types of theatres, seating capacities, kinds of shows, etc., so offer a reasonably indicative sampling.

The total gross for the 17-week period from June 2 through Sept. 27 was $4,822,200. Since no gross totals have ever been compiled before, no comparison with former years is possible. The total playing weeks for all 44 spots was 248, ranging from one the first week and two the last, to 27 each for the weeks ended Aug. 2 and Aug. 23.

There were six outdoor operations covered. They had $1,488,500 total gross and 39 total playing weeks. There were 12 tents covered, totalling $9b4,700 gross and 57 playing weeks. There were six large hardtop theatres (large meaning 1,000 seats or more), totalling $1,429,600 and 37 playing weeks. The 19 smaller hardtops (under 1,000 seats) totalled $949,400 gross and 115 playing weeks.

The strawhats covered in the gross estimates are listed below, according to type, local and al-

Set 'Can-Can' in German At Basle Stadttheatre

Basle, Oct. 14.

Another Broadway - originated musical, "Can-Can," is scheduled for German-language preem at the Stadttheatre here. The presentation will mark the third consecutive year that the Stadttheatre has included an American musical in its production sked. The season opens Oct. 16 and continues through next April 5.

The Stadttheatre was the first Swiss house to go in for U.S. legit-tuner product, with the click presentation two years ago of "Kiss Me Kate"; production of "Fanny" last season played to disappointing business. Besides "Can-Can," the Stadttheatre production slate for the 1958-59 frame includes another American-originated entry, "Look Homeward, Angel."

The season sked also lists "The Entertainer," "Under Milk Wood," "Mademoiselle Colombe," "Medea," Jean-Paul Sartre's "The Flies" and Friedrich Duerrenmatt's "An Angel Comes to Babylon." In addition to legit, the house will also present ballet and opera.

The Galas Karsenty French road company has also been booked for six performances.

5 B'way Mgmts. Pile Up $831,300

Five Broadway managements, splitting 20 New York and out-of-town shows among themselves, were responsible for a combined gross of $831,300 last week. The quintet included Kermit Bloomgarden, Herman Levin, David Merrick, Producers Theatre and the Theatre Guild. Each had more than a $100,000 share in the total take.

Merrick, with five shows, piled up $168,200 for "World of Suzie Wong," "Jamaica," "Epitaph for George Dillon," "Romanoff and Juliet" and "Look Back in Anger." The Guild, also with five entries, registered $118,100 on "Bells Are Ringing," the Broadway and road companies of "Sunrise at Campobello," "Third Best Sport" and "Tunnel of Love."

Producers Theatre, with four shows, chalked up $158,800 on "Visit," "Touch of the Poet," "Goldilocks" and "Man in the Dog Suit." Levin's two companies of "My Fair Lady" grossed $135,200, while Bloomgarden led the field with a $251,000 take on two companies of "Music Man," "Look Homeward, Angel" and "Diary of Anne Frank."

On another score, the Old Vic is believed to have established a new record for a Shakespearean repertory group in this country with a $73,700 gross on its Los Angeles stand last week.

'SEESAW' PROFIT DIVVY GOES OVER 100% MARK

The profit payoff to backers of "Two for the Seesaw" has passed the 100% mark. As of a Sept. 27 accounting, the distributed net on the Fred Coe production totalled $165,000. On the basis of the regular 50-50 split between the management and backers that gives the latter an $82,500 return on their $80,000 investment.

The total profit as of the audit, including partial income from the sale of the film rights, was $256,921. The balance of assets, after the divvy of profits and other deductions, was $63,220. That amount was carried over to an emergency fund to cover the cost of mounting the touring edition of the William Gibson comedy-drama.

The management figures the production tab on the road company, which got underway Oct. 6, with Ruth Roman and Jeffrey Lynn costarring, should run around $35,000. The original Broadway edition of the two-character play, costarring Dana Andrews and Anne Bancroft, is currently in its 41st week at the Booth Theatre.

Fear Covent Garden May Go Dark Shortly; Seek $8,400,000 Grant

London, Oct. 21.

Covent Garden Opera House is in danger of going dark because of lack of funds. Sir William Emrys Williams, secretary general of the Arts Council, cites this in the council's 13th annual report, stating: "unless a substantial increase in its resources can be found immediately, the centenary of this famous house, celebrated with impressive ceremony a few months ago, may soon be followed by its demise."

Sir William says an annual Exchequer grant of $8,400,000 could pull the arts in Britain out of the red and provide them with the security they deserve. The grant for the 1957-58 amounted to $2,758,000.

Report says that municipal grants had shown a slight increase, but it was industry which was taking the place of the private patron who now has practically disappeared. The annual grant of $280,000 by the Independent Television Authority to the arts, is described as "a munificent act of patronage which may well stimulate other forms of big business to enlarge their support for the arts."

Write 'Beautiful Hours' For Foreign Production

Leonard K. Marker, Hans Lengsfelder and Siegfried Tisch have collaborated again on a musical intended for German-language abroad. Marker, who's been in the U. S. since leaving Vienna in 1938, plans going to Europe soon to discuss presentation there of the tuner, which is titled "24 Schone Stunden" (24 Beautiful Hours).

Meanwhile, the trio continue to be represented overseas by productions of their oldies, "The Ministry is Insulted" and "Why Do You Lie, Cherie?" The former was revived recently in Hamburg and was also done on television in Holland, while "Cherie" was performed recently on tv in Belgium.

B. Engler, incidentally, was a collaborator on "Ministry."

Joshua Logan, a master showman, has done it again. In "The World of Suzie Wong" he has one of the bright exhibits of his career. With the Logan trademark all over it, this Paul Osborn dramatization of Richard Mason's bestseller is a natural for the general public and, despite a mixed press (with pans from several of the more influential critics) should be a comfortable boxoffice hit. It's also, in passing, another success for producer David Merrick, his seventh in a row.

Drama esthetes may deplore the show's lurid quality, its emphasis on sex and its uninhibited theatricality, and anyone might sniff at the yarn's preposterous assumption that a Hong-Kong waterfront tart could pose convincingly as a strictly-reared Chinese heiress, and that the admittedly lonely, smitten Canadian artist would persist in refusing the girl's fervent pleas to hit the hay with her.

But tawdry as Mason's original story may be, and shallow and stereotype as the characters unquestionably are, "Suzie" has what the expense-account trade wants, and it thereby fulfills the requirements of the commercially-based Broadway theatre. The fact that the show's locale is a brothel and the heroine a prostie isn't likely to limit the draw. On the contrary, those elements should be boxoffice assets, as they are so skillfully handled that the show seems to have especial appeal for femme audiences.

On the basis of advance interest there's a huge built-in public among readers of Mason's novel about the romance between the intense, reluctant artist and the art-conscious, heart-of-gold Chinese bar-girl in the Hong-Kong hotel-joint. Even to the exception who may not have read the book, it's obvious why it's been a bestseller. It lacks subtlety or even credibility, but it clearly has the sort of carefully suggestive punch that insures popularity.

With due credit to Osborn's knowing adaptation, Logan's familiar, expertly flamboyant showmanship is evident from the moment when the picturesque Hong-Kong harbor scrim rises to show the meeting between the artist and the demure girl on the ferry deck, until the final, quiet scene in which the couple are united in grief and understanding.

It's an elaborate production, with a large cast of Orientals and Occidental tourists, many scene changes, striking characters, vivid costuming, and swift transitions of mood, all handled with the daring and precision of a professional. The result is an uncanny blend of comedy and sentiment that will hold average audiences in rapt enjoyment.

Purists and sophisticates may cringe or hoot at its unrestrained sexiness and sensationalism. Perhaps only a showman with Logan's theatrical flair and unselfconscious daring could have brought it off as a popular success. Without all the visual trappings, the dramatic hokum, the story would be nothing. But with this swiftly kaleidoscopic production, "Suzie" is a spectacular show.

Jo Mielziner, whose designs have long been a byword of theatrical taste, has created one of his most stunning and ingenious productions in the complicated but beautifully simple arrangement of panels and sets and drops that shifts the locale from harbor shipboard to swarming street, honkytonk hotel lobby and bar, and then the artist's tacky, almost continuously populated but curiously private room. The Dorothy Jeakins costumes also lend a telling element of atmosphere.

France Nuyen, making her first stage appearance, is a captivating Suzie, unaffected, spirited and touchingly gallant. William Shatner, also a newcomer to Broadway, is engaging as the confused but steadfast artist, and Ron Randell contributes a credible performance as the "steady boy friend" whose abandonment of Suzie is instrumental in her winning the artist.

Sarah Marshall gives an expressive performance in the ill-defined role of a British art expert with a futile yen for the artist, Stephen C. Cheng gives a graphic portrayal of the perceptive hotel proprietor, Noel Leslie is acceptable as an understanding British visitor, and a bevy of attractive Oriental-looking girls add a welcome touch as amiable bar hustlers. All the individual performances suffer, of course, from the synthetic limitation of the characters, but they are saved by the sheer color and movement of the show as a whole.

The basic element of the "Suzie" click is, obviously, Mason's enormously popular novel. Important ingredients are Osborn's dramatization, Mielziner's eloquent physical production and Miss Nuyen's glowing title portrayal. But the vital spark and the decisive touch are Logan's spectacular production conception and staging.

Incidentally, the show is presented by Merrick, in partnership with Seven Arts Productions (Ray Stark and Eliot Hyman, who own the valuable film rights) and Mansfield Productions (Logan's producing corporation). Hobe.

The Girls in 509

Alfred de Liagre Jr. production of two-act (five scenes) comedy by Howard Teichmann; staging, Bretaigne Windust; setting and lighting, Donald Oenslager; costumes, Lucinda Ballard. Stars Peggy Wood. Imogene Coca; features King Donovan, Robert Emhardt, James Millhollin, Fred Stewart. At the Belasco Theatre, N.Y., Oct. 15, '58; $5.75 top weeknights, $6.90 Friday-Saturday nights. $9.20 opening).

Some shows are baffling. How can a play with a captivating farce idea and an overflowing assortment of amusing jokes fail to be funny? For instance, "The Girls in 509," by practically all the rules, should be a scream. But in all too sober fact, it's briefly laughable and then rather tiring.

The Howard Teichmann script presents two eccentrics, a formidable spinster descendant of a famously rich and social family, and her most puppyishly friendly niece. Both rock-ribbed Republicans, they have been living in anonymous seclusion in an obscure old residential hotel (something like the late Murray Hill, N.Y.) ever since that calamitous day in 1932 when That Man swamped the GOP at the polls.

When the press discovers these hermits and the bustling public shatters their privacy they are at first overjoyed to learn that the detested Democracts have been ousted from the White House, but then confused and horrified by the changes from the world they knew (there are still income taxes, for one outrageous thing). In their disillusionment they scorn the sacred GOP and, of course, the supplicant Democrats, but are presently mollified when it turns out that they own a bale of General Motors stocks (acquired at early-1930's prices).

Few farces have such promising ideas as "The Girls in 509," but all too many turn out to be approximately as disappointing. Perhaps the fault in this case is not primarily with the script. Maybe the casting, staging and performance is at least partly responsible. That impression is fortified by the fact that many undeniable funny lines just fail to get laughs.

Although Peggy Wood is amusingly regal and forceful as the surviving matriarch of a once-great family, her playing may be even too emphatic and precise. And while Imogene Coca is antically off-beat as the niece who's almost frantically anxious to acquire a husband, or at least a man, less exaggeration and more finesse might sustain better in terms of overall humor.

Perhaps the rest of the cast, busily going through the motions of comedy, performing the required business and doing the prescribed "takes," would be more believable and entertaining if they took it easier.

Everyone, including apparently Teichmann, seems to be working too hard, so the play tends to run downhill. Many of the jokes are firecrackers, or should be, especially for the insiders who attend Broadway first-nights. The author, an old friend of N.Y. Times managing editor Turner Catledge, gives both him and his paper a ribbing, and also tosses barbs at various other individuals, groups, professions and institutions, including both major political parties and politicians as a breed.

Somehow, though, the jokes don't seem to be set up quite properly, or the emphasis or spacing is wrong, or the performance lacks variety or pacing. Whatever the reason, the barrage of jokes falls flatter and flatter, and the play as a whole just sort of subsides.

Alfred de Liagre Jr. has produced, Bretaigne Windust has staged and in addition to the two stars the cast includes King Donovan as a bashful journalism professor posing as a Times reporter, Roberts Emhardt in the dual role of both the Republican and Democratic national chairmen (and just to sharpen the satire and possibly further confuse literal-minded playgoers, he wears the same clothes and expression, and has almost the same lines in both characterizations), while Fred Stewart is a Pooh-Bah hotel employee, James Millhollin an acidly-drawn lawyer and a half-dozen others are nosey reporters, photogs and a welfare worker.

Donald Oenslager has designed the appropriately old-world hotel room setting and Lucinda Ballard has provided suitable passe costumes for the daffy ladies. Everybody has worked so hard on "Girls in 509" it's a shame it doesn't add up to enough. Hobe.

OPPENHEIMER'S TIPTOP 'PASSIONATE PLAYGOER'

George Oppenheimer, playwright, screenwright and currently drama critic of the Long Island Newsday, has appropriately named his book "The Passionate Playgoer: A Personal Scrapbook" (Viking; $5.95). It is a sumptuous collection of theatrical memoribilia, well edited, well organized, including some good original writing by the anthologist himself.

The volume is ingeniously subdivided into categories, such as the audience, the actor, the playwright, the road, the producer, the songsmiths, the critics etc.

It is indeed a "passionate" valentine to the American theatre by an expert whose ardor and affection has not permitted warping of the values in the selection of the byliners, who read like a who's who from the Authors' League of America and Actors' Equity. Some of the contributors: Ethel Barrymore, Ruth Gordon, Alexander Woollcott, Robert E. Sherwood, S. N. Behrman, Dorothy Parker, Tallulah Bankhead, Arthur Kober, John Mason Brown, Thomas Wolfe, Ashton Stevens, Percy Hammond, Ogden Nash, George S. Kaufman, Moss Hart, Robert Lewis Taylor, Charles Brackett, James Thurber, Clifton Fadiman, Richard Rodgers, Lawrence Langner, Oscar Hammerstein 2d, Joshua Logan, Robert Benchley, Phyllis McGinley, Tennessee Williams, Maxwell Anderson, William Saroyan, Hobe Morrison, S. J. Perelman, John van Druten, John Chapman, Ward Morehouse, Ben Hecht, Thornton Wilder, Elliot Norton, George Abbott, Richard Maney, Deems Taylor, George Jean Nathan, Richard Watts Jr., Wolcott Gibbs, Louis Kronenberger, Gilbert W. Gabriel, Brooks Atkinson, Joe Laurie Jr., Frank Sullivan, Arthur Schwartz, Howard Dietz, Ring Lardner, DuBose Heyward and Walter Kerr.

It's a tiptop gift book and anybody who's ever bought a legit theatre ticket will have something —plenty—within the contents of "The Passionate Playgoer" to savor. Abel.

'Ballet of 3 Decades'

"Ballet of Three Decades" by Audrey Williamson (Macmillan; $5), is a British import, the author's first dance book since 1950, following her "Contemporary Ballet" and "Art of the Ballet." Specially treated here are the Ballets Russes of the 1930s; rise of the English ballet; postwar dance influences in Britain from the U.S., France, Denmark and the Soviet. Tome is not only a report, but also a criticism of some current standards in ballet.

Book is sound in scholarship, and well-illustrated. Rodo.

Jeanette Kamins is production assistant for "Three Against Time."

Inside Stuff—Legit

Presence of Mary Stanton in the cast of "Drink to Me Only" and fact that the name of the Broadway theatre housing the comedy has been switched from the Adelphi to the 54th Street recalls another change. Miss Stanton was Maria Sohovich when she moved from Bridgeport to Broadway. A singer, she appeared in a succession of George Abbott musicals. Abbott preferred her real name and when she earned billing in the revival of "On Your Toes" he urged her to revert to the genuine article. Miss Stanton declined. Abbott, as usual, had the last word. When he was writing "Damn Yankees" (in which Miss Stanton also appeared) he tagged one of the baseball players "Sohovich."

Incidentally, Miss Stanton's husband, John Allen, is stage manager of "Drink To Me Only" and doubles into a small role (the bailiff) in the comedy. He's a frequent contributor to the drama section of the N.Y. Herald-Tribune and also packages musicals (most recently "Pajama Game") for the strawhat circuit. He is collaborating with Abbott on the book for a musical, "The Jet-Propelled Couch," to be produced by Robert E. Griffith and Harold S. Prince.

Those who went along to producer David Merrick's post-premiere "World of Suzie Wong" party in Chinatown, N.Y., found that the untimely downpour was a disguised blessing, as it minimized an already jampacked turnout. The narrow Mott and Pell Streets were further blocked by television trucks for the WNTA-David Susskind interview program from the Hang Far Low restaurant. Another windfall was the $5 in scrip (in 50c denominations) distributed to the VIP invitees; for that night it had purchasing power anywhere in Chinatown. Result was that many guests had drinks in competitive eateries, paying in scrip, since the prime restaurant was overcrowded regardless with tv and extra personnel. Also, the Chinatown curio and gift shops did bullish biz, also accepting the scrip as valid currency.

David Pelham, producer of the London edition of "Auntie Mame," and Henry Sherek, operator of the Adelphi Theatre, where the Patrick Dennis-Jerome Lawrence-Robert E. Lee comedy is current, have settled their dispute over the use of advertising slides during the intermissions of the show. Hylton has discontinued the showing of the commercial blurbs on condition that Pelham will reimburse him for the loss of $22 weekly revenue involved.

The use of the slides is a regular practice at the theatre, but Pelham objected on the ground that it is undignified and that it detracted from the effect of the comedy slides used to introduce the play.

Jack Hylton's "La Plume de Ma Tante," the French revue which played for two years in London, will have additional English lines for its Broadway run. This is in deference to the monolinguistics of average American showgoers, so while the atmosphere of the musical will still be Gallic (including some saucy scenes and business), the French "dialog" will be kept to such common-denominators as oo-la-la, monsieur, etc., and the pantomime—since author-star Robert Dhery is essentially a mime—will speak for the rest. Also in the show with Dhery is his choreographer-comedienne-wife Colette Brosset.

Third Best Sport

Detroit, Oct. 20.

Theatre Guild production of three-act (four scenes) comedy by Leanor and Leo Bayer; staged by Michael Howard; associate producer, Henry T. Weinstein; costumes, Michael Travis; scenery, Marvin Reiss; Miss Holm's clothes by Robert Mackintosh. Stars Celeste Holm; features Andrew Duggan, William Prince, Judson Laire, Jane Hoffman, Parker McCormack, Howard Weirum, James Karen, Joseph Boland, Irene Cowan. At Cass Theatre, Detroit, Oct. 20, '58.

The title of this Eleanor and Leo Bayer comedy is defined as a convention. But the play's ironic point is that a corporation is just a big, happy family replete with direction - by - committee, togetherness, harmony and conformity. That idea is presented with such good humor and witty, pithy lines that a long Broadway run and a healthy touring life seem likely. In addition, there is amply content here for films, tv and stock.

The Theatre Guild production keeps the audience giggling and guffawing. But what is more enduring, many a wife will poke Mr. Business Tycoon in the ribs to make sure he gets the point of a familiar vignette of corporation life being depicted on stage. For his part, Mr. Business Tycoon will probably explain that he recognizes some of the "togetherness stuff" that "other" firms try to live up to.

In effect, the play takes the skeleton of such books as "The Organization Man," etc., and adds meaty humor. The result is good fun, with interesting points nicely packaged for easy digestion.

Celeste Holm does a terrific job as the "socially retarded" non-conformist bride of the general manager of a large company. She has such a wealth of good lines that she can perhaps afford to give some of them a throw-away delivery. Or, if it's decided to alter that aspect of the performance, there's time to do so during the tryout. The star is unerring in harnessing the maximum number of yocks via stage business.

Andrew Duggan is splendid as the groom who watches with horror, then with growing respect as his bride, in attempting to conform to the organization team rules, nearly ruins a big deal before she patches things up by showing that individualism and "good old fashioned free enterprise" have their merits. The comedy revolves around her rebellion against the idea that when a woman marries a man she also marries his company.

William Prince scores as the "wrong" doctor who, invited by the bride to address a convention banquet, turns out to be a philosopher who believes in individual freedom, rather than the conformist economic theorist of similar name. Judson Laire fulfills the roll of the hail-fellow, cliche-ridden "team" leader. Jane Hoffman and Parker McCormack do well as company wives with the "right" team spirit. Others are well cast.

Michael Howard's direction keeps the pace lively. The single setting of a contemporary hotel room by Marvin Reiss merits applause. Costumes by Michael Travis are appropriate.

"Sport" remains here two weeks, then goes to Cincinnati and possibly St. Louis before heading for Broadway. With more polish, it should make the trip with ease. In case anyone cares, the first and second best sports, as defined in the play, are sex and baseball, in that order. Tew.

99 Times Around The Block

Montreal, Oct. 8.

Montreal Repertory Theatre's production of a two-act (three scenes) drama by Myron Galloway. Directed by Julia Murphy; decor, Griffith Brewer; costumes, Lydia Crisp. Features Gladys Richards and Victor Knight. At MRT, Montreal, Oct. 7, '58. $2.50 top.

Montreal playwright Myron Galloway's "99 Times" was written originally as a 60-minute television show and played with considerable success on both the English and French networks of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the BBC in London. As a tele offering it was trim and lively but as a two-acter for legit it tends to be verbose and repetitious.

Concerning a jilted spinster whose obsession is an old family house filled with self-created memories, the Galloway yarn has a lengthy first act which only gets off the ground when a jobless wanderer makes his entrance with robbery in mind. It is at this point the tele show started and first scene of second act is solid theatre tightly written and forceful. Gladys Richards, who plays the spinster with a yen for the bottle, is im-

Concerning Shubert Foundation

The Shubert Foundation right now contributes to 200 different charity organizations. Under N.Y. State Law all income and interest on investments must be disbursed within the same year and not piled up. Rather than endow a Chair of the Drama at Yale, for example, John Shubert says that the purpose of the charity is to succor the amusement industry at the local level—the Actors' Fund of America, the Jewish, Episcopal and Catholic Actors Guilds, the Lambs and Friars' benevolent funds and the like.

He details that, in New York alone, there are 12 different Shubert companies, set up for certain operations. Magowo Corp., for example, controls the Majestic, Golden and World, taking its corporate title from the names of the theatres. Affiliated Theatres has the Shubert, Booth, Plymouth and Broadhurst under its wing. The 1670 Broadway Corp. covers the Winter Garden; many of the other theatres have their addresses as the corporate label.

Five percent of the gross profits (before taxes) goes from each of the Shubert companies into the Foundation. Both John and J. J. Shubert, his father, each contribute 15% off the top of their incomes to the fund. His father, like the late Lee Shubert, also gives an extra 5% to outside, personal charities, he details.

Theatre Setup

The Shuberts have 19 theatres in New York, wholly or in partnership; the Music Box for instance, is 50% owned by Irving Berlin. Seventeen of the 19 need complete new airconditioning—the MB and the Broadway are all right under their present cooling plants.

Following the consent decree, says John Shubert, they divested themselves of more theatres than necessary. Right now the out-of-New York operations include the Shubert, Boston; Forrest and Walnut, Philly; Cox and Shubert, Cincinnati; half-ownership of the Cass, Detroit; the Shubert, Blackstone and Great Northern, Chicago.

In New York they divested themselves of the St. James, National (which Billy Rose now owns), Ritz and Elliott.

The Shuberts actually own four in Boston but three are now in a picture policy, leased to Ben Sack whose Saxon Corp. operates the Majestic (renamed the Saxon), Copley (renamed the Capri) and Plymouth (renamed the Gary).

The Harris and Selwyn, two former Shubert houses in Chicago, are now owned by the Michael Todd Co. and one is being renamed the Mike Todd.

Genealogy

The direct lineage of "the three boys from Syracuse,"—the late Sam S. Shubert (for whom the 44th St. playhouse bearing the family name is actually named), the late Lee Shubert and the surviving J. J.—ends with John. Lee Shubert's heir is Milton, a nephew, and Lawrence Shubert, who operates the family interests in Philadelphia, is also a nephew. Sylvia, a niece, also gets a life interest in the estate, then it all reverts to the foundation. John details that Fanny Shubert was the oldest, then Lee, then came Sarah (who married Ed Davidow, a former bigtime vaudeville agent), J. J., Sam, Lisa and Dora were next. Dora (Mrs. Milton) Wolf and Lisa are both dead. Wolf long operated Josephs, a couturier, and then went into insurance.

Facelift Legit

how that affects a corporation, and the Foundation.

"If we earmark a million-and-a-half for new airconditioning etc. and Mr. Lee's heirs look askance we may have a problem there.

"If we figure on a series of small units of 15 tons each, so that one machine will work if another should break down, that's costlier. That's what we favor. A smaller theatre can be properly aircooled with 30 tons, but a big 1,700-capacity house like the Majestic needs 80 tons and that means five such units."

This is part of Shubert's awareness that their theatres have competition vis-a-vis the Dowling-Roger L. Stevens spending for facelifting the City Playhouses. Then he wonders how a $1,100,000 investment into the Globe (Lunt-Fontanne); $70,000 for a new marquee at the Hayes and a $300,000 investment to gain some 58 seats downstairs at the same theatre adds up in theatre realty. Just as he wonders about Billy Rose's plan to import British artist Oliver Messel to redesign and do a new decor for the National which Rose recently took over.

The Shuberts have firm views on customer-appeal. Those awkwardly iron-angled signs, the marquee and top-of-the-theatre tungstens—"all that is the traditional basis of the legitimate theatre—a star seeing his or her name in lights—and the public seeing who and what's playing. You have to get under the marquee of the Hayes and Lunt-Fontanne to see the name of the theatre or the attraction; and there's no sign to indicate the names of theatres from afar."

Shubert admits "the David Belasco idea of dark brown" for theatres is before his time but he feels that some of the comment he has heard that "the white and the gold is so distracting to the public that it detracts from concentrating on the stage."

'Glamorizing' a Must

(The theory of names-in-lights or obscured-marquees has been pro-and-con in recent months but the "progressive" legit people, who feel that the playhouses must be "glamorized" to compete with contemporaneous standards, sum it up, "There's no such thing as 'shopping' today as before; they come from the east side for a specific show, they know the address of the theatre as well as they know the name of the play, and if they don't the cabdrivers do").

Shubert observed that other showmen have felt that "all this facelifting is mostly to please the manager, the producer and the star, and the public is really incidental" although he admits that the public is not blind to creature comforts. "But," he adds, "if they want to see 'Suzie Wong,' the fact that the Broadhurst chairs are showing their seams, which is what I saw myself, and determined to do something about, is not going to keep them away."

Shubert says the average theatre requires four complete weeks to clear it for painting, recarpeting and airconditioning, and obviously the winter is not the season to undertake such projects. Comes next summer undoubtedly there will be steps taken, depending apparently on appraisal and settlement of Lee Shubert's estate.

It is not just theatres. There are over 1,000 play properties. How to appraise the future values of "Blossom Time," "Student Prince," "Ziegfeld Follies," songs, etc., is a problem.

Concert Review

Chicago Symphony

Fritz Reiner brought his Chicago Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall last week (15) under the S. Hurok auspices and the evening turned into a triumph for the visitors. Superb discipline, a full, rich tone and a rare kind of musicianship characterized the orchestra of real distinction and under his baton it performed on a level with the best of 'em.

Right from the start, the Berlioz Corsair overture, the orchestra proved its skill. The Bartok Suite for Orchestra, one of the composers earlier works, left the large audience shouting with admiration. The piece had body and vibrance and demonstrated the many delicate shadings which the orchestra is capable of.

There followed an excellent, emotional reading of the Brahms Third, executed with rare orchestral precision, and—for the windup—Wagner's Siegfried's Rhine Journey, played with all the sonorous effects the piece calls for.

Shirl Conway, who toured the musical tent circuit last summer in the title role of "Auntie Mame," will repeat the assignment for two weeks at the Coconut Grove Playhouse, Miami, beginning Nov. 24.

The Family Reunion

Phoenix Theatre (sponsored by Theatre Inc.) presentation of T. Edward Hambleton & Norris Houghton production of two-act drama by T. S. Eliot. Stars Lillian Gish, Florence Reed, Fritz Weaver; features Conrad Bain, Eric Berry, Meredith Dallas, Robert Geiringer, Nicholas Joy, Dorothy Sands, Sylvia Short, Margaretta Warwick. Staged by Stuart Vaughan; setting, Norris Houghton; costumes and lighting, Will Steven Armstrong; music, David Amram. At Phoenix Theatre, N.Y., Oct. 20, '58; $4.60 top.

The rites of Thomas Stearns Eliot, Nobel prizewinner and anglicized American poet, are always impressive if often obscure. His two-act tragedy, "The Family Reunion," was written and first produced in England in 1939, but the star-studded revival that has opened the Phoenix Theatre's new season is the play's initial full-fledged professional New York production.

The news from the Phoenix concerns first the production, then the play, for the performance of a splendid cast, under the searching staging of the talented young director, Stuart Vaughan, are more explicit than the author has been.

Eliot's people live in areas of highly developed intellectual sensitivities where the atmosphere is frequently rare. Allusion, symbolism and mysticism abound. In "The Family Reunion," too, there are choral speaking interludes, heightening the resemblance to Greek tragedy. This device must be superbly done or fall by its own clumsiness. In this case the otherwise fine actors at the Phoenix have been self-conscious to the point of imprecision.

Through the texture of his play, dealing with a young English lord who is pursued by personal furies known only to himself and one or two intimates, Eliot has woven a strong thread of implausibility. Perhaps he has felt that to a poet this doesn't matter, though that's debatable for stage writing.

But while these are flaws in Eliot's play as theatre, a medium in which people will pay money at the box office to get in or they won't, Eliot's lofty wish to deal only in his special brand of truth, can make an evening in his company stimulating, particularly when such players as Florence Reed, Fritz Weaver, Lillian Gish, Conrad Bain, Margaretta Warwick, Dorothy Sands, Eric Berry and Nicholas Joy are on hand to speak his lines and interpret in the flesh.

As the matriarch of a close-knit English family, Florence Reed is a tower of strength, inner discipline and imperative performance. When Miss Reed has the stage, nobody else has, and it almost seems that after a lifetime of sterling performance, Miss Reed is still growing.

Possibly Fritz Weaver will outgrow his recent Hamlet, but his joust with Eliot's mad young lord is not calculated to widen the gulf perceptibly. Despite a manifest relationship, however, Weaver again shows his vigor, intelligence and dimension.

Miss Gish's strength, as is no surprise, is the directness of her attack. It is difficult for an actor to be facile in Eliot's charade, but Miss Gish is comfortable. With a particularly winning performance by Conrad Bain, as a rural doctor, and with the lesser roles being finely served, Eliot's hitherto locally neglected play gets what customarily is called "the works."

This is the first of the Phoenix Theatre's 1958-59 series of plays by Nobel Prize authors. For playgoers who relish cryptic thought with their drama, Eliot's play may be it, though some may echo the querulous question that Margaretta Wardick snaps out toward the close. "What has happened, Amy?"

The Hostage

London, Oct. 15.

Theatre Workshop presentation of three-act drama by Brendan Behan. Staged by Joan Littlewood; decor, Sean Kenny. At Theatre Royal, Stratford, London, Oct. 14, '58; $1.05 top.

Brendan Behan, the Irish playwright whose "The Quare Fellow" had a prestige success in the West End, has his second work staged by the Theatre Workshop at the Theatre Royal, Stratford, a w.k. nabe theatre. "The Hostage" is not nearly as good as "The Quare Fellow," but it has riotous and lusty humor and a novelty value that could give it a fair chance of success in the West End. Since it breaks so many theatre rules, any transfer either to the West End or to Broadway would be a hit or miss venture.

Set in a blowsy Dublin tenement brothel, "The Hostage" is the story of a young English soldier held as hostage for an Irish Republican Army soldier condemned by the English in Belfast. The English boy is eventually shot by accident, but not until there has been a considerable vivid and bawdy ridicule of Anglo-Irish relationship, sex British royalty and numerous other themes.

The action is interrupted at intervals for dancing and music-hall songs, some of which are witty but irrelevant. Behan's dialog is liberally salted with oaths and ebullient patter and his characters are an assorted array of tarts, pimps and eccentrics.

Though the play has no form, it blows a refreshing gust through the theatre and the yocks come incessantly. Now and again the mask of humor falls and there is a hint of tragedy and here Behan proves that, if he could be disciplined, he might write a moving tragedy. Joan Littlewood's direction is effectively flamboyant and Sean Kenny's dingy setting is brilliant.

The author and director are well served by a cast of obscure performers with several performances rating special mention. Murray Melvin plays the young Cockney soldier with unflagging zest. Howard Goorney gives a rich performance as a ribald, alcoholic caretaker, and Avis Bunnage as a harlot, Celia Salkeld as a not so innocent servant girl, Eileen Kennally as a cranky social worker and Robin Chapman as a secret agent are remarkable products of Behan's florid, ripe imagination.

It is not quite clear what the author intends to convey. He appears to be cheerfully "anti" almost anything, but "The Hostage" provides characters and stretches of irreverent dialog which might have come out of O'Casey or Synge. Rich.

The Stepmother

Glasgow, Oct. 3.

Murray MacDonald & John Stevens Ltd. (in association with V. L. Productions Ltd.) presentation of drama by Warren Chetham-Strode, from novel by R. C. Hutchinson; staging, Henry Kaplan; decor, Anthony Holland. Stars Kate Reid; features Tim Seeley, Maggie Smith, Ian Hunter. At King's Theatre, Glasgow, Oct. 1, '58; $1.30 top.

Lottie Macdowell ..... Joan Newell
Catherine Ashland ..... Kate Reid
Foster ..... Franklyn Scott
Lawrence Ashland ..... Ian Hunter
Vere Dane ..... Maggie Smith
Stephen Ashland ..... Tim Seely
Dr. Powell ..... David Waller
Joe ..... Leon Garcia

Femme interest is strong in this somewhat uneven play, which shifts from situation between father and stepmother to a situation between son and young widow. Sound acting, especially by Maggie Smith and Kate Reid, holds interest throughout. "Stepmother" is being tried out prior to London.

Miss Reid, newly in from Canada for the play, provides a strong portrayal of the cool efficient second wife of a British diplomat. Tall, elegant and poised, the copper-haired Toronto actress enhances her reputation this side of the Atlantic as the secretary who escapes spinsterhood to marry her boss, but finds her love unreturned.

Tim Seeley is suitably repressed and unstable as the son of a first marriage, determined to marry the blonde brassy young widow of a man he shot in the war, and then falling in love with h's stepmother at crucial moment when latter's love for his father is not returned. Miss Smith scores as the widow, slogging it out as a secretary in a third-rate vaude agency. She adds conviction to a somewhat incredible role.

Ian Hunter is adequately British and pompous as a government administrator who can't forget his first wife. Joan Newell captures the cosiness of his sister-in-law. David Waller has essentially middleaged charm as a sympathetic doctor friend and Leon Garcia contributes a minor bit effectively as a clueless office-boy in the agent's office.

Henry Kaplan's staging is brisk. Anthony Holland's decor ranges authoritatively between a rural morning-room in Surrey, a seedy London talent agency and shabby city lodgings.

"Stepmother" has contrived situations. It apparently is intended to show that love is required by everyone. Despite its unevenness, it diverts most customers, and has an asset in its femme interest.

Marcel Marceau Co.

Paris, Oct. 16.

Christian Casadesus presents the Marcel Marceau Mime Co. (12) in single mimes and two "mimodramas," "The Matadors" and "The Little Circus," by Marceau. With Marceau, Gilles Segal, Sabine Lods, Edmond Tamiz, Pierre Verry. Staged by Marceau; sets and costumes, Jacques Noel; music, Sebastian Marcello, Jean Prodromides. At Theatre Ambigu, Paris, Oct. 15, '58; $3 top.

After making a name for himself abroad via mime shows, both solo and with Gilles Segal, his disciple, Marcel Marceau is now established in his own land and has made mime and pantomime, which calls mimodramas, boxoffice as well as a cult attraction. He has reactivated his company and has taken over the Ambigu Theatre for a year's engagement.

Whether the project amounts to wishful thinking remains to be seen, but as time goes on, Marceau will need some program changes for his new group entries. Also, some of the long pantomimes he has developed tend to show up the limitations of this wordless medium than enhance it.

"The Matadors" tells of an aging torero who is replaced in his girl's affections and the public eye by a young man he has taught and befriended. This might be better suited to the movement and sweep of the dance rather than the more literal aspects of mime.

"The Little Circus" has more animation, but is bogged down with too many preps. Marceau is still at his best as the little man at odds or in tune with his imaginary world. It is these segments which will keep Marceau solvent here. He is well aided by the more dynamic, but less pathetic and subtle, mimes of Segal and by some of his troupe. Sets and costumes by Jacques Noel are functional and inventive, and music is an aid.

Marceau brought this theatrical form to a high creative level and has reinstated it with a public which has usually relegated it to the music halls. Mosk.

La Bonne Soupe

(GOOD SOUP)

Paris, Oct. 21.

Marie-Rose Belin and Paule Rolle present three-act comedy by Felecien Marceau. Stars Marie Bell, Jeanne Moreau; features, Armontel, Henri Cremieux, Daniel Ceccaldi, Alfred Adam, Mathilde Casadesus, Madeleine Barbulee. Staged by Andre Barsacq; sets and costumes, Jacques Noel. At Gymnase, Paris, Oct. 14, '58; $3 top.

Croupier ..... Armontel
Gaston ..... Henri Cremieux
Roger ..... Daniel Ceccaldi
Odilon ..... Alfred Adam
Irma ..... Mathilde Casadesus
Angele ..... Medeleine Barbulee

Felecien Marceau, whose "L'Oeuf" (The Egg) is in its third year here, has a new hit in "La Bonne Soupe" (The Good Soup). It is a salty, at times ribald, comedy using much the same techniques as its predecessor.

"Egg" had a little man talking to the audience and telling about trying to get into the hermetically sealed egg society. It had him walking into various scenes he brought up. It was tart and even grisley as he finally stoops to murder and pandering to beat the so-called "system."

"Soupe" has a woman telling the story of her life, but she tells it to a croupier in Monte Carlo one slow day, and another actress acts out her tale while she comments on it or butts in to counterpoint an aspect or take over completely.

Driving the heroine is the fear of falling or not having enough money, since she comes from a poor family. Play is primarily a series of sketches underlining human baseness. This is the play's main weakness. It wallows in the sordid without illumination.

It shines with some bright scenes, especially the heroine's days as a tart, pointing out the types who patronize these girls, and relating her first and only love, her forced marriage into wealth

There was a festive mood about the Broadway Theatre last Tuesday night (14) as the leaders of the French colony in New York turned out to greet France's Theatre National Populaire in its first appearance on Broadway. The play, Alfred de Musset's "Lorenzaccio," opened a three-week engagement of repertory in French, and what it lacks in substance it makes up in staging, design and costuming. It is a stunning production.

The Theatre National Populaire, imported to Gotham by S. Hurok, and under the auspices of the French Government, matches in both performance and effect the two other French companies seen here in earlier years—the Comedie Francaise and the Jean-Luis Barrault-Madeleine Renaud troupe. Like them, it focusses on the French classics and performs them with skill and care for detail, which in turn reflects in the smooth coordination of a company obviously geared to ensemble playing.

"Lorenzaccio" is a showpiece in true sense, an ideal vehicle for the actors and, as staged by Gerard Philipe, a visually exciting and satisfying spectacle. The color and atmosphere of the Medici period come through vividly in the production, an equal, almost overpowering match for a basically weak play.

De Musset was an incurable romantic and the Lorenzaccio of the play, effectively played by Philipe, had more than a passing resemblance to Hamlet. The story, briefly, has Lorenzo de Medicis determined to kill the tyrant duke Alexandre. To get his opportunity, he joins the court and is sucked into the depraved circle of Alexandre's friends. Eventually, with distaste and as an act of expiation, he kills the tyrant, only to find another Medici taking taking on the throne.

Philipe, better known in the U.S. as a film actor, brings understanding to the role of the weak, self-despising Lorenzo, ca'led Loranzaccio by his taunting Republican friends. In some respects the part is over-played, but Philipe certainly registers the idea of the tortured soul, seeking strength in his hate of himself. Philippe Noiret as the Duke Alexandre cuts a magnificently robust and arrogant figure, cruel and evil to the core.

Genevieve Page as the Marquise Cibo is beautiful and affectingly simple, dominating the stage through sheer strength of personality with one of the play's major performances. Pierre Reynal is excellent as the icy, cynical cardinal; Jean Deschamps has dignity as old Strozzi, though he seems strangely devoid of emotion when required. Jean Topart is good as the Cardinal Valori, and Daniel Sorano is effective as the Duke's bodyguard and musician.

If the de Musset play has its antique aspects, there is nothing oldfashioned about Leon Gischia's settings or Philipe's staging. Figures move darkly in and out of the various scenes as the lights pick out and highlights action on the large stage. Eliminating the need for a curtain, this method gives the play a unique unity and keeps the eye fascinated and surprised as well as dazzled by the rich costuming. Maurice Jarre's music provides a perfect background to the beautifully-spoken French on the stage, with enunciation sufficiently clear to be heard and understood in the very last row. In its first appearance, the T.N.P. certainly lives up to its advance reputation. Hift.

Le Triumphe de l'Amour

(Triumph of Love)

Comedy by Marivaux; staged by Jean Vilar; settings and costumes, Leon Gischia; music, Maurice Jarre; features Maria Casares, Monique Chaumette, Jean Vilar, Catherine Le Couey, Roger Mollien, Georges Wilson, Jean-Pierre Darras. At the Broadway Theatre, N.Y. Oct. 16, '58; $6 top.

Leonide ..... Maria Casares
Corine ..... Monique Chaumette
Hermocrate ..... Jean Vilar
Leontine ..... Catherine Le Couey
Agis ..... Roger Mollien
Dimas ..... Georges Wilson
Arlequin ..... Jean-Pierre Darras

It appears that no French company can come to Broadway without at least doing one piece by Marivaux. As the second of its repertory offerings at the Broadway Theatre, the Theatre National Populaire last Thursday (16) put on the author's "Le Triumphe de L'Amour," an 18th century comedy with the hallmark of the period, i.e. the plot in which a woman disguised as a man manages to charm the gentleman of her choice into marriage.

Since very little happens on the stage in any of the Marivaux plays, these dialog pieces require consummate acting skill. Luckily, it is present in this company, and the result is a delightful, inconsequential show, full of many fine little touches, some chuckles and two hours of beautiful French.

Maria Casares plays Leonide, the princess who comes to charm Agis, heir to the throne and student of the philosopher Hermocrate. She obviously is an old hand at this sort of role, playing it with a profusion of charm, vivacity and skill, though there seem to be moments when the fluttery hand gestures appear overdone.

Jean Vilar, as director, is great in a tongue-in-cheek role as the philosopher conquered by love; Monique Chaumette is delightful as Miss Casare's companion as the two, dressed as gentlemen, invade Vilar's garden. Catherine Le Couey registers strongly as Leontine, who falls for Miss Casare's fervent wooing, and Roger Mollien is handsome as the tongue-tied Agis.

In the smaller parts, Georges Wilson is genuinely funny as the gardner, and Jean-Pierre Darras has the right brashness as Arlequin, Hermocrat's unscrupulous valet. Performances, staging and settings are in the tradition of the French theatre, with its affectionate reading of the classics. This is the mannered comedy of another age and the Theatre National is keeping it alive.

'Jersey Lily' Okay Biog Of a Fabulous Actress

"The Jersey Lily" by Pierre Sichel (Prentice-Hall; $4.95) is the life story of actress Lillie Langtry (1853-1929). This is the first book about the celebrated Lady de Bathe since her autobiog, "The Days I Knew," appeared in 1925 (Doran), with a preface by Richard Le Gallienne.

Mrs. Langtry was not only a recognized actress in her time. She was a reigning international beauty in the tradition of female stars who brought kings and princes to their knees in total admiration. Edward VII, when Prince of Wales, was one of her constant companions. Costly gifts were showered upon her: town and country houses, jewels, a handsome yacht.

On one of her American tours, she visited Langtry, Texas, a town named in her honor largely because of the devotion of its most famous citizen, Judge Roy Bean ("The Law West of the Pecos"). Lillie was presented with the revolver by which Judge Bean had kept peace, not only in his courtroom, but also in Langtry's fabulous Jersey Lilly (sic!) Saloon.

Sichel has written an absorbing bio. He acknowledges special thanks to Alfred Lunt, for new material pertaining to Mrs. Langtry. As a leading man of 30, Lunt once trouped with The Jersey Lily. Together with the lady's own book, Sichel's study completes the record of her colorful life. Rodo.

'Saratoga Trunk' Musical

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Morton Da Costa is adapting Edna Ferber's novel and former film, "Saratoga Trunk," into a stage musical. He will write, also direct and coproduce with Robert Fryer.

Rehearsals are slated for fall of 1959. Composer and lyricist are to be selected after first draft completed.

Opera Reviews

American Opera Society

Starting its sixth season of existence, this Voltäged enterprise has burst the confines of N.Y.'s Town Hall and taken up habitation in Carnegie, selling out there, too.

The answer lies in lively, loving, limped "concert style performances of unfamiliar operas. The 1958 inaugural was the Vincenzo Bellini (1801-1835) work "I Capuletti Ed I Montecchi" (Italian for the Capulets and Montagus of Verona).

Though totally unknown in the States, this is an opera of rich melody, if dubious libretto. Under the young and intense conductor, Arnold Gamson, orchestra and singers made the evening ring with song. The audience took care of the answering hurrahs, especially for the stunningly dramatic mezzo, Giulietta Simionato, over from Italy for the occasion, who sang Romeo to Laurel Hurley's finely-spun blonde Juliet. (Richard Cassily, Ezio Flagello and David Smith were just dandy, but this was a woman's show.)

For the care which obviously was invested in the rehearsals, for the fine shimmer of the performances and for the unique experience of La Simionato, praise without quibble is obligatory. It was both a musical event and a professional event, since Maestro Rudolf Bing of the Met was there scouting the Italian and cheering his own Miss Hurley. Land.

Carmina Burana

San Francisco, Oct. 10.

San Francisco Opera Co. presentation of one-act opera by Carl Orff, from 13th Century Latin and German songs; staged by Paul Hager; conductor, Leopold Ludwig; settings and costumes, Jean-Pierre Ponnelle; supervising designer, Waldemar Johansen; chorus director, Gianni Lazzari; choreographer, Ghita Hager. Features Frank Guarrera, Elaine Malbin. At San Francisco Opera House, Oct. 9, '58; $9 top.

Another American stage premiere of a Carl Orff work, "Carmina Burana" is not truly an opera. Rather, it is a quintet of medieval tableaux set to music. There is no story line. The work's only unifying element is the fact that all the music originally came from a collection of a couple of hundred medieval songs which had been lying around a Bavarian monastery 500 years before they were unearthed in 1803.

Orff has written this work from several dozen of these songs and arbitrarily divided it into five scenes. The resulting music, modernized and clad in some 20th century idiom, tends to be a bit flashy, with fairly barren stretches woven among exciting melody. Fortunately it gets topnotch presentation from Frank Guarrera, Elaine Malbin and the orchestra under the crisp baton of Leopold Ludwig. Guarrera, acting and singing poet, drinker and troubadour in different tableaux, is splendid. Miss Malbin, with very little acting to do but lots of singing, is good, despite trouble on one high note.

Gianni Lazzari's chorus, with the only other vocal production of consequence, keeps pace in the hourlong "Carmina."

Hardly destined to enter repertory. Stef.

The Wise Maiden

San Francisco, Oct. 10.

San Francisco Opera Co. presentation of one-act opera by Carl Orff; English libretto by Otto Guth and Jane Mayhall; staged by Paul Hager; conductor, Leopold Ludwig; settings and costumes, Jean-Pierre Ponnelle; supervising designer, Waldemar Johansen; puppets, Ralph Chesse. Features Leontyne Price, Lawrence Winters. At San Francisco Opera House, Oct. 9, '58; $9 top.

King ..... Lawrence Winters
Peasant ..... Lorenzo Alvary
Peasant's Daughter ..... Leontyne Price
Jailer ..... James Wagner
Man with Donkey ..... Raymond Manton
Man with Mule ..... Eugene Green
First Tramp ..... Robert Thomas
Second Tramp ..... John Gillaspy
Third Tramp ..... Richard Wentworth

Except for one song with jukebox possibilities, the American premiere of this 70-minute Carl Orff work doesn't give the operagoer much music. The story is carried by lots of spoken dialogue. Sketchy score often leaves a musical idea unfinished, and gives the singers little to do.

An exception is a lusty, drunken trio, sung straightaway and starting, "At the Time That Faith Was Born." The Tin Pan Alley publisher who grabs this might just clean up.

The simple story is a sort of Ruritanian fairy tale about a peasant (Lorenzo Alvary) who finds a golden mortar and, against the advice of his wise daughter (Leontyne Price), gives it to his king, (Lawrence Winters). The king throws the peasant in jail unjustly and the daughter frees her father by answering three riddles. For some obscure reason centering on a dispute over a mule, the king banishes the wise daughter with the proviso that she can have all she can pack into a large trunk. She drugs the king, puts him in the trunk and love triumphs, as always, in Ruritania.

Winters is a fine king, sings and acts very well. Alvary is satisfactory and Miss Price sings superbly. Raymond Manton, as a donkey man, and Eugene Green, as a mule man, are excellent, as is the tramp trio of Robert Thomas, John Gillaspy and Richard Wentworth.

Jean-Pierre Ponnelle's split-level set and costumes are properly fantastic, though Miss Price's blonde wig looks like it came from the original "Hansel and Gretel," and director Paul Hager keeps the opera moving pretty well. Ralph Chesse's lifesize puppets, hanging from the ceiling, seem superfluous.

Conductor Leopold Ludwig keeps the orchestra revved up.

The English libretto, by Otto Guth and Jane Mayhall, is poor, cliche-ridden and repetitive Stef.

La Cenerentola

(N.Y. CITY CENTER OPERA)

This must have been hokey when written in 1817 and still plays that way. There are a number of very amusing quintets, though an overaddiction to half-voice singing and recitative to piano chords. As an item for the novelty-hungry house on 55th Street, this Rossini opera bouffe suffices, though doubts are suggested by the tieup with the Italian Consulate to give the occasion a "meaning" beyond the facts.

A nice question is involved whether the lily has not been gilded in Michael Pollock's staging, making hoke hokier. And now that the company has some of that Ford Foundation money in hand, the costuming could be given more heed. Giuseppe Barratti (the prince), John Reardon (servant) and Arthur Newman (philosopher) are costumed in the 16th Century but Ralph Herbert is clearly 18th Century in satin breeches and peruke. The garb of the female singers looks suitable for Stendhal's "Rouge et Noir."

Arthur Basile, here from Italy for the occasion, conducted the melodic score strongly. This is more an actors (farceuring) than a singers show. Hence Jacquelynne Moody and Regina Sarfaty in the slapstick roles of the mean sisters of Cinerella stand out. So do their no-account sire (Herbert) save for the costume he is assigned and his Corse Peyton makeup.

The tenor (Baratti, also here from Italy) is debuting, but there is little chance to show much and his voice is small in dimension. Frances Bible makes Miss Sit-By-The-Fire fairly attractive.

They can do better at this house. And they do. Land.

'Best Plays of 1957-58' Remains a Legit Event

"The Best Plays of 1957-58," edited by Louis Kronenberger (Dodd, Mead; $6), is the 41st volume in the series founded in 1919-20 by the late Burns Mantle. In digest form, editor's selection of past season's 10 best plays includes "Look Back in Anger," "Under Milk Wood," "Time Remembered," "The Rope Dancers," "Look Homeward, Angel," "The Dark at the Top of the Stairs," "Summer of the 17th Doll," "Sunrise at Campobello," "The Entertainer" and "The Visit."

Kronenberger reports at length on the Broadway season; Claudia Cassidy from Chicago; Harold Hobson from London; while Garrison P. Sherwood deals with off-Broadway. Richard Maney submits a chapter on press-agentry. There is a section of photos, and book is liberally sprinkled with Al Hirschfeld's characteristic stage drawings. Usual departments prevail; statistical survey; VARIETY's recap of hits and flops; lists of long runs, prize-winning plays, recent theatre books, data on players' births and deaths. Repros of several set designs are included, and editor credits aid to his wife and to Barbara Kamb. In every respect, the book is a worthy successor to its indispensable predecessors, and remains one of the theatre publishing events of each year.

Business continued bullish for most road shows last week. A few entries didn't fare too well, but others such as "Music Man" and the Old Vic were powerhouse.

The three companies of "Auntie Mame," individually starring Eve Arden, Constance Bennett and Sylvia Sidney, all did well, racking up a combined gross of $137,100.

Jean Lefevre Injured; 'Plume' Preem Still Set

Philadelphia, Oct. 21.

French comedian Jean Lefevre received painful leg and head injuries last night in an accident during a run-through performance last night (Mon.) of "La Plume de Ma Tante," at the Forrest Theatre here. It was at first feared that the 38-year-old actor had fractured his leg.

Lefevre was supposed to jump into a simulated manhole onstage, but the masonite top of a special platform collapsed and he plunged through a trapdoor and landed on the concrete floor of the basement below. He was taken to Jefferson Hospital here.

Because the actor has a leading part in the Paris-originated revue, the management decided not to have an understudy play go on for the scheduled local premiere tonight (Tues.). However, Lefevre planned to play the performance and then return to the hospital for further treatment.

and her final affair with her own son-in-law.

Marie Bell has authority, style and pathos as the woman recounting her story, while Jeanne Moreau has the right springy sensuality as her younger self. The supporting cast is adroit and ubiquitous, for they all take multiple roles.

Shifting decors are functional and clever. As an American prospect, the play might lose a good deal in translation, and its lack of a sympathetic protagonist would hurt. Mosk.

Der Kuerassier Sebastian und Sein Sohn
(The Cavalryman and His Son)

Berlin, Oct. 1.

Berlin Festival presentation of Schlosspark Theatre production of drama in eight scenes and prolog by Theodor Schuebel; staging, Hans Bauer; settings and costumes, H. W. Lenneweit; background music, Herbert Baumann. At Schlosspark Theatre, Berlin, Oct. 1, '58; $3 top.

Sebastian	Wilhelm Borchert
His Wife	Lu Saeuberlich
His Son	Bruno Dallansky
Eva	Christa Keller
General	Arthur Schroeder
Captain	Walther Suessenguth
Village Mayor	Ernst Sattler
Lieutenant	Klaus Miedel
Clerk	Karl Hellmer

Soldiers, townspeople, etc.

Although this drama by Bavarian brewery manager Theodor Schuebel won the 1957 Gerhart Hauptman prize, it's obviously no answer to the shortage of contemporary German playwrights and seems more suitable for studio production than as a Berlin Festival presentation. The plot of "Sebastian" is banal and its technique is old-fashioned.

The author's avowed inspiration from Berthold Brecht is all too evident in this drama's similarity to "Mother Courage." Like its distinguished predecessor, "Sebastian" is an anti-militarism plea located in Germany during the 30 Years War. It, too, attacks official ingratitude toward the common soldier and, what's fatal theatrically, the writing seems old hat.

"Sebastian" involves the post-war trek of a veteran and his son to obtain promised reward. As in "Mother Courage," the quest is futile and the general flavor is disillusioned. Since the idea is familiar and has been better expressed before, interest evaporates.

Hans Bauer's staging seems conscientious, the H. W. Lenneweit scenery is helpful and Herbert Baumann's background music is atmospheric. Hans.

Dance Reviews

Antonio Spanish Ballet

London, Oct. 9.

Leon Hepner and Victor Hochhauser's presentation of Antonio's Spanish Ballet Co. in three acts. Stars Antonio; features Rosita Segovia, Carmen Rojas, Carmen Rolan, Paco Ruiz, Graciella Vasquez, etc. Orchestra conducted by Benito Lauret. At Coliseum, London, Oct. 7 '58; $2.80 top.

Antonio and his Spanish Ballet is back in London and that spells business at the Coliseum for a six weeks' season. For what it suggests: this dance group opened in same week International ballet season at Sadler's Wells had to be called off for lack of public support whereas Coliseum had a substantial advance in the kitty before opening night.

For London audiences, Antonio and his company seemingly can do no wrong. The adulation, indeed, begins before the show itself! That reaction leads to an uncritical acceptance of his interpretation of "The Three Cornered Hat" with which the program opens. It is a surprisingly dull and unexciting production with the color of the costumes providing the only attraction.

The rest of the program, which puts the emphasis on traditional Spanish dances, is in better style, gay, lively, and with rhythmic best which is the hallmark of all Spanish groups. There is an outstanding solo item by the star entitled Zapateado; a delightful Pas De Quatre featuring the principal femme dancers and a very pleasing Suite of Basque Dances. For popular consumption, the final part, which is given over to Flamenco dances, is probably the most acceptable. Antonio rightly collars much of the limelight for himself, but the other dancers are given adequate opportunities to display their native talents.

Musical backing for the entire presentation is also outstanding. The orchestra, conducted by Benito Lauret, has no easy job with some of the intricate and delicate scores. It does, however, give faultless accompaniment. Myro.

Ballet De France

Paris, Oct. 21.

Janine Charrat's 11-man ballet mixes simple classical exercises with modernistic terpsichore for an inconclusive air. Lack of artistic stature among the dancers, except for Miss Charrat's own talents, limits appeal to balletomanes.

There is some style in "Chimeric" with its tale of a man's search for meaning, and some psychological insight in "Ties" with elastic bands acting as destiny's hold on the lives of a couple. Bartok's "Magnificent Mandrin" is turned into a torchy, horror-type affair instead of transposing the feeling of a man's braving of death due to an unquenchable rush of desire that turns into love.

Costumes impress, ditto scenery, but this company still lacks the discipline, breadth and variety necessary for a ballet in today's market. Mosk.

pressive as her past futilities are brought into focus by another thief, a young piano teacher who confesses his love for her. Play ends on the suggestion of a new life for the spinster, rid of her inhibitions, free of the house and devoid of self-pity.

Chief asset of "99 Times" is the excellent casting and the depressing, middle-class interior set designed by Griffith Brewer. Rodney Lefebvre seems just right as the pompous, hag-ridden brother who wants to sell the house from under his sister, Dorothy Boyaner and Sheila Scott are fine as the maiden ladies at a wedding shower and Beryl Lowe is good as the charwoman. Verais Christie injects comedy moments deftly and Victor Knight is convincing as the piano teacher.

Julia Murphy's staging is uneven. Newt.

Dore Schary's tribute to Franklin D. Roosevelt and his victory over polio retains its original dramatic power in the hands of the national company which opened its coast to coast tour here last Wednesday (15). The current production has been superbly staged by Vincent J. Donehue who keeps the emphasis on Roosevelt family incidents rather than political implications.

The show has the benefit of fine performances, highlighted by Leif Erickson's masterful portrayal of Roosevelt. All the trademarks are there—the pince-nez, battered hat, the booming voice of authority, and the cigarette holder clinched jauntily between the teeth. Erickson never steps out of character and if he overplays occasionally it's inherent in the role..

Russell Collins is a good choice in Louis Howe part. He has the top laugh lines in the show and plays them to the last chuckle. Ann Shoemaker gives a strong portrayal of Mrs. Sara Delano Roosevelt, the grand dame mother of the President-to-be, and she even manages to arouse sympathy in the futile battle to keep her son at the Hyde Park level.

Michaele Myers is an appealing Eleanor Roosevelt who grows in personal stature as the play progresses, and the Roosevelt children are impersonated by a group of talented youngsters. Lawrence Fletcher makes a brief but effective appearance as Al Smith and Fran Carlon is the efficient secretary, Missy LeHand. "Sunrise at Campobello" packs a terrific wallop, aided and abetted by an excellent cast. Klep.

Tunnel of Love

Chicago, Oct. 13.

Theatre Guild production of comedy in three acts ..five scenes), by Joseph Fields and Peter DeVries, based on novel by DeVries. Staged by Shepard Traube; settings and lighting by Ralph Alswang; costumes, Virginia Volland; women's gowns, studios of Larry Aldrich; production associate, Philip Langner. Stars Eddie Bracken; features Gerald Metcalfe, Ellen Clark, Louise Hoff, Joan Watson, Elsa Walden. At Blackstone Theatre, Chicago, Oct. 13, '58; $4.95 top Friday-Saturday nights, $4.40 weeknights.

Augie Poole ..... Eddie Bracken
Isolde Poole ..... Ellen Clark
Dick Pepper ..... Gerald Metcalfe
Alice Pepper ..... Louise Hoff
Estelle Novick ..... Joan Watson
Miss McCracken ..... Elsa Walden

A lively comedy liberally larded with sophisticated gags about sex and exurbia, "Tunnel of Love" should find ready audiences in the larger cities, perhaps even where it meets the filmization head-on or follows it.

The show is very nearly "Seven Year Itch" all over again, so it is more than coincidental that Eddie Bracken is heir a second time to a role created on Broadway by Tom Ewell. Backers of "Tunnel" may regret their caution in limiting the national company to only three weeks in Chicago, all insured by Theatre Guild subscriptions. "Itch" got 35 weeks out of the Windy City in '53-'54, and the opening night audience of "Tunnel" seemed far from averse to the racier fluff about the gentle exurbanite who, although devoted to his childless wife, transgresses only once in their marriage and finds himself uncomfortably adopting his own illegitimate son.

The perennially boyish Bracken has matured as a comedy actor since his previous stint on the legit road, and it is mainly the result of his engaging leadership onstage that the play's humor comes off. His timing is sharp, he has mastered the protracted take till it is truly funny, and he makes a memorable gem of the confessional scene, putting to good use the ingenuousness that comes naturally.

Supporting cast, unfortunately, needs Bracken's expert propping. Although Gerald Metcalfe rallies from a self-conscious first act to a deft caricature of the Madison Ave. roue, neither he nor the otherwise able company of Ellen Clark, Louise Hoff and Joan Watson is able to generate bonafide farce. Only Elsa Walden of the featured contingent makes an inspired comedy contribution as the loping, outsized matron from the adoption agency, but both her scenes are brief.

Shepherd Traube's direction is not as brisk as might be, possibly because they're playing it broadly for the lowbrows on the road. Les.

Alexander-Stewart Pen Queen of Sheba Tuner

David Alexander and Mike Stewart are collaborating on the book for a musical about the Queen of Sheba. Stewart will also provide the lyrics for the show and Alexander will direct, and plans to be associated in the production with a management to be recruited. No one is set to compose the music, but the project is aimed for the fall of next year.

Already planning a musical version of the Queen of Sheba story is Alexander H. Cohen. At last report, Samson Raphaelson was supposed to be working on the book, with composer and lyricist still unnamed. Lena Horne was tentatively slated for the lead in the Cohen venture, and is also sought for the same assignment in the Alexander-Stewart version.

Personal manager Hillard Elkins is representing Alexander and Stewart on the project.

Literati

H. Allen Smith's Hotsy Manana

Humorist H. Allen Smith sojourned to Mexico last winter and came up with an arrestingly funny book which he whimsically titles "The Pig in the Barber Shop" (Little, Brown; $3.95) for reasons which he details in this al fresco book. The Smiths' Cook's tour closeup (wife Nelle is part of the script) on Mexico City and its environs cooks to a hot boil with almost pyramiding results. It's replete with a show biz cast of characters, also ex-Mayor, ex-Ambassador Bill O'Dwyer et al., and is a cinch to boost tourism below the Rio Grande. The French award the Legion d'Honneur for La Belle France do-gooders and whatever is the Mexican Government's equivalent will probably go to Smith.

Radio-tv humorist Jim Backus has another brand of humor in his "midstream memoir" titled "Rocks On the Roof" (Putnam; $3.50). From the first VARIETY notation of Jim and Henny Backus' NY to LA their Hollywood happenings make for breezy copy.

A Christmas item is the kingsize "New Yorker Album of Sports & Games" (Harper; $5) covering three decades of cartoons, as durable now as when first published. Abel.

Copyright Law for Layman

Stanley Rothenberg, expert in copyright law and author of "Copyright Law: Basic and Related Materials," published by Clark Boardman Co., is readying a similar text for laymen in the entertainment industry, as well as academic world, who wish to become better acquainted with the law of literary, musical and artistic property without groping through unnecessary statutory language.

A recent literati item concerning the supplement to Rothenberg's book should have pointed out that it consists of 150 pages with a 15-page summary of copyright. Rothenberg recently joined the law firm of Margulies, Heit & Boverman.

Harry Martin's Op

Harry Martin, currently chief flack for the American National Red Cross, is recuperating after a spinal operation at Washington's Central Hospital. He formerly was amusement editor of the Memphis Commercial Appeal, ayem daily for some 15 years and later held the labor adviser post to the Marshall Plan with headquarters at Paris.

Martin also was national prexy of the American Newspaper Guild for two terms and was Memphis' former VARIETY correspondent for several years. He is expected to be discharged in about two weeks.

Real Long-Range

Perhaps the longest-range biography in show biz books is Louis Sheaffer's project for a Little, Brown publication of his upcoming Eugene O'Neill biography. It is projected for 1962-63. Former drama critic of the now defunct Brooklyn Eagle—he has since become a legit p.a.—has been working two years on the book already, dispatched more than 2,500 letters, interviewed some 700 people, etc., and plans two to three years' more researching obscure people, old friends et al. in all corners of the globe who knew O'Neill 40, 50 and even 60 years ago.

Most recently he p.a.'d O'Neill's "Long Day's Journey Into Night" and "The Iceman Cometh."

Caskie Stinnett's Book

Holiday mag's roving European rep, Caskie Stinnett, hopes to have the mss. of his book on the overseas scene in Bennett Cerf's hands in a couple of weeks, for Random House publication.

Says Stinnett, "Writing a book in Cannes is like trying to write upstairs over Birdland, but I got it finished. Back in the U.S. before Christmas."

Evergreen Records-Books

Evergreen (Grove Press) publication of Samuel Beckett's "Endgame"—voted the best foreign off-Broadway play of the year—includes an LP recording with the original cast. Other LP "publications" by Evergreen (Grove) are "San Francisco Poets" (Allen Ginsberg, Kenneth Rexroth, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Robert Duncan, Michael McClure, Brother Antoninus) and "Music of Afghanistan and Iran," made by a mission of the Univ. of Indiana.

Jean Genet's play, "The Balcony," translated by Bernard Frechtman, is being published by Evergreen both as a paperback and $3.50 hardcover, ditto Eric Bentley and Theodore Hoffman's new versions of Anton Chekhov's "The Brute, and Other Farces" and Antonin Artaud's "The Theater and Its Double" (translated from the French by Mary Caroline Richards).

Nichols Succeeds Mayes

Personality differences, long brewing, between veteran Good Housekeeping editor Herbert R. Mayes and Richard E. Deems, executive vicepresident of Hearst Magazines, is reportedly the whyfore of Mayes' resignation. Wade H. Nichols, publisher and editor-in-chief of Redbook, succeeds. He was v.p. and director of the McCall Corp., publisher of Redbook and Bluebook. He was publisher of the latter also.

Mayes had been with Hearst Magazines since 1924. At one time he edited both Good Housekeeping, one of the top successful consumer magazines, and Cosmopolitan at the same time. This was during a transition period when the latter was sans an editor-in-chief. John O'Connell helms Cosmo now as he has for some time.

Mayes has other plans which he expects to announce shortly. He is currently working on the February GH issue as his finale.

Charles S. Thorn has been named to the new post of publisher and advertising director of Redbook, and Austen Ettinger has been named assistant publisher, by Arthur B. Langlie, president of McCall Corp.

Zolotow Tailing Lunts

Maurice Zolotow's first-trip-to-Europe awaits the closing of "The Visit," when he will accompany Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne to London. They will recreate the play there for H. M. Tennent Ltd. (Hugh Beaumont), while Zolotow continues his research on a definitive biography of the veteran acting team. Dial will publish. Zolotow spent quite some time last summer with the Lunts at their farm at Genosee Depot, Wis.

Macmillan recently issued a monograph on Lunt & Fontanne (originally published in England), but Zolotow's will be the first authorized biography.

McConnell Tells Off 'Time'

Simmering for the past several years over the stories in Time Magazine about himself, his family and his paper, John G. McConnell, publisher and president of The Montreal Star, came out in the open Friday (17) with a three-column blast against Time's current yarn about the McConnell family and fortune.

Time's story covered a recent gift to McGill University of $4,500,000 by the McConnell Foundation, how the gift was handled, and where the money came from. In the front page story headed "Clearing the Record," McConnell had this to say:

The statements made in the Oct. 20 issue of Time Magazine about my supposed role in the McConnell Foundation would be incredible to me, were they not in line with the inaccuracies committed by Time in the past. These accuracies have been noted in almost every Time story dealing with The Montreal Star, my family and myself.

"Stories which have appeared over the last five years in Time Magazine have a weird consistency. The thesis, demonstrably false, is that under the present management, The Star is being starved in order to serve the benefactions of the McConnell Foundation."

McConnell made it clear that he took no active part in the foundation and that none of the newspaper's profits are used to finance charities or gifts to education (at present all profits are going into the building of one of the most modern newspaper plants in North America).

Foreman's 2d Printing

Bob Foreman's "Hot Half-Hour," sizzling novel about giveaway shows, has gone into a second printing. Paperback rights have been sold to Fawcett and Angus & Robertson, English publishers, will issue the tome during the spring of 1959.

Criterion, his publisher, reports sales of 15,000 copies to date.

Svenskas Nix Varietyese

It's easy to understand why the Scandinavian editions of Theodore Pratt's "Miss Dilly Says No" couldn't translate a VARIETY paraphrase. Author, frequent contributor to this paper, contrived a headline for his book, NIX TO PIX, an intended variation STICKS NIX HICK PIX, but the Swedish translator gave up and just used the VARIETY-ese verbatim.

Pratt attests to the virtues of airconditioning by stating he stayed so much inside his Delray Beach home, the first summer he spent in Florida, that his output hit a new high—two books and a flock of mag pieces for Playboy, Gent, Dude, Nugget, Escapade and Gay Blade.

'Holiday' Peaks

Holiday magazine reports new all-time records for November in advertising revenue and linage, with revenue up 27.3% and linage up 15.1% compared with totals for the November 1957 issue.

Ralph Hench, the mag's advertising director, said November revenue totaled $952,918, compared with $748,361 for the same time last year, while the Nov. issue this year contains 480 columns of advertising, against 417 columns last year.

Publishes With 'Opposition'

Heather Jiminez (daughter of Samuel R. Rosenbaum who administers the recording industry's Performance Trust Fund) at the Art Alliance (10), Philadelphia, to help publicize her book, "But I Wouldn't Want to Live There."

Mrs. Jiminez, who works for the Macmillan publishing house, is having her first tome put out by the rival Dutton firm.

Benjamin Allen Dies

Benjamin Allen, 61, senior v.p. and director of circulation of the Curtis Publishing Co., was found dead Oct. 14 in the garage of his summer home, Stone Harbor, N.J.

Preliminary autopsy showed "death by asphyxiation from carbon mohoxide." Allen, who was president of the Curtis Circulation Co., a subsidiary of the publishing firm, had been on leave of absence since May because of ill health.

Surviving are his wife, daughter, two sons and a brother.

S&S' Jumbo Ballyhoo

Simon & Schuster is planning a jumbo ad section in the N.Y. Times Sunday, Nov. 16. It will be a 16-page colorgravure supplement marking first time a book publisher has run a special color number in the Times. Book stores plan to use the S&S supplement, plugging the publishing house's Christmas line-up of books as a direct-mail piece, a month before publication in the Sunday paper.

Publisher ordered 750,000 copies of what is called "The 1958 Christmas Present Finder" for the direct-mail promotion. Some 256 titles are plugged in the firm's holiday book list.

Joseph and Stewart Alsop's "The Reporter's Trade" will be published by Reynal next month.

Affair also marks the 25th anni of the ANG.

The New Hampshire Women's Christian Temperance Union has adopted a resolution criticizing the Saturday Evening Post for what was described as a "radical change" in its policy toward the acceptance of liquor advertisements. The resolution, approved at the organization's annual convention in Rochester, urged the Curtis Publications to "reconsider" its present stand on the matter.

Edward Demers is now daily show biz columnist and critic of Ottawa's Le Droit (35,000), only French-language daily in Ontario and eastern Quebec. He's also arts editor of daily's weekend Hebdo-Revue, carried in 15 papers with 90,000 circ. He also directs acts and writes tv scripts.

SCULLY'S SCRAPBOOK

By Frank Scully

Hollywood, Oct. 21.

Judging from display of reader-interest in the regular run of weeklies as opposed to those, like this one, pitched to catch the attention of pros, you'd think we rarely get either pan mail or fan mail. This is not the true state of affairs. It's simply that VARIETY does not seem ever to have enough space for these pro-am tournaments of letters.

Many times I receive letters which seem so far more worthy of print than what I've been working on, but they get buried in the chaos that passes for order around our Madhouse Manor and when found again (months later) the issue is dead and, as far as the letter-writer is concerned, I am too.

Even this far it must be obvious I am vamping till ready, not wanting to hunt out a batch of letters which have been demanding the light of print.

For instance, here is one from Elmer Walberg. "Dear Mr. Scully," he writes, "when your loan was originally taken out with us, payments were figured at an estimated amount that would amortize the loan in 15 years."

He goes on to say that due to an increase in taxes he will have to break the contract and slap me an additional $8 a month. It is obvious he is not going to take the rap for his stupidity in signing his own contract.

How To Speed The Mails

The next is an invitation to a wedding in Hawaii. But that took place months ago. There is no use sending regrets or congrats. By now they are probably contemplating divorce. Besides, they failed to include a self-addressed envelope, and even if they had it wouldn't be enough by now, what with tilt the postoffice has instituted to pay for their rubber stamps saying, "Misdirected to Hollywood, Fla.," or "To expedite delivery this airmail letter is being sent by train."

The next is a letter containing a huge printed notice of improvement for Hollywood Blvd. Two photographs of the sender are fastened to the documents with a diaper pin. Also attached was an offset of an article the author sent to Guideposts, edited by Dr. Norman Vincent Peale, and a rejection letter from Van Varner in the absence of Dr. Peale.

It was a piece about Parkey Sharkey, a taxi-driver now residing near the city dump of Palo Alto, Calif. Editor Van Varner found the story "a moving one" and moved it right back to the writer. Undaunted, the writer went after Dr. Peale with a longer letter in which he tossed Thoreau, Emerson, Troward from one end of Hollywood Blvd. to the other. That one must have found Dr. Peale still out of town. The author was (Memphis) Harry Lee Ward, newsvender on Hollywood Blvd. since 1919, and owner of the largest private library west of M. Lincoln Schuster's. Two dolls, Marie Wilson and the late Jean Harlow, have subsidized that library for years.

Just why I should receive all these documents, as well as a notice of improvement of Hollywood Blvd., eludes me. Memph assured me I could use them gratis. As he claims he once got 10 bucks out of VARIETY (not as a handout but for an article), this makes him at least a semi-pro.

Memph's No-Vote Ignored

Having peddled "tomorrow's lies today" along the boulevard for 39 years, Memph is old enough to become sentimental about Hollywood. He does not like the contemplated changes which include names and faces of film, radio and television stars in colored sidewalks—a million dollar cameo which has already started. Ten percent of the taxpayers resisted the bit, arguing the change was not a public necessity. NBC bucked it, too. One taxpayer said "it was a stupid scheme to attract honkytonks and curio shops." Over these objections the city council okayed the improvements 13-0.

I don't recall saying a good word for all this, but Memph says I did.

"Dear Mr. Scully," he writes (he wouldn't dare call me that to my face), "your recent weekly VARIETY column describing your tour of Hollywood and other supposedly interesting Los Angeles zones did not ring a good bell with me. I have loved Hollywood. I say I have loved Hollywood. But that affair is ended.

"The Hollywood I knew began in 1919. Between Vine and Highland the boulevard was lined with trees. Trees? Yes, trees, not walking lavender shrubs. I miss the natural decorative beauty of trees nowadays. I miss the wholesome goodnatured people strolling along, civilized and polite, especially in the evenings between show breaks.

Promenade des Vedettes

"In those days the Iris and Hollywood theatres were the movie spots. Film stars danced at the Hollywood Hotel (now torn down) certain nights in the week. That I miss and the fact that those same film stars so often strolled along the boulevard saying hello to each other and the likes of me. They lived within a few blocks of the boulevard in those days. They were already famous but most of them seemed to lack vanity.

"Do I remember Wallace Reid, Bebe Daniels, Wallace Beery, Doug Fairbanks Sr., Barbara La Marr, Norma and Constance Talmadge, Eugene O'Brien, Alice Terry, Theodore Roberts? Yes. And I remember, too, Lila Lee, Evelyn Brent, Priscilla Dean, Wheeler Oakman, Virginia O'Dare, Dagmar Godowsky, Erich Von Stroheim, Jean Hersholt, Frank Mayo, Lewis Sargent (promoted from a mail clerk to stardom and then bypassed), Conrad Nagel, Virginia Pearson, Claire Windsor, E. Mason Hopper, Stuart Peyton, Edith Roberts, Norma Dawn, Allan Dwan, Noah Beery Sr., Eileen Sedgwick, Eva Novak and Jane Novak (no relatives of the present-day K.N.), Harry Burns, Fatty Arbuckle, R. Valentino and Ralph Ince, also Virginia Valli and Oleta Otis and Beatrice Dominquez, Dorothy Phillips and Ethel Clayton.

Three Months With Thalberg

"All these people I knew, as well as B. P. Fineman, Roger Manning and clerk-to-film-czar Irving Thalberg. (I was his office boy three months and brushed him off when he wanted me to 'spy' on workers.) Louis D. Lighton and his wife were good friends and helped me plenty. Gladys Walton, U star, was kind and so was Dora Rogers or Fontaine La Rue, then comedienne in U films.

"I have had it. There were many fine souls of filmland I knew and loved as acquaintances on film lots and along the boulevard. There are a few of those fine souls yet with us. Do I remember Charles Chaplin? I have been given dollar 'tips' many times as a newsboy by Chaplin, and also by Mickey Cohen! To a newsboy earning little these tips were plenty of money.

You Sure Did!

"I got lost. So much more about so many more film people I knew and yet know I wanted to mention for you and your readers. I knew them all in all walks of life—even the writers, Arthur Caesar, Jim Tully, Robert Nichols and O. O. McIntyre. Now, I ask you about this silly Hollywood Blvd. routine of putting a lot of film people's faces in the sidewalks where folks spit. Is that a nice way to memorialize film people?"

His litany to these luminaries is only touched on in this document, but as to his query as to this being a nice way to honor dead movie stars, I thought there was a law against spitting on the sidewalk.

However, there does not seem to be any law against walking on their faces and this may be better than giving them no recognition at all, which has been their fate in the main up till now.

Nevada night club interests reportedly lifted an ear after hearing a prominent Alaskan, who for years opposed statehood, propose that the new state legalize gambling. Legalized gambling probably won't get to first base here, though. Most top candidates for the first state election Nov. 25 are opposed to it. There was lots of pro-gambling talk in the primary election campaign, but it fell flat as election neared.

Oliver M. Sayler, 70, longtime business agent of the Assn. of Theatrical Pressagent & Managers and co-producer of the current off-Broadway presentation of "Ulysses in Nighttown," died Oct. 19 in Larchmont, N. Y.

Mrs. Barkentin, incidentally, is also a "Ulysses" co-producer.

From 1909-1920, Sayler was on the staff of the Indianapolis News and later served as correspondent for the Boston Evening Transcript. Following a six-month visit to Russia in 1917-18, he wrote "The Russian Theatre Under the Revolution" and "Russia, White or Red."

Anger" earlier this year) and Thomas Holtzmann received an ovation. Thomas Wolfe's works have usually been loved by Germans.

"Three Penny Opera," which is really the old "Beggar's Opera" in a varied script of the late Bertold Brecht, was a disappointment as revived within the festival. Blame the inadequate cast with Johanna van Koczian especially unsuitable as Polly. Too sweet a personality to convince as that trollop.

"Lulu," never finished by Alban Berg (died, 1935) garnered much applause although it's not so sure whether all "understood" this immensely complicated work. Ovations went in the main to the ensemble of Hamburg State Opera which, under Guenther Renner, turned in a great performance. "Lulu," incidentally, is a talked-about item these days. Preemed in 1937 in Zurich (Switzerland), opera could not be performed in Hitler Germany. It was staged in Essen after the war (1935) and now in Hamburg, nowhere else in Germany. This explains the interest here in Berlin.

"Medea," under the musical direction of Italian Vittoria Gui, was the second local opera preem these days. Carl Ebert directed it. Cherubini's work (new version) proved a personal triumph for Inge Borkh. Her "Medea" was a "best" for this festival.

The ballet side, which in former years was often a special plus of the Berlin Festival, was neglected this year though Antonio's Spanish Ballet scored with the public of critics if were cool. Berlin's Tatiana Gsovsky flopped with her ensemble. Aside from the Antonio troupe and a Japanese chamber music ensemble plus the gallery of soloists, only one more foreign name troupe came to Berlin: The Parisian Georges Herbert's Productions Theatrales with Anouilh's "L'invitation au chateau."

CONVENTIONS: BIG NEW SHOW BIZ

Metopera's $86,687 Bow at $40 Bite; Culture Vs. Couture and Cameras

By ROBERT J. LANDRY

Opening night each fall at the Metropolitan Opera House is an uneasy standoff between the two competitive shows, the one on the stage and the one at the three entrances to the auditorium. This was again evident Monday (27) with "Tosca" and Tebaldi representing the most dignified form of staged music—grand opera—and the hordes of "once-more-with-charm" photographers representing the least dignified form of staged chi chi. The patience of impatient dowagers, and other gowned-to-kill queens, under the command of total strangers with cameras in their hands, remains one of the sights of Manhattan.

However, the Rudolf Bing regime has curbed the publicity exuberances of yesteryear. No longer do elderly, glandularly extrovert subscribers hang from the chandeliers to divert the cameras. Some of those emancipated grande dames were making diamond tiaras unimportant at the premiere!

This year's opening (gross $86,687 at $40 top) was sentimental because Renata Tebaldi was back after missing a year when her mother died. Actually, she was given this pledge of an opening night two years ago when Maria Callas came in on a jet vapor trail in "Norma."

The audience practically broke

'Right to Work' Spots KO'd As 'Objectionable'

Cleveland, Oct. 28.

More than $600,000 has been poured into Greater Cleveland's radio and television stations for political expenditures with the brunt of the money going into the "right to work" amendment on a "spot" buying basis.

Repercussions to the "RTW" material have come from religious leaders protesting tv shorts in favor of the amendment as "objectionable." Two tv Cleveland stations, KYW and WJW, refused to use the "objectionable" spots along with WFMJ, WSPD, WAKR, and WHTN, according to Philip

JET AGE SPURS FAR-FLUNG BIDS

By JOE COHEN

The battle for conventions and dealer incentive plans, which is becoming increasingly important to niteries, hotels, and resorts, is now worldwide. Grossingers, for example, is in competition with the Emerald Beach Hotel, Nassau; Concord competes against the Myrtlebank, Jamaica, and Las Vegas pits its resources against Cannes, Bermuda, Havana, Rio, Acapulco, Paris, Rome, Miami Beach or where have you.

The competition will be fiercer within a short time with the inauguration of jet travel, which places Europe about six hours from New York, Nassau two hours from the same city, and Los Angeles just long enough away from Mexico City to read a newspaper.

The bidding for the convention business has become terrific on an international scale. Today, the quest for large meetings and confabs can come from virtually all over the world—distance no object. Other factors that go into the selection of a site have become more important.

One of the major items, for example, must be the availability of suitable meeting sites, and ample hotel accommodations. But that isn't the sole factor. Highly important is the availability of nightlife in any given city. It is no longer feasible to hold a meeting in any given town and not provide entertainment to go along with it. It is anticipated that with settlement of the political situations in Havana and Haiti, the increase in hotel facilities there will make these spots ideal confab sites because of the increase in hotel accommoda-

RCA Consent Decree Loosens 12,000 Radio-TV Patents; May Speed Color

Washington, Oct. 28.

Color television may get off the ground via a peace treaty signed today (Tues.) between Uncle Sam and the Radio Corp. of America.

Justice Department announced a consent decree loosening RCA's hold on 12,000 radio-tv patents. Highlighting the judgment, settling the four-year-old civil anti-trust suit, is a pool arrangement for color video patents. A criminal indictment returned last February against RCA by a Federal Grand Jury was simultaneously settled, after RCA pleaded no contest and was fined $100,000.

Civil suit was filed November, 1954, charging RCA with monopolizing the licensing of patents for various radio and tv electronic devices. RCA was also alleged to have made an agreement with domestic and foreign electronic manufacturers in restraint of trade.

Decree, handed down by Judge John F. X. McGohey of the N.Y. Federal District Court, calls for two basic remedies:

(1) A royalty-free patent pool in which RCA must place 100 key listed color tv patents. Only existing tint patents are required to be placed in the pool, and the pool automatically terminates when the oldest patent expires. Firms with or without patents can apply for pool membership. For firms not electing to join the pool, RCA will make patents available to them at

Spin Now, Pay Later

London, Oct. 28.

Latest disk vending system in Britain is buying on time. A retailing company is offering LP's, EP's and 45 rpm platters for a down payment of as little as 13c with repayments from 7c weekly.

Average down payments are 35c for an LP; 14c for an EP and 7c for a 45.

No Talent Payoff, Agent Allowed Buildup Costs

Washington, Oct. 28.

An agent can write off as a business expense money spent in a vain effort to break a client into the bigtime, the U. S. Tax Court has ruled.

Agent Lou Levy shelled out $3,600 in one year for talent lessons and living expenses of vocalist Bob Houston. Never repaid, he claimed an income tax reduction for the amount.

Tax Court approved on the basis that Levy had reasonable hopes of parlaying his investment from agent fees if his client had scored.

In the same case, the court allowed Levy to deduct $2,000 paid to writers Alex Gottlieb and Frances Swann for a film story outline. After looking it over, Levy wasn't satisfied and dropped the projects.

'Drum' Beats Boffo $1,000,000 Advance

Boston, Oct. 28.

Although their last two shows have been disappointments, Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein 2d are still hot boxoffice names. Their new musical, "Flower Drum Song," opened last night (Mon.) at the Shubert Theatre here as an advance sellout for its entire four-and-a-half week tryout. Hundreds of would-be playgoers stood in the rain last Thursday (23) when the b.o. sale opened. Some $30,000 in mail orders and window trade was turned down.

The show, for which playwright Joseph Fields collaborated on the book, has a $6.25 top here. The last two R&H shows to play Boston tryouts were "Me and Juliet" and "Pipe Dream."

There is already a reported advance of over a $1,000,000 in theatre parties, mail orders and window sale for "Flower Drum Song" for its Broadway presentation, opening Dec. 1 at the St. James Theatre.

Sex-Kitten Unravels Film 'Art'

[Bikini-Blindness Attacks Foreign Product]

Has the French sex-kitten, Brigitte Bardot, singly in her own little Bikini, ruined the slowly-built, once-discriminating, habitual clientele for quality foreign films in the United States?

Some Manhattan importers and handlers of such features tend to feel that the whole market has been confused, if not blinded, by her boxoffice success. Bardotism has afflicted the film producers in Europe, their distributors in America and the theatremen on this side who once selected their releases with the utmost care.

Bardot success has been of fantastic proportions but with paradoxes following in the wake. One of the oddities is the tendency of American newspapers to deplore what they had so much to do with building—the Bardot emphasis on sex, sex, sex, sex.

The art theatres of America were until recently the most carefully planned and managed of outlets, with their own highly special and intelligent followings. But since Bardot came along the let's-all-climb-into-the-same-bed psychology has developed into an obsession.

The effects of Mlle. Bardot's "God Created Woman," easily the top foreign grosser in the U. S. (over $4,000,000), are being felt like shock waves all the way from the little theatre in Phoenix back to the producers in France, Italy and Germany. The message comes through loud and clear: The public in the States wants to see sex. So let's give 'em sex!

With this in mind, European producers pick and choose their subjects to conform with what they conceive to be a trend in the U. S., i.e. sexploitation themes. This is considered smart in the light of the considerable success such films have enjoyed. After years of frustration via their inability to dent the U. S. mart, European producers now feel they've finally discovered the magic formula.

In the States, the indie distribs, also quick to latch on to a trend, have been drawing their own

Friars Club Salute to Joe E. Lewis
A Salty SRO Shindig at $12.50 Top

By ABEL GREEN

Two topflight comedians with the same initials—Joe E. Lewis and Jack E. Leonard—made the $10 and $12.50-a-head, turnaway turnout at New York's Copacabana, for a Friars Club luncheon salute to the first-named last Friday (24), a signal success. It was a comedy highlight of high (and low) order, an extreme engendered by the robust language which is indiginous to stag shindigs of this nature. Along with the purple lingo the people were regaled with some of the best extemporaneous comedy this side of George Jessel's "comedians' roundtable" at Hillcrest.

Leonard, a one-line heckler from way back, this time was a standup toastmaster whose buffoonery was top-drawer, quick-on-the-wit, and kept the proceedings in high gear. As is axiomatic with all these Friars Club salutes the barb and the butt is he-man camouflage for the underlying sentiment.

Joe E. Lewis' recent recovery from illness; his 18th or 19th annual return to the Copa, with a highly successful engagement just closed (succeeded this week by Nat King Cole); not to mention his stature within the club as the abbott of the Friars, brought out an SRO audience. It was perhaps a little too much customer traffic (650 or so, with beaucoup turnaways) for the Jules Podell staff despite the fact the Copa has been pitching for the luncheon business.

Deafened by Medals

French comedian Jacques Tati tells the story of how, at the last film festival at Cannes, the Soviets approached him with the idea of making a picture in Russia. Not wanting to appear impolite, he said he might be interested.

The Russians threw a dinner to discuss the project. Tati said he would want his own cameraman. The Soviets agreed. He said he'd want free choice of script. That might be okay, too, they said. Then he said he was used to working a great deal with sounds. For instance, he told the leader of the Soviet delegation, "I might want to show one of your generals, his chest full of medals, walking down a hall, and I would want these medals to tinkle like little bells."

That did it. Tati isn't making any pictures in Russia.

It's CBS-TV's 'Univac' Vs. NBC's 'Tote-Vote' On Election Coverage

"Univac" at CBS-TV and the "Tote-Vote" machine at NBC-TV will undoubtedly steal the election night shows next Tuesday, Nov. 4.

A-S-R Products Corp and Bayuk Cigars will co-sponsor the "Election Night Special" on NBC-TV with Chet Huntley and David Brinkley as anchormen. They'll make use of the latest electronic "brains" as well as the "Tote-Vote" machine.

Whitehall Pharmacal Co. for Anacin has purchased one-third sponsorship of the election night coverage over CBS-TV, in addition to several other program buys on the web. Texaco had originally planned to buy the CBS-TV election night coverage but deal didn't pan out.

CBS News will set up its main election headquarters in its tv studios in Grand Central Terminal. Tabulations will be performed, once again, by UNIVAC, electronic high-speed computer. Walter Cronkite will be anchor man and Eric Sevareid will do interpretations. Doug Edwards will be working with UNIVAC and Edward R. Murrow will do an appraisal of trends among Eastern voters.

Basketball With Gowned Ushers

Minneapolis, Oct. 28.

With Phil Jasen, erstwhile film company and Cinerama and "Around the World in 80 Days" exploiteer, handling the publicity, the Minneapolis Lakers professional league basketball team is taking a leaf from the showmanship book and going in for promotion.

For the home opening game there was a parade with two bands, the coach riding in a tank and the 11 players in enameled jeeps to the Auditorium where floodlights illuminated the sky. In the parade 50 National Guards' MP's flanked the jeeps.

Between the halves local troupes of dancers performed and there also were other acts. Similar entertainment is planned for other games.

At every home game, too, there are eight hostesses in evening dress to give the 287 $100 season ticket holders the Very Important Personage treatment, ushering them to their seats and distributing programs to them.

TV to Displace Cops?

Akron, Oct. 28.

Proposal to place 100 television cameras in trouble spots throughout Akron has been made by Mayor Leo A. Berg, who said it would be much cheaper than hiring policemen. The sound-equipped cameras would be placed where they would do the most good, and could be installed at a cost of $500,000 while operating costs would be $150,000 a year, the mayor said.

If the city hired 100 policemen, they could cover only 20 spots on a 24-hour basis and would cost more than this, he said. Police Chief Harry Whiddon said he favored anything that could cut down crime.

'Commercial' Red Deals a 'Must' In Future: Johnston

Eric Johnston in New York yesterday (Tues.) said that, though the Russians and other Communist countries completely lacked the American concept of "commercial deals," he was nevertheless fully in favor of regular commercial dealings with the Red bloc once the current Soviet-American film agreement had been implemented.

The Motion Picture Export Assn. president said that, in the light of patriotism displayed by them in the past, he was certain that the U. S. film companies would cooperate to the hilt with the U. S. Government's request that a deal with the Soviets be made to work. This automatically involves exhibitors giving playdates to the Soviet films released by the majors.

The U. S. State Dept. intends to call in exhibition leaders the second week in November for a "briefing" in which the importance of their giving screentime to the Soviet films will be stressed. Johnston said he assumed the division of the seven Russian pictures being bought by the Yank distribs will be done via a drawing. He indicated that companies whose pix haven't been bought by the Russians probably wouldn't be asked to distribute any of the seven Soviet films.

Johnston picked four of these pictures while in Moscow. A fifth, "Circus Artists," is being added to the list. The Russians have to Nov. 10 to indicate their full choice of the 10 American films they're purchasing.

The Soviet satellites are purchasing Hollywood pictures, partly "inspired" by the Soviet example, Johnston reported. Poland and Hungary already have bought pictures. The Czechs and Roumanians are each expected to buy 10 films each, but will purchase them from the individual American

Show Biz Plaques for Lobby of Old Globe, N.Y., Now a Thom McAn Store

Broadway lobby-that-was of the old Globe Theatre, now the Lunt-Fontanne, N.Y., opens today (Wed.) as one of the Thom McAn chain of 1,800 shoe stores (Meville Shoe, parent) and with appropriate public relations gestures in the form of two plaques.

I. Miller, across the corner at 46th St. was perhaps the first to salute show business, some 30 years ago putting Mary Pickford, Rosa Ponselle, Marilyn Miller and Ethel Barrymore in niches. (They're still there, though the Miller structure now supports a big electric sign for Time Inc. and its front has gone flamboyantly "moderne").

The Thom McAn plaques celebrate the opening of the Globe by Charles Dillingham in 1910. Peggy Wood, who made her debut then with Montgomery & Stone, officiates at today's ceremony.

Names on a second plaque recall as former players within the Globe: Sarah Bernhardt, the Astaires, Alice Brady, Irene Bordoni, Vernon Castle, Ruth Chatterton, Irene Dunne, W. C. Fields, Helen Hayes, Eddie Foy, Elsie Janis, Beatrice Lillie, Montgomery & Stone, John Charles Thomas, Clifton Webb, Ed Wynn and Miss Fontanne (sans Alfred Lunt).

Timmie Rogers, Back to U.S., Airs Pertinent Suggestions on GI Shows

Grand Central 'Spec'

Grand Central Station, in N.Y., is displaying a fresh kind of live "commercial," which sports a potentially decent cost-per-1,000. Svelte models, wearing Arkin dresses, emerge three times a day—at 9 a.m., noon and 5 p.m.—from an aperture (shaped like a tv screen) and parade down a runway above the ticket windows in the main concourse.

Exhibit, costing $1,000 a week, is up for a total of two weeks. The Arkin couturier was informed that 400,000 people pass along the concourse every day and that the advertiser could reasonably expect to make 100,000 impressions a day during the weekday rush hours. On the basis of 10 weekdays, Arkin expects an efficiency of $2 per 1,000.

WPIX Prepping Eva Peron Special

With the recent completion of "Private Life of Adolf Hitler," WPIX, N.Y., has begun another special hour-long decumentary tv project, "The Secret Life of Eva Peron."

Producers are William Cooper, station film manager, and Walter Engels, news director of the Daily News indie. Cooper and Engels have been culling film footage of the late Eva Peron and her deposed dictator husband for the past year. The Eva Peron story will be WPIX's third venture into the documentary field. The first was "The Russian Revolution," telecast last April and scheduled for rebroadcast on the station Nov. 18. "Russian" documentary was syndicated in major markets by the station.

Getty's TV Financing; Puts Coin Into PAT

Jean Paul Getty is now in television financing. Through the company it was learned that the oil-man-industrialist is a "major backer" in the newly organized Producers Associates of Television Inc.

Company was set up to "finance, sell and distribute tv properties of other producers," according to Peter M. Piech, veepee of the outfit. (Piech is former veepee at Screencraft Pictures.)

PAT, since it is financed heavily by Getty and other financiers who were hinted at but not named, is on the lookout to acquire other distribution companies.

In the integrated Army, the reception given Negro entertainers working the military posts in the European Theatre of Operations would depend upon the manager of the service club, says Timmie Rogers, who recently returned from an extended tour of Europe. Rogers was the cause celebre in a story which first broke in VARIETY recently in which was described a particularly brutal and senseless assault upon him by Major Leonard V. Bailey at the U. S. Army post in Baumholder, Germany. Bailey was later court martialed, found guilty on a minor count and fined $1,000.

Rogers stated that he was well treated in most instances. He was accorded status of name entertainer in the majority of cases. However, he declared that he preferred Air Force hospitality over the Army. The AF, he explained, explained, extends hospitality and does more to make the entertainer comfortable.

There was only one reaction to the publicity raised by the beating. Rogers said that after his discharge from the hospital, he played one date at a post in Bad Bruenznach. He sensed resentment in the audience. The faces were grim and the reaction seemed unpleasant to him.

Depends on Club Managers

As for treatment of Negroes, Rogers explained that good treatment was up to the individuals in Life Mag Publisher Sees TV Eventually 'Just Entertainment'

Chicago, Oct. 28.

Andrew Heiskell, publisher of Life magazine, believes that broadcast media will be "nothing more than transmitters of entertainment during the next 10 years" and that news, inspiration and "leadership necessary for our survival" during the decade will come entirely from newspapers and magazines.

Audit Bureau of Circulations' annual conclave heard him base his prognostication on the fact that the responsibilities to the broadcasting media are divided four ways, among networks, ad agencies, advertisers and the FCC. Network toppers, he said, are too preoccupied with buying and selling stations, making advertising deals and signing talent contracts to give more than a casual thought to journalism. Print, on the other hand, has always been an instrument of education, he averred, and periodicals have always dedicated themselves to the welfare of the nation.

Newspapers and magazines have always thought of news as the essence of history, not as programming used to "surround a sponsor's jingles," he said.

TO PENNY-PINCH WEST COAST

Wald Counts His B.O. Blessings

With three films completed, and 14 scripts in preparation, Jerry Wald's own scorecard on the performance of his films read something like this:

"An Affair to Remember"— $7,000,000 worldwide. "No Down Payment"—$2,500,000 to $3,000,000. "Kiss Them For Me"—a $400,000 loss. "Peyton Place"—estimated $30,000,000 worldwide. "The Long, Hot Summer"—about 25% ahead of "Affair," or around $8,500,000 worldwide.

Guestimating on his unreleased pictures for 20th-Fox, Wald figured "In Love and War" for between $6,000,000 and $10,000,000, "Mardi Gras" for $15,000,000 and "The Sound and the Fury" based on the Faulkner novel "about like 'Peyton Place.'"

Though he doesn't see eye-to-eye with 20th on the question of preselling his properties ("I'll keep right on doing it," said Wald. "I'll get my money back somehow"), the producer for the moment has no plans re making pix for anyone else. He's free to produce for other studios if he so chooses. "Winesburg, Ohio," which he bought personally, isn't committed to 20th.

Odets' 'Page 1' Original, Harold Lloyd's Saga In Jerry Wald's Future

Having gotten Clifford Odets to write a screen original—"The Story of Page One"—producer Jerry Wald now is toying with the idea of having the property staged on Broadway before turning it into a film.

Wald reported in N.Y. last week that chances were good for having the play on the boards by next February. He owns the picture rights.

Wald is also going ahead with plans to produce the Harold Lloyd biog, with Lloyd to act as associate producer. Adele St. John is scripting the comedian's story as a series for Cosmopolitan. The one-handed Lloyd is very anxious to have his story told accurately, though Wald has got him to agree to the juxtaposition of certain dates for the sake of dramatic values. Incident in which Lloyd had his hand blown off by a prop bomb will be in the picture. Jack Lemmon and Tony Randall are Wald's favored comedians to play the Lloyd role, but, he said, "it could also be someone very serious, like Montgomery Clift."

FEDS VETO ALCATRAZ REHABILITATION FILM

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

One of the few reported instances of Governmental refusal on cooperation for a motion picture is "Birdman of Alcatraz," which Jack Cummings was to have produced for 20th-Fox. Following an NG on project by Dept. of Justice, studio has shelved it permanently.

Understood studio considered briefly making it sans Washington approval, but production vp Buddy Adler finally decided against such action and removed film from the agenda. Thomas E. Gaddis novel deals with rehabilitation of lifer Robert Stroud.

Costing RKO $9,600,000 to Go Out Of the Motion Picture Business

RKO Pictures, once a major film corporation, is in process of demonstrating the high cost of going out of business.

That RKO was doing a fold is not new, of course. This enterprise has been on the skids for some time and obviously on the way out for more than the past year. But the startling footnote is this: it's going to cost $9,600,000 to close up shop.

This is the amount set aside as a "liquidation reserve" by General Tire & Rubber, which is the RKO parent. Major decifit items include the settling of real estate leases, writeoffs on pictures and severance pay acrruing to foreign department personnel. Last item is a legalistic must, in accordance with the laws of foreign countries; it can't be ignored because this would reflect back on the General Tire parent.

Within the framework of General Tire's corporate network was RKO Teleradio. Latter, in turn, included radio and television enterprises along with the film operation. William O'Neil, president of General Tire, reported that the radio-tv divisions showed a profit of $4,300,000 for the nine months ended last Aug. 31. But the "theatrical film division losses more than offset this figure," he added.

O'Neil is the father of Tom O'Neil, who has been calling the turns on acquisitions and operations of the show business endeavors for General Tire.

The Art of Booking

Houston, Oct. 28.

The Majestic Theatre just concluded a run of "The Life of Pope Pius XII," an important film to Roman Catholics.

Accompanying feature was Andy Griffith in "Onionhead," WB) a film rated "objectionable" by the Catholic Legion of Decency.

'French Film Week' In Montreal Avec Beaucoup Stars

Question of whether the French film industry will open its own office in Montreal now again is undecided. Meanwhile, there's a "French Film Week" in that city Nov. 3-10.

Delegation to the event will be headed by Jacques Flaud, director of the Centre National de la Cinematografie in Paris. Robert Cravenne of Unifrance, agency that aims to publicize French films abroad, also will attend.

Directors and actors due to go to Montreal for the week include Rene Clair, Jacques Tati, Louis Malle, Arletty, Dany Robin, Mijanou Bardot (sister of Brigitte), Francois Perier, Daniel Gelin and Charles Gelin.

Among the films to be shown are Montparnasse 19," "Celui Qui Doit Mourir," "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," "Maxine," "Mon Oncle," "Les Grandes Familles," etc. The French have long been unhappy with the comparatively scant attention paid their films in French Canada. It's figured that the week will throw a new focus on the French films.

WALD'S PERSONAL CONTRACTS

Lines Up Patricia Crest and Comic Mort Sahl

Jerry Wald, who produces for release through 20th-Fox, has put Patricia Crest under personal contract to his company. He also has signed comedian Mort Sahl personally.

This is a departure for Wald, who in the past has drawn on the 20th talent pool and has refrained from putting performers under personal contract.

Under the new arrangement, Wald will sign personalities he likes and then offer 20th the right to share in the contract. On several occasions, such as in the case of Barrie Chase, Wald has prevailed on the studio to sign performers whom he considered promising. Miss Crest has had no motion picture experience whatever, but Wald said he was sure she'd be an important star eventually. Still feels the same way about model Suzy Parker, too.

Rank Film Distributors of America soon to disclose acquisition of its first non-Rank British film for U.S. release.

Factoring Gentry Big-Mitts UA

National Commercial Finance Conference Inc., whose membership comprises more than 100 financial companies and factors, yesterday (Tues.) at its convention in New York paid unique tribute to United Artists.

Special award was presented to UA (board chairman Robert S. Benjamin was the recipient) and UA became the first film company so honored.

Herbert R. Silverman, chairman of the Conference, said UA was being singled out because of the gains this company has made in the business world through the use of commercial company financing. UA financing has come from the Walter E. Heller factoring outfit of Chicago as well as several banks.

Award went to UA in the big-business category, as distinguished from small and middle-sized enterprises. Continental Motors, National Airlines and Rexall Drugs were previous recipients.

Electrican Lloyd Seese Guilty in Killing During Massachusetts Location

Worcester, Mass., Oct. 28.

Lloyd Seese, 52 year old film electrician from Hollywood and Tucson, pleaded guilty to manslaughter Thursday (23) in Worcester Superior Court and was sentenced to from four to eight years in Walpole State prison by Judge Eugene A. Hudson.

Seese was charged with the fatal stabbing last July of Lawrence W. Wilder, 25, of Worcester, during an altercation following a drinking bout at a night spot. Seese was a member of the film company on location filming "Man in a Net."

Following the altercation Seese tried to commandeer a diesel locomotive to flee the city. He was represented by Atty. John J. George who had been appointed by the court after the Worcester County Grand Jury returned an indictment last month.

Believe It, Now

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

Samuel Goldwyn spokesman issued a one-sentence statement in response to Theatre Owners of America Miami Convention request that producer deny reports he plans disposing of his pre-1948 inventory to video syndicators:

"Negotiations are still going on for the sale of Mr. Goldwyn's pre-1948 films."

Rank-Yank Pins Hopes on 'Night To Remember'

Though a recent United Artists package include some J. Arthur Rank films for sale to television, Rank Film Distributors of America for the moment has no intention of unloading additional pictures to tv, Kenneth Hargreaves, RFDA prexy, said in N. Y. Monday (20).

The films in the UA package were purchased by UA from Rank and have not been theatrically released in the States.

Hargreaves, fresh back from a two-week stay in London, said one of the reasons for not selling to tv was the type of print policy engaged in by the Rank outfit. Under this policy, a limited number of prints are put out, but the pictures stay in release for as long as three years. Since the Rank outfit has been operating in the U. S. only for 18 months, there won't be any tv sales for quite a while.

Hargreaves, admitting that his organization to date had performed below original expectations, said he was pinning "maximum hopes" on the release of Rank's "A Night to Remember," which opens at the Criterion Theatre on Broadway in mid-December on a two-a-day policy. While it's known that Rank-Yank has been losing money so far, it's also true that its establishment in the States coincided with a very slack period during which London delivered few important films.

Asked why Rank went in for, by present independent standards, a rather elaborate sales setup in the U. S., Hargreaves said this was considered necessary for any outfit that planned to derive income from the commercial rather than the art theatres. In any case, he added, "we still have only about 15% of the sales force of a United Artists or a 20th-Fox. And we release 28 films now."

Though there's a plentiful supply of Rank films, Hargreaves said he was nevertheless looking at a lot of Continental pictures and would take on "those which I consider to have commercial value."

Karl F. De Vogt, foreign sales manager of the Bavaria Filmkunst and rep of the Assn. of German Motion Picture Exporters, arrived in N. Y. Monday (20) to study the U.S. market.

WALL STREETERS HIT 'SWINDLES'

The new corporate trouble at Loew's has served to focus attention on the wide area of difference in the management thinking of Wall Streeters vis-a-vis film company habits.

The downtowners deal in big money, but they're tight with a dollar when it comes to business operations. They're "economy" conscious all the way and shake their heads incredulously at the "loose regard" many picture people at both the studios and the homeoffices have for the Yankee buck.

The conflict shows itself more and more as the investors from outside the industry move into prominent industry positons.

One veteran broker was discussing the matter over the past week. He has important investments in other business enterprises, in addition to pictures, and noted that the executive officers of these other endeavors fly from city to city within the course of their duties—but at the tourist rate.

Whereas, he went on, an expense voucher which a film industryite recently handed in to the cashier of his studio carried one item for $300. This smply was for extra plane luggage taken along on a short flight.

The Wall Street minds inquire; If the extra luggage was necessary, why, with a little advance planning, couldn't it have been shipped via Railway Express?

This might seem a small matter but it does demonstrate the kind of reasoning that's expressed in N.Y.'s financial area. Also considered are the usually well-appointed offices occupied by film higher-ups, in contrast with the sparsely-turnished, inelaborate quarters of the rich but conservative downtowners.

This, too, appears picayune, but it is not insignificant.

The thinking about film company economies that prevails in a large part of Wall Street extends from the minor swindle sheets to the multi-million-dollar production budgets and fancy Hollywood salaries.

The Wall Streeters want cuts all the way. They want every item of waste eliminated and more and more they can get what they want. And not being conditioned by tradition, and without old-school loyal-

23-YR. VET MARY BAKER EXITS JAFFE AGENCY

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

Mary Baker, for 23 years with the Sam Jaffe agency, resigned as veepee of Jaffe company and of Famous Artists Associates. Latter company was formed when Jaffe-Famous merged several years ago.

She will hereafter lend services to Jaffe agency in advisory capacity but leaving in January on a extended European trek, during which she may work out some deals in conjunction with Jaffe agency.

The only remaining one of Jaffe personnel at Famous is Jaffe prexy Phil Gersh, who became prez when Jaffe resigned.

MG Studio Gets Residual Rights

Department of Justice has made it clear whatever turn is taken in the corporate split at Loew's, the studio must be the one to take title to the post-1948 film library. There's not a chance of the theatre division acquiring these properties.

Consequently, ruled out as a possibility is the thought that the backlog might be sold to television without any clearances with the Hollywood guilds. Speculation had prevalled in part of the Wall Street area that the exhibition division of Loew's, if given the "modern" films, could have peddled them freely without fear of the work-stoppage reprisals which the film-making unions can effect against the studio.

Another angle centers on Loew's indebtedness of $24,000,000. If the Green-Newman syndicate has its way, this is to be assumed by the studio because of its acquisition of the backlog.

'Big Parade' Modernized?

[METRO IS EXPERIMENTING]

Metro, on the quiet, reportedly has been experimenting with "modernization" of "The Big Parade," the idea being to gimmick up this 1925 release so as to make it presentable to today's audience. Being tried is the addition of background music, sound effects and narration as a means of communicating the story line.

Following Paramount's lead, M-G is dusting off some 700 pictures from the silent era with the thought of adapting them for licensing to television. "Parade" is the first.

Par has about 1,500 such silents and hopes to have a package of about 50 of them ready for market shortly.

It's a cinch that if Par and M-G can salvage the vintage material in their vaults other companies will do likewise. It could result in several thousand of those quiet oldies being piped into the living rooms of the nation.

Today (Wed.) Is Vogel's Showdown; Loew's at Divorcement Crossroads; Wall Street Wants What It Wants

Today (Wed.) is C-Day at Loew's—C for crucial. Being placed before the full board for a formal vote is the method of divorcement to be pursued, with president Joseph R. Vogel pressing for a spinoff of domestic theatres and Louis Green, Jerome Newman, et al., insisting on spinning off the studio.

Vogel states he doesn't want a proxy fight "and I have no information that anybody honestly and sincerely wants it."

This same sentiment is expressed by the G-N camp.

But all evidence indicates that the controversy will lead to open warfare—specifically, a proxy fight—unless G-N have their way.

They and their associates have invested heavily in the company and uppermost in their minds is the separation of the studio as a separate entity. And they want Vogel out of the film-making operation but would endorse him as head of the exhibition and allied branch.

Vogel is fighting to stay on as chief exec of the studio and along with it all other subsidiaries, with the exception of the domestic theatre company, that survive.

Downtown sources privy to the "inside" insist that Green-Newman can corral enough of the 5,300,000 shares to call the turns. This has been disputed by sources on the Vogel end.

Neither side is venturing any guess on how the voting will go at today's meeting. Hinted in unofficial areas is the possibility of a "deal"—meaning some kind of compromise arrangement that would avert a proxy row. But, again, according to the Wall St. information if there's any compromise it will have to be pretty much one sided. Meaning with Vogel making the concessions.

Vogel defends his position of film company president in multipronged fashion. The Metro pictures have been improving, the corporation is in the black, substantial economies have been effected, etc. Too, a president doesn't actually produce pictures but is merely "consulted" on pic projects. Furthermore, he ought to know product, having seen at the rate of six pictures a week for the past 30 years and spending millions in buying them for the theatre company, he underscores.

Vogel, acknowledging the charge that a theatreman is not qualified to run a picture company, adds that many exhibs past and present have helmed a film outfit with success.

Green-Newman rebuttal goes along these lines. Advances made by the corporation have been largely due to policies they were responsible for. As for exhibs becoming company presidents, it's true that Marcus Loew, Barney Balaban, Adolph Zukor, Spyros Skouras and others started out in exhibition. But they made the switch to the presidential status in another era, under different circumstances, and they were younger men at the time. (Vogel is 67.)

Outcome of today's board session may be kept under wraps for some time. Whatever decision is reached, it will have to be approved by the Department of Justice first and then the U. S. District Court in N. Y. which has retained jurisdiction in the industry's antitrust case.

New Powers At Loew's

In the newest chapter of the struggle for control of Loew's Inc., two directors and staunch supporters of prexy Joseph R. Vogel are emerging as the largest single stockholders of the embattled company. In the past 60 days, Ira Guilden and Philip Roth, partners in Baldwin Securities, have accumulated large blocks of stocks, raising their total to more than 200,000 shares.

Louis A. Green and Jerome A. Newman, the two directors who are challenging the management with their plan to spin off the studio, hold some 150,000 shares. In addition, Joseph Tomlinson, who challenged the management last year and is currently supporting the Green-Newman faction, now holds about 160,000 shares. Lehman Bros. and Lazard Freres, who are thought to be siding wtih Green and Newman although their position has not been officially indicated, hold some 150,000 shares. In addition, the Wall Street banking firms, it's figured, can speak for some 300,000 shares held by their clients.

A curious twist in the Lehman-Lazard position, if they are supporting Green and Newman as has been variously indicated, is the report that I. John Snyder, president of U. S. Industries, who went on the Loew's board recently as a Lehman-Lazard representative, is strongly in Vogel's corner. In the showdown vote today (Wed.) on the question of spinning off the theatres or the studio, Snyder, it's said; will vote with the Vogel faction to keep the studio and to proceed with the original divorcement plan.

Offsets

Guilden and Roth originally went on the Loew's board as "brakes" against Green and Newman, a situation that the latter pair resented inasmuch as they maintained that they had come on the board and taken a position in the company as supporters of Vogel. They resented the suspicion that was cast on their motives in moving into the Loew's situation and have constantly denied any intention of "liquidating" the company.

Newman and Green have threatened to launch a proxy fight if their proposal—the spinoff of the studio — is defeated at today's board session. Since Vogel controls a majority of the 19-man board, it's expected that the Green-Newman plan will be defeated unless, of course, some compromise is hammered out at the meeting.

Green and Newman have indicated at various times that they can corral some 2,000,000 shares if they decide to proceed with a showdown. The Loew's position is that the pair are "bluffing" and that if they had that many shares, they could call a special stockholders' meeting to elect their own directors. Supporters on Wall Street claimed by Green and Newman are also chalked up by Loew's as being in its corner, a situation that makes it difficult to determine who's who in the new battle for control of Loew's. It appears that many Wall Streeters are playing it cagey and are playing footsie with both sides without tipping off their official positions.

Vogel, meanwhile, is said to be saving a "blockbuster"—not the picture type—for shortly before the annual meeting in February. It's said that the board, with the majority supporting Vogel, will vote a 25c dividend in November for payment in December. This divvy payment, if it is passed, will restore the regular 25c quarterly melon which was discontinued when the company faced tough sledding about two years ago. The quarter for which the divvy is expected to be declared is figured to be Loew's best in the last 10 years and is based primarily on the success of "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof."

In an another development in the Loew's fight, Stanley Meyer, who was associated with Tomlinson in the abortive attempt to wrest control of the company from the Vogel management last year, is reported to be trying to get back into the picture. Meyer is said to have been in New York for the past week conferring with Tomlinson and the Green-Newman faction. He is said to have brought numerous records with him and is attempting to point out the mistakes made in the previous failure to unseat the management.

'Let Him Have Studio'

Louis Green-Jerome Newman faction at Loew's is willing to go along with Joseph R. Vogel in at least one respect, according to some Wall Street advices.

It's reported they'd be agreeable to allowing Vogel to head the Metro studio. "If he wants it, let him have it," allegedly is their resigned feeling.

However, they're still insisting that the studio be spun off from other Loew's-Metro activities, with the theatre company, music, records, foreign theatres, etc., emerging as the major enterprise. G-N sources already have expressed themselves as willing to have Vogel to head the latter.

Hutton Tea-Leaf Reading Re Loew Big Divvy a Fliv

The brokerage house of E. F. Hutton had reason to be red-faced last week. The commission house sent out on its client wires the information that Joseph R. Vogel would announce a distribution of $10 to $15 per share to Loew's stockholders. All tax free.

The Loew's president would make such a disclosure Thursday (23) in addressing a luncheon-meeting of the N. Y. Society of Security Analysts, said Hutton.

Vogel made no such announcement. Indeed, he said he never even heard discussion of any kind of special dividend. Sources close to the Green-Newman faction at Loew's likewise professed no knowledge of the matter. Word from the trading floor of the Stock Exchange had it that the Hutton partners regretted having sent out the wire.

But right or wrong, the Hutton

Vogel Faces Security Analysts; Green, Newman 'Eavesdrop' But Put No Questions; Credo Clearer

By GENE ARNEEL

Joseph R. Vogel, president of Loew's, appeared before the New York Society of Security Analysts last Thursday (23) to offer some fiscally dramatic figures on how the company has been faring since his regime took over.

The first quarter of the corporation's current fiscal year—the quarter ends Nov. 20—will bring earnings of 45c per common share—highest for any 12-week period since 1947. First quarter of last year brought a loss of 24c per share.

Vogel further stated that pictures made for release in the year Aug. 1, 1956, to July 31, 1957, proved a $15,600,000 loss for Loew's. And this loss reflected itself in earnnigs for the two fiscal years ended July 31, 1957, and July 31, 1958.

In contrast, Vogel continued, product made for release in the year beginning Aug. 1, 1957, will show an estimated profit of $1,500,000. For further emphasis, he underlined that pictures in the first quarter of the current year will earn about $2,000,000 before taxes, as compared with a before-taxes loss of $4,700,000 in the first frame of last year.

Vogel said there will be an overall profit for the year ended Aug. 31, but conceded this will be a slight one. Formal report, due shortly, expectedly will show the earnings as amounting to one cent per share on the 5,300,000 shares outstanding.

Brings His Guitar

In any event, it was clear that Vogel was out to romance the Wall Streeters with his message of financial improvement since his regime took over. And in line with his desire to have the studio emerge as the upper of the two after-divorcement companies—that is, corporately combined with all other Loew's enterprises excepting domestic theatres—he undertook to ram home the thought that the "revitalized" film-making can be converted into money-making wholesomeness.

The Vogel stance is in opposition to that taken by Louis Green, Jerome Newman, et al. Green and Newman, as board members and important stockholders, want the corporation to effect its antitrust decree-necessitated split along the lines of the studio and distribution spun off and emerging as one separate entity and all other Loew's endeavors packaged apart.

Both Newman and Green attended the analysts' luncheon get-together, it was observed, but sat on the sidelines as part of the audience. They had nothing to say, their presence wasn't acknowledged, and they made a quick exit following Vogel's stand. And while they had nothing to offer officially in rebuttal to Vogel, some Wall Streeters favoring their side suggested that the prez, in his rosier financial reports, might have been subscribing to a new kind of bookkeeping system under which a certain picture might have been termed a loss in one period and then a money maker in a subsequent semester. Cited specifically along these lines was "Raintree County."

One Acre For Sale

Left hanging was a statement by Vogel to the effect that if pictures lose money "under no circumstances" will the company continue to make them.

This suggested to some reporters the possibility of a Culver City policy switch but the chief exec, within the framework of his statement, indicated that only one acre of the studio property might be up for sale.

Vogel acknowledged that the company has been accused of nepotism and dissipation of assets. In answer to this he pointed to the earnings progress and added that the corporation already has placed into effect $8,000,000 in annual economies. In addition to this whopping cut in expense, he underscored the qualitative advances in production with such pictures as "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" and "Gigi."

What about Louis Green's ideas on the studio spinoff? Vogel was asked.

Vogel said that he held Green in high respect and "his ideas are receiving the proper attention by management and the directors."

In reply to another query, Vogel stated that while the stockholders already have formally voted to spin off domestic theatres (this was back in 1952), it doesn't necessarily follow that this will be the ultimate turn of events. (The intimation here was that this is still a matter for the board and the court to ultimately decide.)

More from Vogel—

Income next year from the sale of pictures to television ought to be about $8,000,000; he never heard of the report (as wired by E. F. Hutton & Co.) that the company would distribute $10 to $15 per share in special dividends; while there's an appraisal now going on of certain Coast properties looking to a possible sale, a deal has been entered with Continental Oil concerning oil explotations at the studio, with this being conducted on a profit participation basis with no costs to Loew's; profits from pictures in the next fiscal year could be $18,000,000-$19,000,000; strangely enough, Vogel, responding to a subsequent question, dropped the figure to $16,000,000-$17,000,000; television competition has reached its peak, will lessen from now on in; domestic theatres were appraised (three years ago) at $65,000,000 but "we of management believe they're worth less than that"; the company has 250 pictures in the post-1958 inventory but the feeling is that they are worth less than earlier indicated, clearances with the Hollywood guilds being a factor.

WAID STATES-RIGHTING

Former Rep Exec Lines Up 260 Backlog of Films

Dallas, Oct. 28.

W. S. Waid has opened a motion picture distributing office here, Cameo Distributing Co. Inc. He has been in active show biz for over 40 years and was associated with Republic Pictures for the past 15 years. Cameo Pictures will distribute features to Texas and Oklahoma exhibitors. Wade stated that Cameo has some 260 films including product from IFE, RKO, Lippert and some new product plus short subjects and feature attractions.

Cameo Pictures is headed by Waid as prez and a number of employees formerly with Republic Pictures, Frankie Weatherford, Theo Routt, Tillie Kelley, James Ezell, Lena Huey and Robert Dage.

Joe Vogel Pro-Thau

Joseph R. Vogel, president of Loew's, states he's hopeful that Benjamin Thau will stay on as administrative head of the Metro studio. Thau's contract terminates Oct. 31.

Vogel credits Thau with important contributions in the way of re-settling West Coast affairs, such as in the interim before Sol C. Siegel took over as production chief.

Vogel's dual-pronged footnote is that a new contract "can't be negotiated in a day" and he feels certain that Thau in the meantime "won't run out."

Sues Rooney Enterprises

Los Angeles, Oct. 28.

Total of $13,128 is demanded by Republic Pictures and its subsid, Consolidated Film Industries, in Superior Court action filed against Mickey Rooney Enterprises and various officers of company.

Complaint alleges that $10,000 of this amount is a promissory note signed by Maurice Duke, one of officers, in 1954, coin being advanced for production of a tv series, "Daniel Boone." Balance is due for services and goods delivered, according to suit.

Film Biz in Hallowe'en Idiom

Miami Beach, Oct. 28.

Noting that the TOA conventions usually take place around Hallow'en time, Mitchell Wolfson, employed the following analogy to describe the problems of the indutsry:

"Hallow'en could be our own national holiday because on a year round basis we face the bugaboo of bidding . . . the vampire of excessive percentage . . . the demons of distribution and the gnomes of toll tv. We're besieged by the phantoms of front money and the terrors of taxation. Looking over our shoulder are the banshee of blind-selling and the leprechaun of legislation. The spectre of rising advertising costs and the apparition of print shortages follow us wherever we go . . . we grapple with the gobbins of clearance and availability and the imps of aspect ratio . . . and always in the next room are the rattling bones of the post-1948 pictures."

International Solutions Needed—Flaud

France's Industry Spokesman Sees Local-Level Agreements Increasingly Futile

An international motion picture conference to seek "solid and durable solutions" for the international film industry is proposed by Jacques Flaud, director of France's semi-governmental Centre National de la Cinematographie. Problems raised by the rise of television, and its effects on the film business worldwide, would be part of the agenda of such a conference.

Flaud said it was becoming increasingly clear that it was useless and "stupid" to seek solutions to a variety of pressing problems on a national and local level only. Falling within the scope of possible international action are such topics as the cost of production, financing and release of films, admission prices and film rentals, the promotion of quality, film festivals and competitions, film-tv relations, screen ratios, etc., he felt.

"Fortunately, one may see that people are beginning to acquire knowledge about the international truth of these problems," Flaud stated. "It is possible now to admit that the division of the world into producing nations on the one side and consuming ones on the other is an antiquated idea. Every country must actually consider itself as bound to film production.

"It is possible to admit, too, that the control of admission prices and of rentals takes on international importance which justifies action on an international level. One can admit now that reciprocity in the way of film exchange is a progressive policy which has nothing to do with either narrow-mindedness or else some sort of sectarianism that thoroughly opposes any supremacy, regardless of how temporary it may be.

"It is now possible to get people to admit that self-limitation in the export film is preferable to quotas in the final count. And it is clear today that cooperation in the areas of production and distrbution by countries grouped in economic blocs doesn't necessarily constitute a 'war weapon' against other industries."

Looks Ahead

Flaud envisioned the day when all countries would give assistance to their top films, and when the profits from such a policy could be applied to the worldwide industry. Partial attempts now being made in these various directions are sensible, Flaud felt, but ultimately they make sense only "if they can be applied to the very size of the problems they seek to solve." He added that the present striving for clear-sightedness in the film biz had to be continued on a practical level. But who, he asked, will take the initative?

Flaud has been one of the prime movers in the attempt to work out a European common market for films. His remarks, seen in this context, appear directed primarily to European countries and seem to have less applicability to the U.S., where the resistance to controls is great and conditions differ from those on the Continent. However, Flaud, like his American colleagues, is aware of Hollywood's great and growing dependence on the foreign market and the likelihood of concessions which this dependence may bring about. When he talks about self-limitation of exports the reference would appear aimed at the U.S., which does in fact practice such self-restraint in several countries, including Germany and Italy. When he discusses reciprocity, he hits on a sensitive nerve with the Motion Picture Export Assn. which has always refused it to the West, but has just granted it to the Soviets.

However, many of the problems that plague the European industries aren't applicable in the States, and their proposed solutions via controls and joint action would in effect harm American film interests operating on the Continent. In all such proposals, the traditional American distrust of "controls" is apt to keep the U.S. companies out of any European compact. It was Flaud himself who, in 1957, said the European common mart for films was aimed, in part, at breaking the longstanding American superiorty in Europe and was thus, indirectly, aimed to curtail Hollywood.

'Funny, Not Silly' Format For '59 Academy' Cast

Academy Awards telecast next year will run two hours without a commercial, will have a distinctly-different format and will be "dignified but not dull, funny but not silly," Jerry Wald, who produced the show last year and is producing it again on April 6, 1959, stated in N.Y. last week.

Unless something misfires, such prominent film personalities as Ingrid Bergman, Alec Guiness, Brigitte Bardot and Gina Lollobrigida will appear on the program. They'll all go on "live," with no filmed sections planned at all. There'll be no New York pickups either.

Wald said the Academy's technical awards would again be presented on the show "because you can't ignore these men and their accomplishments." However, a more entertaining formula than in the past will be found. The way it'll work out is that approximately one hour will be entertainment and another hour will be taken up with the presentation of awards.

Master-of-ceremony spot will be split among several stars and here, again, the format will differ from that of the past, Wald reported.

SEEK WARDEN FOR 'AX' FILM

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

Producers John Fearnley and David Gray are dickering for Jack Warden to star in their upcoming film, "The Cut of the Ax." Sheppard Kerman is adapting the novel by Delmar Jackson, and it's Planned to roll the film next year.

Warden has just finished a toplining stint in 20th-Fox's "The Sound and the Fury."

NO 'ANTI' FILM AS YET A WOW

Purchase of the Boris Pasternak novel, "Doctor Zhivago," for filming by Joshua Logan's Mansfield Productions compounds the ironic circumstances that already have surrounded the book about the early days of the Bolshevik revolution.

It also serves as a reminder that there virtually hasn't been a single film treating with the Communists or Soviet outrages that has clicked at the American boxoffice. Not even stories involving Communism in the U. S. seem to hold appeal.

"Doctor Zhivago," which last week was awarded the 1958 Nobel Prize for Literature, almost immediately was denounced as an "artistically squalid, malicious work replete with hatred of socialism" by Literary Gazette, Moscow organ of the Soviet Union of Writers. The book has not been published inside Russia, but is a runaway bestseller everywhere else. It is published in the U. S. by Pantheon Press, which obtained the rights via an Italian publisher. The Russians have denounced the Nobel Prize for Pasternak as "an act against the Soviet Union," and Pasternak himself is called a "traitor" and a "Judas."

His Next Commitment

Logan will produce and direct "Doctor Zhivago" after he finishes "Parrish" for Warner Bros. release.

If "Doctor Zhivago" is made into a film, it will be on the assumption that it's in the "public domain." Charles Byron, prez of Dragon Productions, says his lawyers are still studying the situation. If it is found that the novel is not in the public domain, "then it's a question of who first can reach Pasternak and make a deal," he said.

There's no copyright pact with U.S.S.R. The Italian publisher apparently does not control film rights.

Joshua Logan also says he will make the Pasternak book under the banner of his Mansfield Productions. Spokesman for Logan said negotiations were going on and that Logan was certain that he'd have the rights to the novel "by the time he starts production."

There have been many explanations of why an anti-Communist nation such as the United States apparently refuses to accept anti-Red films as part of its entertainment diet. It's pointed out that, in the immediate period preceding the last war, the Nazis got roasted frequently and vehemently on the

Proving Proverb, Prophet Levin Strictly Unhonored in Frisco; Festival Gets Plenty O' Nuttin'

By WILLIAM STEIF

San Francisco, Oct. 28.

San Francisco Film Festival starting tomorrow (29) will be the last unless the city comes up with some financial support.

Festival Director Irving M. (Bud) Levin made this statement last weekend and added: "Let's face it. Hollywood doesn't want a festival here."

Levin, mad and hurt over lack of local help and over lack of U.S. industry's participation in fete, pleaded openly for fiscal aid. He noted that City of Cannes and French Tourist Bureau puts up $250,000 for Cannes fete, City of Venice puts up $200,000 for its fete and City of Vancouver, B.C., puts up $400,000 for its cultural bash and added:

"We have the backing of the San Francisco Art Commission with the provision that we ask no money. I asked for money from the city last winter and was told there was no place in the city budget for the festival.

"We're going to have a festival this year and it's going to be a humdinger, but after this it's just impossible. There are too many obstacles to overcome to do it alone."

He suggested $75,000 would support a "crackerjack, first-class affair next year."

Levin also blasted gossip that "this is a gigantic promotion for Bud Levin and makes money . . . nothing's further from the truth . . . we're a non-profit corporation and a losing proposition. We hope to get some of our loss back at the boxoffice."

Levin said he could "just guess" at the reason Hollywood has cold-shouldered Frisco fete, which last winter got an official "sanction" from the Intl. Federation of Film Producers Assns.

"For some reason," he declared, "Hollywood doesn't want to be judged in the world market."

Levin admitted two failures have hurt Frisco fete considerably:

(1) He has been unable to wangle any star-power from Hollywood which would provide festival with glamor it now lacks, though he is still trying on fete's eve;

(2) Quickie Mexico City festival has hurt Frisco considerably—he said he'd made two European trips this year to line up product, stars and government officials "and they all wound up in Mexico City because Mexico City paid their way."

Gloomy Toll

All of this was calculated to jolt Frisco city officials, Chamber of Commerce, Tourist Bureau and local press into realization that they were about to lose what Levin called "a tourist attraction and an important cultural activity."

Levin's remarks were made at a press conference to which all four of the local newspapers, as well as radio-tv reporters, had been invited. Representatives of only two newspapers, however, showed up and they provided comparatively little coverage of Levin's statements. Radio and video didn't cover at all.

Levin admitted Paramount had refused his request to showcase "Houseboat" his last chance to get U.S. product. Oddly enough, Paramount "previewed" the film at the 2,600-seat Golden Gate Theatre in downtown Frisco only last Saturday (25) night.

Despite this downbeat approach —or possibly because of it—ticket sales, which had been lagging, picked up briskly last week and Levin got program set. It'll consist of 16 pictures (one, Japan's "The Rickshaw Man," out of competition) from 12 nations.

Whether any of this will make an impression on Frisco's city officials, notoriously tight-fisted when it comes to any new project, is still questionable.

Sniff Commercial Odor

San Francisco, Oct. 28.

San Francisco press coverage of the San Francisco Film Festival has almost vanished.

This is particularly true of two Hearst dailies, morning Examiner which is the biggest daily in Northern California, and afternoon Call-Bulletin.

Two Hearst papers apparently are convinced that Frisco fete is a commercial venture and attitude is that if festival won't buy space, papers won't give it any space.

Ad manager of one of the dailies put it just this bluntly only last week and, since festival has no ad budget, and result has been almost no puffs. This has affected fete's boxoffice, on which it must depend to make up losses incurred in getting festival rolling, though boxoffice has picked up during past week.

Independent morning Chronicle has generally been more sympathetic to festival, as has Scripps-Howard's afternoon News, but neither has extended itself too far in trying to push festival, and there's no doubt that Hearst boycott has hurt.

'Get With It, NBC' Ad-Pub Jolt Re Oscar Buildup

Film companies cooperating in effects to put on a sock Academy Awards telecast next April have met with NBC officials to complain that the network isn't doing enough to "pre-sell" the show.

Jerry Pickman of Paramount and Roger Lewis of United Artists have told NBC the film biz, which bankrolls the Academy show, expects the web to make more noise about the telecast, and well in advance of its actual date.

Expectation is that, if the presell is properly carried out, some 120,000,000 or more people will get to see the show, which falls on a Monday night so as not to interfere too much with theatre business. Audience of last Oscar telecast was estimated at around 90,000,000.

'Ben Hur' Cost Metro Over 13-Mil, But It'll Still Make Money: Vogel

"Ben Hur" appears racing to the distinction of being the costliest production in the history of the picture buisness. The most recent "final" budget was $13,000,000 and Loew's-Metro president Joseph R. Vogel concedes it may go over that figure "by a few hundred thousand."

Other sources close to Loew's think the company may have to spend as much as $15,000,000 before the negative is in the can. And some question has been raised as to whether the Loew's board would have approved the project at the outset if it were known that such a mammoth investment would be involved.

"Hur" went before the cameras in Rome May 21 and, of course, is still going on. Sam Zimbalist is the producer, William Wyler the director and the cast includes Charlston Heston, Jack Hawkins, Martha Scott, Finlay Currie and Cathy O'Donnell.

Vogel states he's confident about the outcome, that he and others in top-echelon management have been maintaining a close check on the production and are highly satisfied with what's on film so far.

He points, too, to M-G's previous "epic," namely "Quo Vadis." This one, also produced by Zimbalist, was brought in at a cost of $7,000,000 and grossed $23,000,000, this despite mixed notices.

There's also the title holder (money-wise) to consider. This is Paramount's "Ten Commandments," which represented an investment of $13,500,000 and so far has grossed nearly $30,000,000 in the domestic market alone. Vogel draws attention to this entry as demonstrating the amount of money a top-flight production can reel in.

Disturbing factor to some of the anti-Vogel forces on the Loew's board is the time element. Even if "Hur" is a smash, it's figured it will take at least a couple of years before the costs can be amortized and profits mount up. Whereas, Loew's earnings could stand some bolstering at this time.

"I Want to Live" is a drama dealing with the last years and the execution of Barbara Graham, who was convicted at one time or another of prostitution, perjury, forgery and murder. It is not pleasant but the picture based on it is so overwhelming in its compulsion and power, that it will probably be one of the year's big boxoffice successes as well as garnering considerable critical applause. While it may be prevented by its grim honesty from being a blockbuster, nothing can stop it from being a bombshell.

Walter Wanger's explosive production for Figaro Inc., for United Artists, is superb on almost every count, most notably in the producer's insight that there was a story in this life of sordid and unappetizing crime. It becomes much more than that in the direction of Robert Wise, the screenplay by Nelson Gidding and Don M. Mankiewicz, and most particularly the performance of Susan Hayward in the central role. It is probably the most damning indictment of capital punishment ever documented in any medium.

There is no attempt to gloss the character of Barbara Graham, in the Gidding-Mankiewicz screenplay, only an effort to understand it through some fine irony and pathos. The woman apparently lived an almost completely sordid life. She had no hesitation about indulging in any form of crime or vice that promised excitement on her own, rather mean, terms. To describe her depravity, it is easier to say what she was not. She was not a narcotics addict and, according to a psychiatrist, she was incapable of physical violence.

The screenplay is based on newspaper and magazine articles by San Francisco reporter Ed Montgomery, and on letters written by the woman herself. Its premise is that she was likely innocent of the brutal and vicious murder for which she was executed in the California gas chamber. Actually, however, the picture is not too concerned with her guilt or innocence. It is more concerned with the fact that she was a fallible human being and that the state executed her.

The final 30 to 40 minutes of the film are as harrowing as anything ever done in pictures. It is a purposely understated account of the mechanics involved in the state's legal destruction of life, and its effects is to raise serious thoughts about what constitutes "cruel and unusual punishment."

The execution is on, it is stayed. It is off, it is on. The sequence is almost unbearable, mounting unswervingly in its intensity. What might seem the greatest horror of it, actually seeing Miss Hayward die in the real gas chamber, comes finally as an anticlimax of relief. As the writers, director and producer certainly intended it should. Subtly, inferentially, the creators of the film raise the question of which is the more degraded, the object of this ordeal or the law that ordains it.

There is a splendid feeling of the might of the Law. Not one of those actually involved in preparing Miss Hayward's death is eager for it. They wait almost as breathlessly as she for the word that might come from a court or the governor that will put it off. They go about their jobs, routinely, but with ironic compassion. It is the Law, mysterious and aloof, which rules and the warden, the priest, the executioners, all are as helpless in halting it as the victim. It is horror compounded and superbly done.

It is hard to think of any other star except Miss Hayward who could bring off this complex characterization. She gives a performance that undoubtedly will return her, after her recent hiatus, to the top of pouplar and critical lists.

Simon Oakland, as Montgomery, who first crucified Barbara Graham in print and then attempted to undo what he had done, underplays his role with telling assurance. The character he plays employs a hearing aid, a fact that gives the picture a vivid symbolic ending. He and Virginia Vincent, the latter as Miss Graham's one female friend, are vital in eliciting what understanding can be gained of the woman. Oakland is a symbol of respectability and Miss Vincent, a bad girl turned good, shows by her faithfulness that there is something to be faithful to. She achieves great pathos with simplicity and conviction.

The other actors represent fine casting for character rather than for type. Theodore Bikel as a friendly pyschologist; Wesley Lau as the woman's drug-ridden husband; Philip Coolidge and Lou Krugman as the unholy pair she teamed with; Gage Clark as her vacillating lawyer, and Alice Backes, a sympathetic nurse. All are excellent. Others who stand out include James Philbrook, Bartlett Robinson, Joe De Santis, John Marley, Raymond Bailey, Gertrude Flynn, Russell Thorson, Dabbs Greer, Stafford Repp and Gavin MacLeod.

Lionel Lindon's photography has the realism and seeming spontaneity of a first-class documentary, but calculated in its staging and effect. Music is supplied by a jazz combo made up of Gerry Mulligan, Shelly Manne, Red Mitchell, Art Farmer, Frank Rosolino, Pete Jolly and Bud Shank, with music composed and conducted by John Mandel.

Edward Haworth's art direction is imaginative and accurate down to the last sleazy background, aided by set decorator Victor Gangelin. William Hornbeck's editing helps give the picture its relentless pace, and sound by Fred Lau is another factor in its complete and absorbing conviction. Powe.

The Mugger

Routine meller with little chance to excite.

Los Angeles, Oct. 28.

United Artists release of a Barbizon Production presented by Helprin-Crown. Producer-director, William Berke. Stars Kent Smith; features Nan Martin, James Franciscus, Stefan Schnabel, Connie Vaness, Sandra Church, Dick O'Neil, Leonard Stone, John Alexander, Arthur Storch. Screenplay, Henry Kane, based on novel by Ed McBain; camera, J. Burgi Contner; music, Albert Glasser. Previewed at Goldwyn Studio, Oct. 20, '58. Running time, 74 MINS.

Skippy Randolph	Arthur Storch

A contrived film that sets out to tell one story and ends up telling another, "The Mugger" is a routine melodrama that, despite a few capable performances, has nothing to pull it out of the filler class.

A Barbizon Production, presented by Helprin-Crown and released through United Artists, the cops-'n'-crooks yarn centers on the search for a mugger who leaves his female victims with a slight cheek scar, while he makes off with their black shoulder strap bags. Kent Smith, a police psychiatrist, builds a picture of the terrorist through psychological composition, and then the force sets out to find him. In the midst of the search, a girl is killed, but the crime looks like the work of the mugger. Through super sleuthing the culprit is found, and, when he denies killing the girl, the search for the murderer continues, finally landing on the girl's brother-in-law who is a friend of the psychiatrist's. It's all too simple and very pat.

Screenplay is by Henry Kane, based on the novel by Ed McBain. Film was produced and directed by William Berke in New York City, and, although his direction is sound, he would have done well to take better advantage of the scenery.

Smith is fine as the police doctor, but top acting work is turned in by Nan Martin, as a policewoman, and James Franciscus, as the brother-in-law. Good work also comes from Arthur Storch, as a cheap hood, Connie Vaness, as a cheap blonde, Sandra Church, Dick O'Neil, Stefan Schnabel and Leonard Stone.

Technical credits are stock, with J. Burgi Contner's photography better on the outside than it is in. The Albert Glasser musical score, though sometimes melodramatic, is artistically handled for the most part. Ron.

Ivan Grozny

Brussels, Oct. 28.

Mosfilm release and production. Stars Nikolai Sherkasov; features Seraphima Birman, Piotr Kadochnikov, A. Mgebrov. Written, directed and edited by Sergei Eisenstein. Camera, Edward Tisse. Andrei Mosvin; music, Sergei Prokofiev. At Brussels Greatest Films of All Times Film Fest. Running time, 90 MINS.

Ivan	Nikolai Cherkasov
Staritzkaya	Seraphima Birman
Vladimir	Piotr Kadochnikov
Pimen	A. Mgebrov

Though completed in 1946, this feature has only been allowed to be shown abroad (and in Russia) recently. Part two of a proposed trilogy on the life of the 16th century czar, Ivan the Terrible, director Sergei Eisenstein never lived to complete the third part. But as Part II stands, it's a full and an imposing historical opus.

Russians have never made it clear why this one was banned, but an analogy between Ivan and the defunct, now downgraded demigod, Stalin, is evident. It makes Ivan out to be both good and malevolent in his attempts to unite his country. The story also relates the intrigues within his own family for the throne, as well as his clashes with the scheming landowning peerage, some ready to sell out to foreign enemies.

Film has sheer visual elegance and splendor and amounts to arresting drama. It's "theatrical," almost "operatic" at times. Power struggle and political squabbles generate excitement.

The character of Ivan is brilliantly limned by Nikolai Cherkasov as he goes from dedicated monarch to tyrant to a man accepting the loneliness of position and power and substituting even terror to achieve his goal of a united country. The flashes of incipient madness are also there.

Feature looms as a good entry for special U.S. situations. Some critics may consider it a tour-de-force. Technically, it is superb and Sergei Prokofiev's music is just right. Mosk.

"In Love and War" is a keen appraisal of the utility of love and the futility of war. Its most imposing element is honesty, and it uncompromisingly handles its sex. The film represents a gamble for producer Jerry Wald and 20th-Fox, as they are banking on the excitement values rather than the marquee values of their cast. It's a smart risk and one that should pay off.

Wald has backed up his "need for new talent" words with the casting of Robert Wagner, Dana Wynter, Jeffrey Hunter, Hope Lange, Bradford Dillman, Sheree North and France Nuyen in the starring roles. It's a fresh, enthusiastic concept in big picture making that, in these days of percentages, is one way to keep the ink from running red.

Edward Anhalt's screenplay, based on Anton Myrer's novel, "The Big War," is hard-hitting, both in action and dialog. And, through the perceptive direction of Philip Dunne, each of the relationships and all of the ideas are developed with clarity. The characterizations are built in San Francisco and the Monterey Peninsula, and the sequences are particularly effective. The Pacific war footage, however, tends to ramble with little point from scene to scene and with little or no forward movement. It may be that the filmmakers felt the lack of an objective, the neglect of a goal in the battle, would paint war as more futile—and it does—but, even though the marines may not know what they're doing, the audience should.

Story is one of the changing ideals and the growing maturity of three marines entrenched in the second world war. At the start, Hunter is the patriot, Wagner the coward and Dillman the intellectual who fights because he must. At the end, Hunter dies in battle, Wagner turns hero and Dillman discovers the uselessness of war. More than one of war, the tale is one of love, Wagner for Miss North, Hunter for Miss Lange and Dillman, having discarded Miss Wynter, for Miss Nuyen.

High spots are numerous, and the seven stars—plus comic Mort Sahl in his first film role—are excellent. Wagner retains sympathy even when cockeyed; with her death scene, Miss Wynter hits a high point in her career; Hunter is tops and a solid force behind the film's action; Miss Lange, most effective, is the maximum of affection, warmth and sensitivity; Dillman portrays a change in philosophy with skill; Miss North, who is used too sparingly, proves an attuned actress and well-paced comedienne; and Miss Nuyen is fine as the tender Hawaiian-French nurse.

Sahl's Jewish marine role was written especially for him, and, from the sound of it, by him. The satirist undoubtedly will gain world-wide guffaws when, in the midst of the mortars, bombs and bullets, he answers a buzzing walkie-talkie, "Good morning, World War Two." Good in support are Joe di Reda, Steven Gant, Harvey Stephens, Paul Comi, Mary Patton, Murvyn Vye and moppets Veronica Cartwright and Brian Corcoran.

Technically, the film excels in the work of photographer Leo Tover, art directors Lyle R. Wheeler and George W. Davis, set decorators Walter M. Scott and Fay Babcock, film editor William Reynolds, soundman E. Clayton Ward and Harry M. Leonard and particularly composer Hugo Friedhofer. Ron.

Ten Days to Tulara

Lower berth item for routine double-bills. Mexican-locationed version of cops and robbers.

Hollywood, Oct. 24.

United Artists release of George Sherman-Clarence Eurist production. Stars Sterling Hayden; costars Grace Raynor, Rodolfo Hoyos. Directed by George Sherman. Screenplay, Laurance Mascott; camera, Alex Phillips; music, Leo Adomian; editor, Carlos Savage. Previewed at Goldwyn studio, Oct. 22, '58. Running time, 77 MINS.

"Ten Days To Tulara" is only suitable for lower place on routine double-bills. Produced in Mexico by Clarence Eurist and George Sherman, and directed by Sherman, the Sterling Hayden starrer hasn't enough plot interest even to sustain its brief length. What there is exhibits small imagination in the treatment. It quickly boils down to a Latin-American version of cops and robbers but even as soldados y bandidos, this combination doesn't have enough variation to make it interesting.

Sterling Hayden plays a barnstorming U. S. pilot operating a one-man airline in Central America. In Laurance Mascott's screenplay, he is forced to join a gang of desperados headed by Rodolfo Hoyos, when Hoyos kidnaps his son and holds him hostage. The gang has stolen $250,000 in gold bullion and wants to use Hayden's plane as a getaway. When the plane is shot down, they continue the trek by car and finally afoot.

There is some novelty about using a plane in this connection and Sherman wisely avoids doing the jungle bit because the background is Central America. There is an interesting attempt to use native festivals as part of the plot development, but it doesn't play with much success. The result is that the chase seems a series of repetitious episodes, and despite considerable gunfire, there isn't much jeopardy generated. There is a romance between Hayden and Grace Raynor, Hoyos' convent-bred daughter who accompanys the trek, but it, too, lacks conviction. In the end, Hoyos is killed and Hayden is united with his son.

In addition to other drawbacks, the film quality is often poor and other technical aspects, such as music and sound, are elementary. Performances are adequate although there is no more than superficial attempt at characterization. Powe.

Lieutenant	John Trigonis
1st Soldier	Don Devlin
2nd Soldier	Warren Crosby
Soldier	Troy Patterson

"Tank Battalion" is a routine Korea war yarn with generally good production values and performances. For the program market, where it's packaged with "Hell Squad," it should run up okay returns.

Richard Bernstein production centers on the four-man crew of a tank in enemy territory, their loves and battle action. Script by Bernstein and George W. Waters is inclined to be fragmentary at times but buildls in climaxing sequences, when tank is disabled and under enemy fire.

Don Kelly heads cast as tank's commander, persuasive both in fighting scenes and in his romance with Marjorie Hellen, briefly effective as an Army nurse. Edward G. Robinson, Jr., competently undertakes role of the crewman who makes his way back to base to return with part needed to repair tank. Frank Gorshin and Bob Padget portray other two crewmen, both lending conviction, and romancing Regina Gleason and Barbara Lund, respectively, former a nurse, latter a Eurasian bar-maid, each strongly cast. Mark Sheeler handles role of a stuffy captain satisfactorily.

Frederick Gately's facile camera sets a fast pace further aided by director Rose' tight editing. Rudi Feld's art direction and music score by Dick La Salle are further assets. Whit.

Hell Squad

Low-budgetter for lower-bracketing with "Tank Battalion"; pedestrian appeal.

Hollywood, Oct. 23.

American International release of Burt Topper production. Stars Wally Campo, Brandon Carroll, Frederic Gavlin; features Greg Stuart, Cecil Addis, Leon Schrier, Don Chambers. Directed-screenplay-story, Topper; camera, Erik Daarstad, John Morrill; editor, Marvin Wallowitz. Reviewed Oct. 22, '58. Running time, 64 MINS.

Russo	Wally Campo
German Officer	Brandon Carroll
Clemens	Fred Galvin
Nelson	Greg Stuart
Lippy	Cecil Addis
Roth	Leon Schrier
American Captain	Don Chambers

Larry Shuttleworth, Jerry Bob Weston, Gordon Edwards, Jack Sowards, Jim Hamilton, Ben Bigelow, Jow Hearne, Jack N. Kramer, Dick Walsh, Curtis Lozer, Bob Williams.

Efforts of a small American patrol, lost in the Tunisian desert in early days of World War II, to find its way back to base triggers the events of this Burt Topper production. Interest is delayed in starting, due to repetitious action, but picks up enough later to rate as second half of a double bill. (Film goes out with "Tank Battalion.")

Topper directs as well as wrote the original story and screenplay, and manages a somewhat novel plot finale. Sole survivor of the patrol is wounded and trapped in a mine field set by the Nazis, and in his rifle sights is a German licutenant, nearly delirious with thirst and with a map of the mine placements. Situation is well-enough developed to offer something a little different story-wise, but too much footage is wasted in leading up to it.

Wally Campo socks over his role of the wounded GI, and Brandon Carroll scores as the German. Okay performances also are contributed by Fred Gavlin, leader of the patrol; Greg Stuart, Leon Schrier and Cecil Addis, remaining members.

Technical credits are well handled by Erik Daarstad and John Morrill, photography; Marvin Wallowitz, editor. Whit.

SALES CHIEFS 'CHARM' EXHIBS

National Boxoffice Survey

Biz Off; 'Cat' Still First, 'Gigi' 2d,, 'Pacific' 3d, 'Geisha' 4th, 'So. Seas' 5th, 'Defiant' 6th

Fall elections, interest in the budding football season and dearth of product are being blamed this round for offish biz in key cities covered by VARIETY. Heavy rains along the Atlantic seaboard also obviously hurt trade badly in such keys as New York and Boston.

"Cat on Hot Tin Roof" (M-G) again is leading the b.o. procession just as it has in recent weeks. "Gigi" (M-G) is moving up into second place from fourth position of a week ago. "South Pacific" (Magna) is pushing to third spot.

"Barbarian and Geisha" (20th), third last round, is winding up fourth. "South Seas Adventure" (Cinerama) is capturing fifth money as compared with eighth position last stanza.

"Defiant Ones" (UA) is finishing in sixth place, playing in nine key cities. "Onionhead" (WB) is taking seventh money. "Big Country," also from United Artists, is rounding in eighth position.

"Windjammer" (NT) is landing in ninth spot while "White Wilderness" (BV) is ending in 10th slot.

"Search For Paradise" (Cinerama), "Man of West" (UA), comparatively new, and "Me and Colonel" (Col) are the runner-up films.

"Blood of Vampire" (U), part of horror package, shapes as a new winner. It set a new record for UI pix at a Minneapolis house this week but is not so strong in L. A. where the top new picture. "Old Man and Sea" (WB) is rated disappointing this week in Boston but fine in Frisco. "Last Hurrah" (Col), another newie, is big in N. Y. and terrific in Boston.

"Houseboat" (Par), also new, is great in Toronto and socko in Washington. "Torpedo Run" (M-G), mild in N. Y., looms hotsy in Frisco and fine in Chicago and Portland. "The Blob" (Par) is lofty in Portland.

"Wind Across Everglades" (WB) is rated not so good in Toronto. "La Parisiene" (UA), good in Toronto, is hep in Balto and socko in K. C.

"Streetcar Named Desire" (20th) (reissue) shapes smash in Detroit and nice in N. Y. where in third week. "China Doll" (UA) is lively in Chi.

"Around World in 80 Days" (UA) still is boffo in Chi and big in L. A. "Senechal" (DCA) is rated great in N. Y.

"Queen of Outer Space" (AA), fair in Boston, is okay in Buffalo. "Matchmaker" (Par), okay in N. Y., looks neat in Boston. "Night Heaven Fell" (Kings) is sock day-dating two N. Y. houses.

"Tale of Two Cities" (Rank) shapes fine in Toronto. "Scared Stiff" (Par) (reissue) is fine in Frisco.

WITTY & FRANK AT TOA CONFAB

Miami, Oct. 28.

While major issues at last week's Theatre Owners of America convention concerned the consent decrees and the withholding of pictures from tv, a considerable amount of time was devoted to an exchange of business building ideas and an analysis of the product situation. In the presentation of the latter, all the major film companies—with the conspicuous exception of Warner Bros. — had sales chiefs or pub-ad toppers on hand to outline each individual company's program schedule and promotion plans.

The much-maligned sales managers turned out to be the hit of the convention. Anyone expecting a dry rundown of the product was in a surprise as a trio of sales chiefs—Metro's Jack Byrne, United Artists Bill Heineman, and Allied Artists Maurey Goldstein — presented their pitches with unexpacted wit and charm. Columbia's Abe Montague and Rube Jackter and 20th-Fox's Alex Harrison also got in telling blows for their company although playing it straighter.

Byrne surprised the convention with his frankness. He noted that Loew's was making a strong comeback and that it was resuming its friendly company status. "We will cooperate fully in the confines of good business. We won't plead. We won't be threatened. But we'll make every effort to work out problems on a fair and mutual basis." In appraising the company's pix, Byrne did not employ the rah-rah approach. He was realistic about certain pictures, declaring: "It won't set a boxoffice record, but it'll make a buck."

Goldstein obtained the most laughs as he pointed out the "absurdity" of exhibitors in including Allied Artists in antitrust suits. "No theatre in the world could possibly be supplied by our product," he declared. "No other company can make that statement. We can win every suit, but we can go broke defending ourselves. It's ridiculous including us in the suits. We'll give you any run you want, even a better one than you have now."

On a more serious note, Goldstein appealed to the exhibitors to give AA a better break on second features, maintaining that the company had a solid supply of "playable second features." He also outlined the company's upcoming program that will include several blockbuster entries.

Heineman, also garning laughs with his asides, made a strong pitch for UA's upcoming slate.

Harrison appealed to the theatremen not to predetermine the value of a picture in a screening room.

Universal pub-ad v.p. David A. Lipton, repping sales chief Henry H. Martin, told the exhibitors that while numerous rumors concerning U were making the rounds, the company was busy making pictures.

Paramount pub-ad chief Jerry Pickman, representing sales topper George Weltner, announced that Par, in support of its upcoming program, is prepared to expand the base of its cooperative advertising "where such expenditures is justified."

When an earlier speaker, calling attention to the percentage deals stars were receiving, mentioned that Par had made a deal for 105% of the profits, Pickman cracked: "We're not giving away 105% to anybody. Barney Balaban, I'm sure, can add."

Montague declared that he was convinced that the end of the "champagne period" had not come to the industry. He said that while Columbia had been tempted to go into semi-liquidation, it has decided to stay in business—and in a big way.

Walter Reade Jr., who moderated the session, estimated that more than $300,000,000 worth of pictures for 1959 release were described by the representatives of the seven companies.

Between Liquidation-Minded Wall St. & Merciless Talent Films in Squeeze—Skouras

By HY HOLLINGER

Miami, Oct. 28.

Hollywood's creative personnel —stars, producers, directors, top cameramen and even other technical people act as if the problems of the film industry were no concern of theirs. They exploit to the maximum the "muscle" of their prestige, know-how or popularity. They demand fortunes for signing and guaranteeing profits while guaranteeing nothing, not even a good job. The present literary market has reached absurd astronomical heights.

The above pretty well sums up what Spyros Skouras, president of 20th Century-Fox, told the Theatre Owners of America at its Miami convention last week. Skouras, the only film company chief to regularly meet exhibitors face-to-face asserted, in effect, that at a time when the economics of the industry were in distress the vanity demands and "take-all" terms of the Hollywood elite were without any sense of their belonging to the industry and without feeling any mercy for its troubles.

Touching on nearly all the current vexations in the sorely-pressed industry, Skouras urged theatre operators to buy into the stocks of the major producer-distributors, get on the boards and thus obtain a voice in the affairs of Hollywood and in the ultimate disposal of the post-1948 films to television syndication.

Hits Liquidators

Blaming many of the actions of the film companies on dividend-seeking stockholders, Wall Street bankers and speculators "who are interested in the liquidation of your source of supply," Skouras maintained that a system of influential stockholding exhibitors "would fortify the film companies as well as the theatre circuits against these speculators . . ." He asserted that exhibitors were overlooking "a great opportunity that is yours under the American system of common stock holdings."

Substantially, Skouras repeated the recommendations he made recently in Chicago to a similar exhibitor gathering of Allied States Assn. After pointing out the value of the motion picture industry to the nation as well as to the world, Skouras reiterated that the Government should provide some aid to the country's theatres in the form of 25-year Federal loans for the modernization of present theatres and for the building of new ones.

Although he employed the word "subsidy" and cited the Government's contribution to other businesses "vital to our nation's welfare"—such as agriculture, oil, railroads and shipping—Skouras later told reporters that he merely had loans in mind when it was pointed out to him that Government subsidies usually meant some form of Government control. He emphasized that production did not require any subsidies although in his speech he called attention to the fact that practically every other nation—France, England, Germany, Japan and India—all subsidize their film companies.

While appealing for Government aid in the form of loans to theatres, the 20th prexy at the same time warned against further Government intervention in the film business. "If the small exhibitor—in this ill-advised effort to improve his situation—succeeds in having additional regulations imposed upon the film companies," he asserted, "this may result in such onerous restrictions that our studios will be forced to close and the producing companies will face liquidation." He indicated that this would mean the closing of theatres since the source of supply would be cut off.

Skouras attributed many of the ills of the industry as stemming from the consent decrees. He bemoaned the elimination of block booking, the introduction of competitive bidding, the system of single picture selling, and the quick playoffs that result in pictures going through the market too quickly.

The 20th prexy's harsh comments about Hollywood's creative personnel prompted the aside that as a group, the people he had mentioned represent the highest paid people in any American industry. "Nevertheless," he said, "these highly placed executive and creative talents are frequently guilty of making very little effort to work towards the salvation of our industry."

Without explaining how it would be accomplished, Skouras said that Government subsidation or control, which he would prefer rather than see the liquidation of the industry, "would bring to an abrupt end the fantastically outrageous salaries and the high costs of production that we are subjected to today."

Wald Slams Exploitation Films, Told 'Peyton Place' Pretty Lurid

Miami, Oct. 28.

Producer Jerry Wald bit the hand that fed him and the result was an unscheduled flurry of excitement at an otherwise routine luncheon meeting Friday (24) at the Theatre Owners of America convention here. The luncheon host was American International Pictures, the indie company which specializes in low budget exploitation pictures, which employed the occasion to outline to the exhibitors present its upcoming picture offerings.

After its prexy James H. Nicholson and general counsel and veepee Samuel Z. Arkoff had concluded their pitch, Wald asked if he might be permitted to speak. Permission was granted by the moderator, Sid Markely, v.p. of American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres.

Whereupon Wald proceeded to castigate AIP for the type of pictures it is placing on the market. He appealed to AIP "to lift its horizon." Wald maintained that AIP's product and advertising were injurious to the industry. "It's not the type of pictures on which we can build the market of the future," he declared. "While they may make a few dollars today, they will destroy us tomorrow." Rapping the AIP product for its lack of taste, Wald declared that the Parent Teacher's Assn. of Los Angeles had warned parents to keep their children away from certain AIP pictures, particularly "Hot Rod Gang" and "High School Hellcats." He cited the AIP ads, one of which included a nude and another which said: "The facts about the taboo sororities which give them what they want."

The AIP executives were quick to reply to Wald's blast. Nicholson pointed out that all AIP films had been approved by the production code and that they had received an "A" rating from the Catholic Legion of Decency. "I'd rather send my children to see these pictures," he declared, "than 'God's Little Acre.'"

Arkoff, replying with sarcasm, said he hoped Wald enjoyed the lunch "which we paid for" and declared that there were fewer "connotations" in AIP pictures than in "Peyton Place" and "No Down Payment," two recent Wald productions. Arkoff further noted that AIP "monsters do not drink, smoke or lust." Earlier Nicholson asserted that theatres needed variety in the type of pictures they offered and he deplored the "standardization and snobbishness" that existed in some situations against the AIP product. "This type of snobbishness," he said, "can result in the downfall of the industry." He pointed out that AIP would produce and release 30 pictures in 1959, including four in CinemaScope and color.

F.I.A. Condemns Use Of 'Actors From Life' To Cut Down Prod. Costs

Geneva, Oct. 21.

The problem of preserving actor's rights in the face of rapidly expanding internationalization of films and tele networks was one of the main topics at the just-concluded 5-day assembly of the F.I.A., (International Federation of Actors), held here.

The F.I.A., which groups 29 unions and 50,000 members from 27 nations, also condemned the practice of taking "actors from life" and using them in productions to save money. Delegates claimed this practice was restricted to certain countries but that it created bad precedents and generally damaged the good name of the acting profession.

One French delegate said the French actor's union had already warned its members not to lend their voices to dub such actors-from-life, except in very exceptional circumstances. The assembly also laid its faith in the future of co-productions, which it claimed would tend to raise production standards everywhere and with them, actor's pay.

F.I.A. delegates named Fernand Gravey their new president, with Mexico's Rodolfo Landa veepee for non-European areas and Britain's Gerald Croasdell veepee of the European zone. F.I.A.'s headquarters remains in Paris.

Selling Off Radio City Gear; Film House Organ Goes to Private Villa

Minneapolis, Oct. 28.

The 4,100-seat Radio City last week grossed an estimated $30,000. But it was from the public sale of its elaborate furnishings and art objects, etc., not at the boxoffice.

WCCO, television and radio corporation, which purchased the $3,000,000 showhouse from United Paramount for a still-undisclosed sum, is continuing the sale this week before starting to have the showhouse, the area's biggest and most beautiful, razed.

The theatre's huge organ previously had been sold for $10,000 to a North Dakotan who is having it installed in his home.

A parking lot will replace most of the showhouse. Eventually, however, part of the lot will be utilized for a building to provide quarters for its radio station, now located elsewhere. WCCO's tv station occupies a considerable part of the theatre building.

SPAIN'S OWN DISTRIBS TOP YANK RENTALS

Madrid, Oct. 28.

Spanish film exhibitors are showing mixed feelings to the galaxy of Hollywood product entering the market for the first season after several "boycott" years.

Although showcase operators are eagerly seeking grade A films for their sales, they have found distributor terms are still based on previous scarcity conditions.

Exhibitors have charged in recent weeks that Spanish distribs now accorded American product are demanding up to 70% of the gross, heavy advance guarantees and "intolerable" block-booking commitments that exceed anything ever laid at the doorstep of Yank companies operating in Spain.

One important Barcelona exhibitor, expressing satisfaction that the Motion Picture Export Assn. temporary accord with Spain opened the market again to marquee favorites from America, also expressed fears that the remedy might be more fatal to exhibs than the illness.

Exhibitor Assn. is cautioning its members against ill-considered haste, advising them top-grade Yank product is now plentiful and will be available at normal market terms if exhibs resist distributor terms.

'Wilderness' Hot 10G, Indpls.; 'Deb' Mild 6G

Indianapolis, Oct. 28.

Biz is spotty at first-runs here this stanza. Top newcomer is "White Wilderness," benefited by school vacation for state teachers convention, looms big at Circle. Visiting instructors helped "South Pacific," now in 27th week at Lyric, to get a fancy take. "Reluctant Debutante" is mild at Loew's.

'Search' Mighty 19G Paces Cincy

Cincinnati, Oct. 28.

Preem of "South Seas Adventure" Wednesday (29) dominates this session on Cincy's film front. New Cinerama entry follows successful 46-week run of "Search for Paradise" and has Cincinnati Club sponsorship for opening night. "Man of West," shaping okay at the Albee, is the lone new bill at first-runs. "Gigi" continues sturdy in second week on pop-scale return date. Second week of "Blob" at Grand is fairish. Omaha, Oct. 28.

Opening of the new Cooper Theatre with "South Pacific" is causing the big noise among the downtown first-runs this week. Charity preem Thursday (23) was sold out at $10 per copy, and a trim first stanza looms. School is out this week because of teachers convention, so "Frankenstein 1970" at the Orpheum and "White Wilderness" at the State are enjoying bangup sessions. "Decks Ran Red" is slim at the Brandeis. "Big Country" continues solid at the Omaha, and will probably go three weeks.

Pitt Off But 'Army' Tall 7½G; 'Country' 12G, 3d

Business is mostly down in the dumps again here this round. Only two new pictures downtown, "Gun Runners," which is picking up the Harris slightly, and "Secret Conclave" at Fulton, doing fairly well on its timeliness. It hurt newcomes especially. As might be expected, the long rainy spell boomed biz at nabe houses.

'Onionhead' Wham 16G, Mpls.; 'Vampire' Record $8,000, 'Search' 14G, 35

Minneapolis, Oct. 28.

Helped by big teachers convention and school holiday, biz is taking a sudden jump here. "Onionhead" is a big newcomer while shocker package of "Blood of Vampire"-"Monster on Campus" is biggest UI pic to play the Gopher.

Holdovers still basking in the realm of prosperity include the hard-ticket pix, "Search for Paradise" and "South Pacific" in their 35th and 18th weeks, respectively. UFA EXECS SCOUT U.S. MARKET

Cable-Garble & Stunt-Slump

[MORE RE BRUSSELS 'WON'T-PICK' JURY]

Cablese, always dangerous, produced a nice to-do last issue of VARIETY when the Brussels World's Fair story, page 1, on the failure of the "young" jury to select the all-time greatest motion picture listed "Mother Passion" and "Jeanne d'Arc." As Dolores Ondrejcek of Broadcast Music Inc., and other readers, quickly pointed out, these should have read simply "The Mother" and, separately, "La Passion de Jeanne d'Arc." It made things too neurotic the other way. (Ed.)

Brussels Out-Smarted Itself

Followup comment on the Brussels jury refusal to vote, as impanelled, for a single choice among the 12 nominated films amounts to this: the preliminary sifting done by some 117 film historians in various countries was a case of too many cooks in the kitchen. Brussels would have done better to have had a smaller jury work longer with wider range so that the original would have been the definitive choice.

The whole thing smacked a little at the Manhattan end of a "pipedream" idea strictly for expo's own publicity. The impracticality came exposed when the jury, on the youngish side and taking criticism seriously, declined to string along with the "stunt" on its own terms.

Italo Film Biz On Slow Upbeat

Rome, Oct. 21.

The Italian boxoffice is on a slow but steady upgrade, latest returns indicate. Trend is expected to hold here at least through Christmas and the holidays, traditionally the strongest b.o. period of the year in this country as elsewhere.

Key city first-run leader is still "Bridge on the River Kwai" (Col), with a $150,000 gross registered for the initial Rome exposure alone. Other top-runners, both on extended first-runs, are "Sayonara" (WB) and "A Farewell to Arms" (20th), topping $90,000 and $67,000 respectively so far on their early runs here.

Also in the early money are such Italian entries as "La Sfida" (Lux), "I Solito Ignoti" (Lux); the French-made "Inspector Maigret" (Titanus); "Sad Sack" (Par); and "The Key" (Col).

Taunus Takes Over Last Part of Old UFA Setup By Wiesbaden Plant Buy

Wiesbaden, Oct. 28.

Taunus Film of Germany at last has finalized the deal to buy Unter den Eichen, the Wiesbaden film production studio which is the last part of the old UFA monopoly of film production, distribution and cinema ownership. Under the terms of the Allied agreement, the monopoly was to be broken up through the UFA Liquidation Board. And for a figure given as "something over a million German marks" (more than $250,000), Taunus will take over the film studios Nov. 10. Company expects to resume production at the newly acquired plant early next year.

This means that the entire UFA complex has now been passed on to private hands. Karl Schulz, chief of Taunus Films, says that he will continue his company with the business of renting the studios to other firms and film-producing companies. Afifa, which continues to be the trademark of the Unter den Eichen studios, will keep on as a film production firm.

Included in the deal for Schulz were 20 to 25 old films. And it is possible that Schulz will form a new releasing outfit for distribution of these and the Afifa product.

With the new commercial tele expected in Germany by 1959, it is possible that the studios will make some tie-in for commercial tv film-making as well, according to Schulz. He expects to work out a film-financing arrangement with the county of Hesse similar to those granted film producers in other parts of Germany, with the government guaranteeing or partially underwriting productions.

Arnold Picker and Alfred Katz off for a month's swing of the United Artists offices in the Far East, Australasia and Europe.

ARNOLD PICKER'S ECHELON

Pleskow, Kniel, Meir, Jones in Shift of UA Posts

Eric Pleskow, formerly United Artists' manager in Germany, has been named exec assistant to Mo Rothman, UA's Continental manager, with headquarters in Paris. This was one of a series of changes disclosed in New York last week by Arnold M. Picker, UA's v.p. in charge of foreign distribution.

Eugene C. Kniel, former manager in Switzerland, has succeeded Pleskow in the German post. Promoted to manager in Switzerland is Hans J. Meier, who had been a salesman in Geneva.

Sam Jones, who has been in the Far East on special assignments, has been temporarily named manager in Puerto Rico, succeeding George Kallman, retired.

Lanza's 'First Time' To Rome, Berlin Locations After Delays on Capri

Capri, Oct. 21.

Mario Lanza's current pic, "For The First Time," probably will move on to other locations in Rome and Berlin on schedule despite several difficulties which have arisen since the production moved to this Mediterranean pleasure spot. Besides such natural hazards as the rugged terrain, which make shooting difficult on the isle, plus the swiftly-changing weather and large shadow areas current on the north side of Capri (where pic is shooting), other difficulties have dogged the production.

First off, shooting had to be scheduled around German actress Johanna von Koczian, who could only work three days per week. Remainder of her time was spent in the Berlin repertory theatre. This necessitated a long-distance commuting effort, bi-weekly by plane, auto and boat. Also, Lanza caught cold and lost his voice. This was partly remedied by having him shoot to playbacks and/or for post-synch. The actor defied doc's orders not to appear on set so as not to hold up production.

In addition, director Rudy Mate was shooting "blind" at the start, with Technicolor film processed in London arriving a week late because of transportation difficulties. "For The First Time" is a Corona-Astor co-production for Metro distribution everywhere except in Germany, where Constantin handles it for producer Corona. Also appearing in pic are Zsa Zsa Gabor, Kurt Kasznar, Sandro Giglio and others.

Lanza plans to make five films in the next few years, at least two more to follow close on the heels of the current effort.

Next on the slate would be "Tales of the Vienna Woods," which would probably be entirely lensed in Austria. If current talks jell, actor would receive a flat salary, plus percentage of world gross, plus release rights in certain countries. Another Lanza project is "Granada," to be made entirely in Spain.

PLEASED BY BIDS ON CO-PRODUCING

By FRED HIFT

Two representatives of the German UFA company, which is active in production, distribution and exhibition, said in Manhattan last week they were in the States to evaluate the possibility of future operations in this country. UFA emissaries, on their first trip here, are Heinz H. Lommerzheim, one of the two managing directors of the UFA distribution outfit, and Volker von Collande, head of the UFA television-film production section.

Lommerzheim and Collande said they had been most encouraged by the friendly reaction accorded them by the U.S. film trade "and there is no question that these contacts should be used." However, they maintained, no decision had as yet been made on whether UFA would open its own office here, or whether it would be necessary for the entire German industry to act. Only German representation in the States now is via Munio Podhorzer, the U.S. rep of the Export-Union.

"All the indications we have had point to a greater potential return for our German films in the U.S.," Lommerzheim said. "We have come to study the methods that might be used to realize this potential. Certainly, up till now, the German industry has not done much here, despite the fact that the public definitely seems more interested in European films."

Late to Market

Collande said he was "surprised" by the interest in coproduction that was being shown at the American side, and he was studying U. S. video with a view to learning might be able to fit into the picture via the production of special films. Both German reps observed that the German films had been late in getting into the U.S. market and that this had been due in part to the mentality underlying German production in the postwar years and partly to the postwar resentment of things German in the U.S.

Both Collande and Lommerzheim, on the strength of their first impressions, said they had felt none of that resentment during their current visit. However, those in the business who handle the German product feel that a reaction against German films does exist, particularly in the key cities and among the "art" audiences who tend to be gifted with a better memory than the broad public.

(This impression was first voiced public by Fred Schwartz, prez of Distributors Corp. of America, when he hailed the success of "Captain von Kopenick" some weeks back.)

Lommerzheim said the new UFA in 1958 had produced six pictures of its own and the UFA distribution arm had released a total of 24, including coproductions and pix made for UFA. In 1959, production of the UFA probably will rise to eight or 10 films. UFA studios in Berlin are being expanded and a new music stage already has been built and can also be used as a regular sound stage.

Lommerzheim categorically denied that UFA had, at any time, shown an interest in the Mosaik dubbing studios in Berlin which, under the management of Ernest Wolf, had found themselves in trouble for several years. Mosaik has dubbed most of the American output in Germany. The U.S. companies were tied quite closely to the shifting fortunes of Mosaik and did not appear eager to have the lab change hands. It had been generally assumed that the report of the UFA bid for Mosaik was correct. However, Lommerzheim pointed out that UFA has its own lip-sync studio in Berlin, which is now handling Metro and part of the Columbia United Artists and Walt Disney release.

The two Germans go to the Coast this week to study studio equipment.

Sultan Opens Theatre

Singapore, Oct. 21.

Shaw Bros.' new Rex Cinema, the only postwar house in Kuala Kangsar, opened recently with a charity screening of Shaws' "Sergeant Hassan." The Sultan of Perak officiated at the inaugural ceremonies.

With 902 seats, the Rex reportedly is one of the most modern theatres in Malaya. House has stereophonic sound and a screen 46 ft. by 20 ft. designed to handle any wide-screen projection.

India & Japan Talk Reciprocity

New Delhi, Oct. 21.

Exploitation of Indian films in Japan "on a commercially reciprocal basis" is being explored by A. V. Meiyappan, topper of AVM, major Indian pix production company. Producer is on a four-week Far Eastern tour, centering on Japan, this month (October).

Indio-Nipponese co-production possibilities also are near top of agenda for Meiyappan's talks with Japanese moviemen. Meiyappan was invited to tour country by Shiro Kido, president of Motion Picture Producers Association of Japan.

'Kwai,' '10C's' End Runs Of 32 Wks. Down Under; Low-Scale Films Resume

Sydney, Oct. 21.

With the exit of "Bridge on River Kwai" (Col) and "10 Commandments" (Par) after record runs of 32 weeks each here, run-of-mill pix are bidding for biz somewhat optimistically again in Sydney.

Top exceptions to regular admish pix in this zone are "Around World in 80 Days" (UA), which is hitting a terrific stride in 53d week, and "Gigi" (M-G), still solid in sixth week.

"This Is Cinerama" (Cinerama) has been a disappointment at the 1,100-seat Plaza for Hoyts circuit on a once-nightly policy with three matinees weekly. Biz dropoff, following initial impact, is said to be because of the high admissions (for here) scaled from $3 top.

Hoyts will now introduce a three sessions daily policy at $1.50 or near on a bid to woo the patrons. Cinerama is strong with the males but is not drawing the femmes to any great extent. New policy switch is expected to help.

Current lineup of films here includes "Carve Her Name With Pride" (Rank), "Bravados" (20th), "10 North Frederick" (20th), "Kathy O" (U), "Cry Terror" (M-G), "Teacher's Pet" (Par), "Girls on Loose" (U), "Waterloo Bridge" (M-G) and "Green Dolphin Street" (M-G). Last two are oldies.

Sez 'Kwai' OK in Tokyo

Auckland, N. Z., Oct. 21.

Michael Bergher, Columbia Pictures chief for Far East and Australasia, visited here last week on a tour of his company's Down Under exchanges. Since "Bridge on River Kwai" is showing currently here, the distributor was asked what effect the Jap prisoner-of-war camp scenes in the production had on Japanese audiences in Tokyo.

"'Bridge' has been shown in Japan and it broke boxoffice records there," he said. "The Japanese accepted it as an anti-war film."

London, Oct. 28.

"Cat on a Hot Tin Roof," which established a new house record last week for the Empire with an initial session's gross of $27,000 set the pace among West End first runs last week. General b.o. picture is buoyant. "I Was Monty's Double," a top newcomer is heading for a stout $11,000 in opening round at the Warner. "The Hunters" looks fast $7,500 in its second Carlton frame.

"Barbarian and Geisha" shapes big $8,000 in its initial stanza at the Leicester Square Theatre. "Windjammer" is rated fair in 23rd week.

The blockbusters continue in the big time. "Seven Wonders of World" is still leading with a great $23,800 in its 34th Casino week. "South Pacific" was a smash $19,600 in 26th Dominion round while "Around the World in 80 Days" is great $9,000 in 68th Astoria session.

English Pic Being Made Sans British Actors

London, Oct. 28.

An English film is now being made at Shepperton Studios without a single British star or a supporting artist of English origin. The pic in question is "Subway in the Sky," being made by Orbit Productions. It stars Van Johnson and Hildegarde Neff and features Albert Lieven, Katherine Kath and Cec Linder.

British Lion will distribute the film in the UK, while the newly formed Britannia Films will handle release in the overseas markets.

Contracts Called 'Worthless'

[If Exhib Refuses to Respect Terms]

If there's any revision of the consent decree it should be to allow the distributors to set—and get—a fair price for their merchandise. This involves not making adjustments on terms after a picture has played its date.

Proposition came this week from a high sales executive who preferred (naturally enough) to remain anonymous. He acknowledged that the topic was a sensitive one with exhibitors. (Add explosive.)

"There isn't a company in the business that doesn't have to adjust terms," he said. "It's even done in the bidding situations, though less so. I don't think there's any other business in the world that is run on this basis. You ask a price, it's agreed that it's a fair one, and then you have to back down and make compromises because the exhibitor refuses to pay. I don't think there's a contract today that's worth the paper it's written on."

The executive said he was certain that the Justice Dept. would, sooner or later, have to take cognizance of the situation in the industry and agree to modifications of the decree. "The exhibitors talk about changes to allow circuits to go into production and to permit producers to regain showcases again. That's fine, but it's meant to serve only the purposes of the theatres who say they need more film. The fact is that distribution has a very legitimate beef, and starts with the court-enforced system of runs and clearances."

Beachside Palaver on Consent: Can Films Break Straitjacket?

Miami Beach, Oct. 28.

Informal behind-the-scenes talks between Victor R. Hansen, head of the antitrust division of the Dept. of Justice, and toppers of all five major circuits as well as Theatre Owners of America leaders are reported to have resulted in a hopeful feeling that chances of revising the consent decrees are better than ever.

Hansen's initial announcement to the convention that the Government was maintaining its position against changing the decrees took TOA leaders by surprise. After the first shock had subsided and following informal conversations with the antitrust chief, officials of the exhibitor organization were more optimistic.

Ernest G. Stellings, outgoing prexy of TOA, hosted a private dinner for Hansen at which all the circuit toppers were present. According to one informed source, the aim was to get the company toppers and TOA leaders together with Hansen in an informal atmosphere away from Washington or New York and without the presence of a battery of company and government attorneys.

In a Cabana

An informal three-hour session took place outside an ocean-side cabana at the Americana Hotel. This meeting, although it did not consider specifics, explored the whole question of the consent decrees and had the effect of getting across the position of the Government as well as the exhibitors. Maurice Silverman, who handles the motion picture antitrust cases for the Dept. of Justice, was also an observer throughout the convention and participated in many of the informal conversations.

The result of these talks with Hansen and Silverman created a friendly atmosphere between the Government and TOA, and exhibitor leaders returned to their home bases with the feeling that the chance of obtaining some revisions in the consent decree were not as remote as they seemed earlier in the convention. The hair-down discussion is said to have brought out many points of agreement whereby changes could possibly be made in the decrees without affecting the government's position in enforcing the antitrust acts. Hansen, a guest at the closing banquet, is reported, in effect, to have told the theatremen to submit a program that had the endorsement of the entire industry. On the basis of what it submitted, he would then decide what action could be taken.

Actually, the power to change the decrees is up to the Federal Court which originally promulgated them. However, it's felt, that if the industry could obtain the support of the Dept. of Justice, rather than have the D. of J. oppose it in court, its chances of obtaining revisions are brighter. The Miami Beach tete-a-tete, it's agreed, created a rapport between the antitrust division and TOA. In addition, many points of conflict were ironed out and, on this basis—provided certain preventive restrictions are maintained—it's believed that its possible to obtain permission for the formerly affiliated theatres to enter production with pre-emptive rights for their own theatres.

Company toppers who participated in the informal talks included S. H. (Si) Fabian, Stanley Warner; John Bertero, National Theatres; Leonard Goldenson, American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres; Leopold Friedman, Loew's Theatres, and Sol Schwartz, RKO Theatres.

Hutton Tea-Leafs

information was a factor behind unusually heavy trading in Loew's stock. Total of 262,400 shares exchanged hands last week, with the price winding up unchanged at $22 per share.

Significantly, the volume continued heavy even after the denials of the special divvy.

Financial theorists in the downtown area have it figured that there was some basis for the Hutton report—enough basis to warrant the stock activity. One source said he suspects that some time in the not-too-distant future there's to be a major unloading of Loew's properties and the proceeds could amount to $10 to $15 per share, or a total gross of $50,000,000 to $75,000,000.

This source said he accepts the pledge of both the Vogel and Green-Newman sides that there will be no liquidation. The picture making, distributing and exhibition branches of the corporation all will be continued.

But, regardless of which division is spun off in line with the antitrust decree, said the Wall Streeter, it looks likely that Culver City real estate will go on the block, along with certain theatre properties and the post-1948 backlog of 250 features.

It was said that a deal similar to the one being negotiated by Universal (with Music Corp. of America) might be worked out. Under this type of arrangement, the M-G lot would be sold and then, in part at least, leased back to the company for the continuation of its film-making activities.

Vogel said there's no chance of a merger with another film company; the Government wouldn't permit it. But he also said that another company (unidentified but probably 20th-Fox) had been invited to make its pictures at Culver City on a share-the-overhead basis.

Nothing happened with the proposal but it did come as additional evidence (if any were needed) that Metro does not need such extensive and expensive studio property and facilities.

Loew's earnings currently and in immediate prospect would hardly be a Stock Market stimulant. Consequently, it appears that actually behind the hefty trading is the circulation of reports about the divestiture of assets as outlined. And among the buyers, it's further said, are several well-heeled Wall Streeters on the Green-Newman side.

Dept. of Justice's Open-Ears To Ideas But No Return To 'Favored Theatres'

Miami Beach, Oct. 28.

The Dept. of Justice, for the time being at least, is sticking to its guns and is maintaining its position that it is opposed to the entry into production and distribution by the divorced circuits on the basis of preemptive rights. This was made clear last week by Victor R. Hansen, assistant U.S. Attorney General in charge of the antitrust division, who outlined his department's position to the Theatre Owners of America convention here.

Hansen, former California State Supreme Court judge, took this stand in the face of increasing pressure by exhibitor groups, particularly TOA, for revision of the consent decrees stemming from the U.S. vs. Paramount case so that the formerly-affiliated circuits could launch a production program to alleviate the serious product shortage that has confronted the industry for the past several years.

However, Hansen—displaying an acute understanding of the problems facing the film business—did not completely shut the door to the request by exhibitors for permission for the divorced circuits to produce and distribute pictures on a premptive basis. "It do not say we will go for it," he declared. "But I do say that the opportunity to convince us that we should is still there."

TOA lost no opportunity to press its convincing campaign. It had members ready to reply to Hansen's stand and to present its pitch as strongly as possible. The answers came from S. H. (Si) Fabian, president of Stanley Warner, whose circuit undoubtedly would launch a production program if D. of J. approval were received, and from Sumner M. Redstone, a young Boston independent exhibitor. The objective apparently was to present the points of view of both large and small exhibitors.

Product Shortage

Fabian said TOA was encouraged by Hansen's statement that his department's door is open and alerted the antitrust division topper to the fact that "we are going to accept your invitation." He stressed that the ground rules under which the film industry is forced to operate presently serves "to perpetuate and even aggravate the existing product shortage. Thus we are prevented from effectively meeting the competition of tv, our biggest competitor. In brief, all that we ask is an equal opportunity to compete effectively in the entertainment world. We simply must with the Department's help find a way to accomplish this objective."

The brunt of TOA's presentation was made by Redstone, who looks like a young man with a future in the TOA echelon. He set forth the views of the small theatre exhibitors on the subject of the consent decrees. He contended that on the basis of a forum held at the convention, the small theatremen agreed that the real disease afflicting the industry had it source in the decrees of the Federal Court in the U.S. vs. Paramount case.

"Do you think for one moment," he asked, "that we would have the poverty of motion pictures available for exhibition which confronts us today if producers of motion pictures had a vast stake in motion picture theatres throughout the United States?" He said the film business was also in the unique position in American industrial life "where, exhibitors, as suppliers of a product to the public, are restricted from correcting inadequacies of that supply by producing it themselves."

Redstone added that "the once monumental problems of monopoly and discrimination have now become mole hills among the dynamic problems which face motion picture exhibition today." He said he might agree that the relief obtained by the Government "was appropriate at that time," but, he noted, "must we live under the full impact of those decrees forever" notwithstanding the changes that have taken place in the industry. Exhibitors are not asking the Government to condone antitrust violations, but they were asking the Dept. of Justice to take into consideration the changes that have taken place and to interpret the antitrust laws.

Hansen's nix was based on the "no" reply the antitrust division had given National Theatres on March 14, 1958 which was, he said, "because the direction in which the proposal pointed was back to a system of favored theatres which had led to the Paramount case in the first place." Hansen maintained that a proposal to produce and distribute pictures without preemptive rights would by no means be free of difficulty. He said his department would have to consider whether free competitive access to the exhibition markets on the part of the present producer-distributors is likely to be seriously impeded. Then, he added, there's the problem of how to prevent preemption even though it is not theoretically permitted. He noted, for example, that a circuit bidding for its own product could afford to make the best business proposal, "for what it would lose as an exhibitor it would make up as a producer-distributor."

Dept. Not 'Lax'

In an apparent answer to Allied States Assn.'s charges about the laxity of the antitrust division in enforcing the decrees, Hansen stated that the judgments entered in the Paramount case "have received more continuous attention on the part of the division than the judgments entered in connection with any other case or any other industry." He emphasized that his department's efforts in the film industry "have always been considerable and probably more than proportionate."

Hansen called attention to public complaints that too many theatres, particularly in metropolitan areas, play the same pictures at the same time. Yet, he stated, his department is frequently "urged by exhibitors to follow a course which would perpetuate this very thing."

He said the objective of the antitrust division was to safeguard the right of all to compete and also to consider the interest of the public as consumers. No industry, he said, can lose about half of its market without some people getting hurt. "We should all do what we can to keep down the number getting hurt; but primarily the industry must do this for itself. Where we see a way of helping and it is proper to, we will."

He said the antitrust divivision has been willing to listen to all proposals from the industry, and where it has been possible "to encourage a constructive proposal, we have done so." He cited his department aid giving an opportunity for the development of Cinerama, Cine-Miracle and Todd-AO.

The antitrust chief said the mere entry of a circuit into production will not solve the problems of the industry. Only if the circuit can make pix that mean something at the boxoffice, he noted, is it going to help. And he called attention to the fact that the circuit will start with the handicap of facing the established producer-distributor "which has an accumulation of years of know-how."

In concluding, Hansen stated that his department is willing to listen to any industry problem "with sympathetic understanding."

TOOTS FROM TOA

And Screen Glamor, Too

Convention had glamor present, Deborah Kerr being there to accept the "Star of the Year" award, Robert Wagner and Natalie Wood to plug 20th's "In Love and War," John Gavin to beat the drums for Universal's upcoming "Imitation of Life," and Jacques Tati to bally the French import, "Mon Oncle."

Winners of Awards

TOA awards for service to the organization went to Albert M. Pickus, Sam Rosen and Mitchell Wolfson. General counsel Herman M. Levy made the presentations.

Not Always the Case

Al Floersheimer Jr. rates a bow for his great job in handling the press relations aspect of the convention. From the standpoint of the press, no previous exhibitor meeting has been so well organized.

Honeymooning Hiatus

UA pub-ad chief Roger Lewis, just married to actress Lisa Daniels, interrupted his honeymoon to give exhibs some pointers on the selling pix. However, Mrs. Lewis, who hails from Birmingham, England, got her first look at Miami Beach.

Mrs. Twyman Ties 'Em

Distaff hit of the convention was Mrs. Margaret Twyman, director of community relations of the Motion Picture Assn. of America. Mrs. Twyman, a svelte, attractive blonde, presented the women's angle on the selling of pix. She's the first femme to serve as a panelist at an exhib convention.

Some Politician!

TOA is still trying to figure out Gov. A. B. (Happy) Chandler of Kentucky. Via TOA's Kentucky unit, Chandler asked to be invited as a speaker. He was scheduled to address a luncheon meeting and he was listed on the official program. After the program was printed, Chandler wrote TOA to beg off, noting that he couldn't accept the organization's invitation because of a prior commitment.

Next Year: Chicago.

See Randforce, UA, Skouras Merger

Committee studying merger aspects of United Artists Theatres with Randforce and Skouras Theatres is currently bringing its report up-to-date. Way for a merger was cleared with the settlement of the RKO Theatres suit vs. UA Theatres and acquisition of the RKO Theatres interest in Metropolitan Playhouses by the UA circuit. Metropolitan, now owned by UA Theatres, combines Randforce and Skouras.

In some respects, the merger already is in effect via combination of booking arrangements, accounting, legal, etc. Merger study group consists of three men.

Rank's Odeon Stage-End Blown Out In Ottawa

Ottawa, Oct. 28.

The mysterious explosion that wrecked three city blocks here last week and sent 40 people to hospitals tore the entire stage end out of J. Arthur Rank Organization's Odeon. Since the blast struck at 8:20 a.m., the house was empty and no staffers were injured.

The 1,500-seater Odeon had a cuffo moppet show, for city school patrols, set for 10 a.m. which was expected to bring capacity. Where the Odeon's big stage and screen assembly stood is today a gigantic hole to outdoors.

Another moppet free show was scheduled for 11 a.m. at the Capitol, two blocks away. Police removed more than 2,000 Cubs and Scouts before the show began, as a precaution.

The humorist emphasized "Malice"—seemingly as a play on the word. Would it be "an attack or a satire"? Perelman hoped "it will embody the 'affection' for that place in the 11 years I worked there." When Garroway commented that Perelman "writes like Groucho Marx talks," the author replied he had been associated with the comedian for sometime, and liked him "despite this."

Ernest G. Stellings, Theatre Owners of America prexy, categorically denied today that his group had intended to name Elizabeth Taylor its star of the year and passed the kudos to Deborah Kerr because of Eddie Fisher publicity involving Miss Taylor. Without mentioning latter by name, Stellings said in a telegram to Miss Kerr that "there is absolutely no truth" to news stories" concerning your selection as our star of the year. "I want to personally and officially advise you that you were always our only choice for the award."

American Ticket Corp., Chicago, celebrated its 25th anniversary last week by selling 100,000 ducats to the Paramount Theatre, Cedar Rapids, for the price the house paid a quarter of a century ago when it was American's first customer.

Attention Rank Organization: the CBS "Late Show" yesterday (Tues.) televised a 1942 feature with Loretta Young titled "Night to Remember." That's the same title as the Rank film due to open on Broadway in December on a two-a-day basis . . . "Small World," the Edward R. READE CORP. FURTHER DIVERSIFIES—A CAFE

Paramus, N.J., Oct. 28.

Walter Reade Inc., originally a theatre chain which later acquired extensive interests in other fields, continues its diversification Sunday (2) when it formally opens its Continental restaurant here in Garden State Plaza, one of the largest shopping centres in the country.

Divided in three rooms, spot will have a total seating capacity of 400. Decor for the eatery was done by Morris Lapidus who designed the Eden Roc and Americana hotels in Miami Beach. Viktor Hatschier, formerly associated with the Savoy in London, is general manager.

Reade firm, which operates more than 40 conventional and drive-in theatres in New York and New Jersey, set up a catering division several years ago. It now runs restaurants in race tracks, legit theatres, kiddie parks and along Jersey's Garden State Parkway.

Luncheon to Laurel Coyne For Tax-Cut Lobbying

Salute to Coyne is in acknowledgement of his successful helming of the recent admissions tax campaign.

Arrangements committee for the luncheon comprises Martin Levine (chairman), Philip Harling (treasurer), Abe Montague, Solomon Strausberg and Irving Dollinger.

Denver Post's Giveaway-In-Theatres On Tail of Screenbill, Showbill

Miami Beach, Oct. 28.

A new national motion picture magazine, to be distributed free in theatres throughout the country, loomed strongly on the horizon as a result of the unanimous endorsement of the project by Theatre Owners of America at its convention here. The magazine, titled Movie Parade, would be published by the Denver Post. The offer of the Denver newspaper to edit and print the publication was presented to the convention by Robert W. Selig, head of Fox Intermountain Theatres.

According to Selig, the magazine, the size of a tabloid Sunday supplement, would be published monthly. It will run 16 to 20 pages initially and will be a four-color job. The Denver Post, it was noted, would solicit the national advertising for the publication. It's anticipated that 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 copies will be distributed monthly in theatres throughout the U.S. Exhibtors would receive the magazine free, paying only for the freight and handling charges. The publication is the third to be announced by different groups in recent months, the others being Screenbill and Showbill.

George Kerasotes, TOA prexy, appointed Selig, chairman, and M B. Smith, of Kansas City, as a committee to assist the Denver Post in establishing the publication. An invitation will be extended to Charles Simonelli, chairman of the pub-ad committee of the Motion Picture Assn. of America, to serve with the committee. It was stressed that the publication will not be limited to TOA members, but would be made available to all exhibitors in the U.S.

Producer Jerry Wald, who was present at the TOA convention, said he would recommend to the Motion Picture Industry Council, of which he is prexy, to lend full support to the publication.

A 12-page sample copy of the magazine was distributed at the convention. Profusely illustrated with photographs of stars and scenes from pictures, its theme appeared to be the selling of upcoming pictures from the point of view of the film patron.

Right to Work

Bradley, chairman of the Citizens to Defeat State Issue 2.

Called "objectionable" by the Rev. T. C. Whitehouse, the Rev. John P. Adams, and the Rev. Elford Hoff, according to Bradley, were a series of 20-second and one-minute shorts clipped from "Showdown" a Cecil B. DeMille 15-minute tv movie aired as paid advertisement by "right-to-work" sponsors.

Substitute spots were used replacing "Showdown" scenes where paid actors, according to Bradley, staged incidents where a house was bombed, a car turned over by rioters. Station officials termed the scenes "inflammatory and in dreadful taste."

In another incident, Jack McGinty, executive assistant to the secretary of the AFL-CIO here, refused to cross an AFTRA picket line at WSRS to present labor's views in a "phone question-answer period."

Frisco's Nix, Too

San Francisco, Oct. 28.

Four Frisco network stations, KLX, Oakland, and KCRA and KXOA, Sacramento, last week refused to broadcast political spots because they contained the false claim that the State P-TA had endorsed a State proposition which, if it passes, will tax California private and parochial schools.

Hassle started after a Protestant group opposing the proposition heard spots claiming the P-TA was urging a "yes" vote. Protestant group got the State P-TA president to wire all radio stations saying P-TA was neutral and station managers bumped spots.

KCBS and ABC's o-and-o KGO said Roche-Eckoff & Lee, agency representing the proposition's proponents, had agreed to edit out P-TA reference. KNBC and MBS' KFRC edited out offensive reference themselves until revised spots arrived, and the Oakland and Sacramento stations pulled off the spots until new spots arrived.

Red As In Flop

screen, and some of these films did very well and got wide publicity.

Sensing the public's attitude Hollywood hasn't gone in much for pix about the Communists. When it has—as in the case of "Man on a Tightrope," generally considered a good film—the b.o. response has been disappointing.

One of the worst flops dealing with the topic of the Reds in the U. S. was Helen Hayes-starrer, "My Son, John," which got roasted by the critics and was a total failure with the public. However, there have been other films, with a more valid theme—like the one about Cardinal Mindszenty, "Guilty of Treason," which also faired.

An "intellectual" pic dealing with brainwashing—Alec Guinness' "The Prisoner"—which did very well in Europe and won critical acclaim in N. Y., failed to make any mark at the American b.o. despite Guinness' popularity.

There are those who say that, because it cannot afford to make an objective picture about Communism, Hollywood must automatically turn to propaganda, which in turn doesn't sit well with the general public. Others maintain that audiences are so saturated with the subject of the Russians in the newspapers, on tv, etc. that they don't enjoy sitting through a dramatized version of it all in the theatres.

There is a small group of individuals who feel that the way to treat with Communism on the screen was indicated in the hugely successful "Ninotchka," starring Greta Garbo, i.e. that laughter is the most effective method of neutralizing Communism's grimmer aspects. But to do comedy-satire of that sort is difficult, and Americans are daily growing more conscious that the Reds are nothing to laugh at.

Bureau of Missing Business

Scowling Concertmasters

By ROBERT J. LANDRY

The second-generation operator of a chain of film theatres has had coin-operated telephones installed in all his managers' offices. When it was suggested that this kicked managerial dignity and prestige in the shins, put the house operator on untrusted clerical status, the answer was a shrug for the "morale" and a brag for the money saved. Stated that way, the claimed $30,000 annual economy for the circuit was money in the bank, business cunning, astute supervision and pretty smart. Maybe it was. Who's arguing? But perhaps it was in keeping with the circuit's attitude that this same heir-apparent said, when invited to attend a preview, "Oh, movies bore me!"

It's not exactly news that there are so-called film showmen who feel personally about features films like the proverbial concertmaster of the symphony who always made such horrible faces while rehearsing because, as he explained, he hated music so much.

There are, of course, wonderfully alert and resourceful theatre managers (and circuit owners) but unfortunately the locked-telephone brand of efficiency too often nowadays goes with locked broom closets, messy premises, disgruntled managers who feel about as important as they are made, or allowed, to feel.

This thing is a dog-chasing-it's-own-tail circle. Shabby makes shabby, bored owners make bored underlings, and he who's contemptuous of what he's trying to sell, seldom shines at selling it.

There are too many theatres operated by guys who are minding the store but not sold on the merchandise.

Force-Draught Behind 'B's'

New accent on the independents has publicists complaining that a lot of effort is being wasted on secondary films. Said one last week: "Some of our 'B' films get more attention than certain 'A' simply because an important producer is involved and the studio's wooing him."

Situation has become commonplace at most of the companies. Having to put up with the independents, whom they may finance, but who still have a good deal of say-so and who may own properties which a studio wants, effort is made to please them and to keep 'em happy. This becomes most obvious at the publicity level.

"It's impossible to make the same, concentrated effort on every picture," an ad-pub man at one of the companies complained this week. "Logically, with reduced staffs, we should work on the big films, where you can sink your teeth in and produce results. But the producer who makes a small picture for my company, and who plans a real big one next year, insists that his little exploitation release get top attention. And because the studio is eager to keep the producer happy, he gets his way. It doesn't help his picture much, and it detracts from efforts on other, more important releases."

What this implies, too, say the exploitation experts, is that there's neither the time nor the inclination to make with some new music in the field. The same old stunts are used over and over again, with no one quite certain of their exact relationship to the eventual performance of the film at the boxoffice. Main idea is to get "space," which in turn keeps the boss happy.

Unlike other industries, the film business doesn't have the vaguest notion of whether or to which extent its promotional efforts pay off. No study is ever conducted to find out, and the pre-testing of ad campaigns is comparatively rare. Some of the stunts, which imaginative in content, are pretty remote from the actual film. For instance, Columbia Pictures arranged a big torchlight parade for "The Last Hurrah" in N. Y. and it plastered Boston with "Vote for Skeffington" posters. The newspapers responded properly, but the question still remained: How many people went to see the film as a result?

This Could Help Business

Sydney, Oct. 21.

The police of this Australian metropolis have taken a stout line against the local variety of hoodlums who, like their American counterparts in the art of dilinquency, often ruin the fun for the adults in the audience. Three youthful apprentices in mayhem who assaulted a theatre manager attempting to calm them down have been tagged for the next 18 months in the lock-up.

(Ushers thrown downstairs some years ago at the Paramount in N.Y. may perhaps derive a small vicarious satisfaction from the above execution of justice.—Ed.)

The opinion is expressed among Anzac film showmen that many neighborhood cinemas create restlessness in the young by over-loading the program. Not uncommon are two features, newsreel, cartoon, four trailers. Remember, too, that here advertising reels are commonplace, so they're on top of all. (And for about 30c, U. S. equivalent.)

Theatre's Hallow'een Stunts

Dallas, Oct. 28.

Village Theatre is planning a special Halloween party starting at 5 p.m. on Friday (31). The theatre will have tricks and treats for all and "monsters" will appear in person. The feature of the early spook show, which will be over in time for the youngsters to do their customery trick or treat visiting, will be "Abbott and Costello Meet The Mummy."

In addition to the Vilage's early show, the Lakewood and Inwood Theatres will present a special Halloween show at 11:30 p.m. A double bill of horror, "The Blood of Dracula" and "I Was a Teenage Frankenstein," will be presented.

Apple-Bobbing on Parking Lot

San Antonio, Oct. 28.

Josephine Theatre and KAKI will stage an old-fashioned apple-bobbing contest in the parking area of the theatre on Halloween night.

The disk jockeys of KAKI will stage the contest.

Reorganize Discount Plan

Detroit, Oct. 28.

Dillon Krepps, manager of the United Artists Theatre, has hit upon a ticket discount plan for business and industrial firm employees which is hypoing boxoffice action for "South Pacific" now in its 29th week at the 1,667-seater.

Krepps reported that he found the "usual" procedure of posting notice of discount tickets on company bulletin boards was proving unproductive. The ticket orders usually were taken by someone at the company who was either uninterested, too busy, or inept, and the whole procedure got bogged down as a result.

So, he devised an 11-inch-long-by-four-inch-wide ticket order blank. The blanks are left in quantity in the bulletin board area for interested individuals to fill out and mail back to Krepps. The ticket orders headline in bold type a special 25% discount for Such & Such Company, giving the offer an individualized quality. Other information on the ticket orders include special show dates and times for that particular firm, expiration date of the offer, a scale of prices showing regular and discount prices, blanks for filing in number of tickets wanted, name and address of buyer and whether tickets are to be held at boxoffice or mailed. If latter, self-addressed stamped envelope must be enclosed.

"The plan is working much better than the old method," Krepps said. "Since we began using the ticket order blanks, business has taken an upturn, giving "South Pacific" a new lease on life at the United Artists."

Anyone For Homicide?

Among the tieups Columbia has going for "Anatomy of a Murder" is one with station KDKA, Pittsburgh.

Listeners are being invited to write letters on "How I Would Commit a Murder."

The Spread of Culture

Singapore, Oct. 21.

Shaw Bros. assert the following actually happened at its Capitol Theatre here: A woman in the audience at the premiere showing of "Horror of Dracula" let out a piercing shriek and stumbled in the aisle in a "dead faint."

St. John's and Red Cross ambulance men, routine lobby gimmicks when horror films are screened, ran forward and carried the casualty out of the auditorium. Shaws emphasize the incident got a good play the next day in the local press.

'Gigi' Needs Plenty of Sell

Arthur Freed's production of "Gigi" is running into problems despite the hefty applause given the musical by the public (at the boxoffice) and the critics. It's clearly a big money-maker, that's for sure, but nonetheless some difficulties have been encountered.

"Gigi" domestically has been smash so far on both Coasts and in various other key areas. In contrast, business has been just okay in the middle west and the south. In both these territories the three stars of "Gigi"—Leslie Caron, Maurice Chevalier and Louis Jordan—are regarded as "foreigners" and the native Americans aren't buying so enthusiastically.

Foreign-wise, the Freed entry has opened with marked strength in English-speaking countries. But for other nations special work was required.

Chevalier's voice is so familiar throughout Europe that no one else's larynx would be accepted on the sound track. As a result, special lyrics to the music had to be written in Italian, French and Spanish and Chevalier then did his own dubbing in these tongues.

Students' Special Price

Kansas City, Oct. 28.

Trend toward a separate admission rate for students has gained some momentum here. Maurice Druker, manager, Loew's Midland Theatre, states his house will go along on the basis recently initated by Fox Midwest Theatres. Druker, however, is selling no identification card or requiring any qualifications other than visible proof that the would-be ticket buyer is a high school or college student.

Fox Midwest a few weeks ago began selling a student's card at $1, including one free admission to the theatre, and has a few thousand already in circulation. It generally admits the holder to a theatre admission at about 15c under the adult admission, but is not effective on all attractions.

Theatres of the Fulton circuit in Kansas City, Kansas, also have decided to go along at the Fox rates. But other downtown houses in Missouri are not yet observing the policy, notably the Paramount.

TOA and the Soft (Drink) Sell

Miami, Oct. 28.

The Theatre Owners of America convention here last week was as much a Battle of the Bottlers as a powwow in which the big and little cinema tycoons belabored television in general, pix-to-tv in particular, the consent decree, clearances, sub-runs, bidding, upped percentages, ad infinitum.

While the theatreowners were grappling with their problems and grimly hoping their boxoffice would accelerate, the soft drink crowd, et al., were stealing the scene by making with the showmanship.

It looked as if the hats had been switched. While the theatre operators were busy with their speeches and board sessions, sans benefit of marquees, the caterers to the industry were busy providing glamour. It was a polite push full of sparkle and effervescence.

The chief rivals were Coca-Cola and Pepsi-Cola. It was a fluid situation which seemed to end in a dead heat although some observers saw Pepsi winning by a bottle cap.

Pepsi's barbecue soiree spread out on the huge patios of the Americana Hotel all around the lagoon (by day, a swimpool). The band played, the diving clowns scored with their capers, Miss America was introduced for a quickie hello and victuals were served in gigantic quantities.

If this setting had been seen in a picture, the customers wouldn't believe it. But here was Pepsi, a mere drink-giver, doing a fancy location on the American Riviera. One astute observer said that there should have been a camera on this party to shoot stock footage. The outsized shindig was preceded by a cocktail party on the terrace overlooking the patios. At the tables, the star spot was given to bottles of Pepsi.

The Coke people had their night by sponsoring the finale President's Party with Deborah Kerr as "Star of the Year." A master stroke was much in unseen evidence here. Not a single Coke graced any of the 100 or so tables—an example of good taste in hidden persuasion that was not lost on the diners.

There were a load of other "sponsored" parties, luncheons, etc., with caterers, a film company (American International Pictures) and suppliers footing the bill.

From the looks of things, especially and including the trade show under the aegis of the National Assn. of Concessionaires, the suppliers' midway was equally as important as the convention proper. Case of the tail wagging the dog?

Some Pumpkins

Asbury Park, N.J., Oct. 28.

There's nothing like diversification, Walter Reade Inc. contends. Long operator of a chain of theatres, it moved into the restaurant and motel business several years ago.

Now it's vending fruit and vegetables from service areas adjacent to its restaurants on the Garden State Parkway in Manasquan and Forked River.

Cider, honey or pumpkins anyone?

Bill Perlberg on Boxoffice Values Of Broadway Legit Vs. Pictures

By ABEL GREEN

William Perlberg who, with George Seaton, was in Gotham last week on business, including an o.o. of "The Pleasure of His Company" which opened (to solid notices) on Broadway at the Longacre Theatre —they own the film rights on a pre-production deal—has some thought on the exhibitors' constant griping and the spiraling film costs.

Utilizing the Samuel Taylor-Cornelia Otis Skinner script, Perlberg cites the difference between the legit public and the filmgoing public. The Broadway audiences, admittedly more selective than the average film fan, will pay $6.90 top for a competent-cast play, or even a play with unknowns, but the film fans want top marquee names. He cites Cyril Ritchard vis-a-vis Cary Grant, to prove his point.

Ritchard created the role in the Taylor-Skinner play, he staged it (and virtually every critic kudosed him for the legit production direction), he costars with Miss Skinner, and the support includes Walter Abel and Charles Ruggles, and yet, complains Perlberg, "the exhibitors will tell me never mind Ritchard, a fine competent trouper, and 'insure' it with somebody like Cary Grant or William Holden.

"I say no. No. 1, if the play is that good, and as you now know by the reviews it's really the first real click of the new legit season, why gild the lily? No. 2, what happens if we do engage a name of that potent marquee power who gets $350,000 to $500,000 a picture against 10% of the gross; you know that must put a bigger burden on all concerned. Somebody's got to pay. Eventually it's the public. The exhibitor is the middle-man between us and the public, so he's got to pay higher terms. Yet the exhibitor will fight us on this logic, he'll want to know 'what have you got in the cast?', and it's the same old ratrace all over again."

"Maybe, for a change, let the exhibitor find a solution to some of our problems. The theatre men haven't a copyright on 'em; Hollywood has its woes—plenty.

"We're trying to cope with them somehow. For one thing George and I (Perlberg-Seaton Productions, via Paramount release) will start to sign up players again. We all have to. It's silly to sit back and shop for a name, and then have to give away the works. We have had four scripts that we have had to sit on because we couldn't cast 'em. When we do, the agents have invented a new thing—after seven years the negative reverts to the star, so they can sell it to television.

"Let's emulate the Broadway pattern and build up good players for our own benefit. I have to wait until Sept. 15, 1959 before I can get Tony Curtis for Garson Kanin's 'The Rat Race,' for example. That's because of the one-picture deals. Now we've got Gable for one and Paramount has a commitment for two. I have to wait till 1960 before Cary Grant is free for us.

"Let the star have story approval. They're all smart and have smart people surrounding them, like their agents or business managers, and their judgment on a script is valuable too. That was oldhat about ignoring the star or fluffing him off if he or she did'nt like a part; it's good business to insure both the player and the picture with a strong script.

"Now take the exhibitors' inadequacies and wanting the package delivered on a built-in boxoffice basis. I'll give you a for instance. I know an exhibitor on the Coast, who could only agree with me that some inept drive-in manager just wasn't using elementary values when he had a readymade package with 'Kings Go Forth.' You know how big a drive-in marquee is—you can virtually spell out the plot on some of them, which are a block wide, but all this character had was Frank Sinatra in 'The Kings Go Fourth' billed. Nothing about Tony Curtis, who also gets 10% of any picture deal, so you know he's hot. Nary a word that Natalie Wood, currently a teenagers' favorite, is in the cast; nothing but Sinatra! The owner was sore, too, and thanked me, but he's as much to blame as the no-brains guy on the local scene."

Money—And Energy

Memphis, Oct. 28.

Penny-Pinching

ties to worry about, their way could upset the entire economic pattern of film-making.

At Metro, streamlining measures taken over the past couple of years have reduced the annual overhead by $8,000,000. This is tall money in anybody's language. And the saving came about, in large part, via the pressures put on management by the big stockholders.

It is asked, why wasn't this trimming done years ago? The answer to this is that the stockholders lacked either the power, or the will to exercise the power, to force such economy, said one downtowner.

As for possible changes in the production trends, voices heard in the Stock Market district are hostile to the participation deals, as well as other fiscal aspects of picture-making.

One film company recently disclosed some grosses on product in release and the figures on the surface were highly impressive. A Wall Streeter noted this, but added scornfully that 50-to-75% of the profits go to individuals, such as producers, stars and directors.

"This is the film industry's way of doing things, I know," said the non-industry source. "And it doesn't make sense."

He went on: "These people want the profits but take none of the risks. They make pictures with the company's money, share in the net but don't share in the loss."

It's to be noted, of course, that execs in the film business themselves have a distaste for percentage deals but accept them as sometimes the only means of securing top talent, which is limited. And right here Wall Streeters may have a "blind spot."

The Wall Streeters at the present time can't do much beyond verbally rebelling at the participation tactics, plus the film execs' acceptance of same. But the more authority they acquire, the more of a chance they have to force their will on the industry. It seems reasonable to assume that departures from that old status quo can be looked for in the future.

SAM SPIEGEL SETS TWO

Tennessee Williams May Do Own Screenplay—Foote's 'Chase' On

Independent producer Sam Spiegel, whose "Bridge on the River Kwai" is one of the year's kingsized money makers, left New York for London over the past weekend after wrapping up the rights to "Suddenly Last Summer," short play by Tennessee Williams, which was presented off Broadway last season.

Film-maker also conferred with execs at Col, which will finance and distribute. It's understood Williams will work on the screenplay, as part of the deal.

Spiegel also has rights to "The Chase," novel and play by Horton Foot. No decision as to which comes first on his film production schedule.

Met Opera's Rah For Renata

up the performance on Tebaldi's first entrance, slimmed down and in regal purple, but she began singing over the tumult. Later in the second act she gave the customers what they clearly needed emotionally—a chance to shout and applaud at the finish of a superb aria. Then truly the proceedings were halted. There were three separate waves of reaction—clearly the high point of an otherwise rather dull "Tosca." (Dimitri Metropoulos conducted.)

Tosca

Metropolitan Opera opening performance, Oct. 27, '58. Giamcomo Puccini's music; libretto by Victorien Sardou, Luigi Illica. Giuseppe Giasosa. Conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. Staged by Dino Yannopoulos. Sets by Frederick Fox. Top $40.

Floria Tosca ..... Renata Tebaldi
Mario Cavaradossi ..... Mario Del Monaco
Baron Scarpia ..... George London
Cesare Angelotti ..... Clifford Harvout
Sacristan ..... Fernando Corena
Spoletta ..... Alessio De Paolis
Sciarrone ..... George Cehanovsky
Jailer ..... Louis Sgarro
Shephard ..... Peter Burke

Mario del Monaco, the stubborn calliope of the Met tenors, again absolutely refused to stay in character. Del Monaco, one of the great voices of the generation, simply has no understanding of, or perhaps respect for, any limitation, in the interest of story and situation, upon his lion's roar. The directions may call for a romantic hush but this tenor is, like Babe Ruth, out for a home run every time.

Nor was George London, the third big name of the evening's cast, as dramatically sinister a Baron Scarpia or as full-colored in voice as on previous occasions. 'Twas he who sang the title role of "Eugene Onegin" at the 1957 opening night.

"Tosca" is a bread-and-butter opera, standard at the Met since 1901, but not much of an opener with the old scenery. How smart it was for Tebaldi to chose to sing it, in the recent remembrance of Callas in the same role, will undoubtedly be a theme of conversation. This may be close to the essential values of the inevitable, if invidious, contrast:

(1) Tebaldi won on voice.
(2) Callas was a no-contest victor on acting.
(3) Their respective dressmakers were a tie.

The Met this fall has been playing down the Tebaldi-Callas rivalry (two divas will overlap for some weeks later in season) and playing up its Diamond Jubilee, this being the start of the 74th season. One way and another, whether it calls for maestro Bing to impersonate a Schraffts coffee wagon at the queue or digging in the archives, the Met rolls up a staggering volume of free space.

Nostalgia, too, is playing into its hand, now that the idea of the eventual move to the Lincoln Square Performing arts center is seeded. They'll be weeping for those yellow bricks in the next few years.

Hail Codys' 35th Anni

Montpelier, Vt., Oct. 28.

More than 400 relatives and friends from five states and Canada attended a party held by the Brown Derby here in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Richard M. Cody, who were observing their 35th wedding anniversary.

Cody and his four sons, Robert, Rayden, Conrad and Donald, operate a chain of film theatres, including the Strong in Burlington and two drive-in theatres, Twin City and Moonlight, on the Barre-Montpelier road.

Hazards of Opera

Apropos a souvenir hound stealing Maria Callas' pet footstool from the concert hall stage in Atlanta recently, and the to-do in getting it back, the Met's Francis Robinson recalls the senseless theft by a music student of the conductor's score for "Aida," which caused the Met endless trouble and was absolutely without value to anybody.

Robinson also speculates that perhaps in some cloistered hall at Harvard some of the mysteriously missing armor from a long-ago visit to Boston of "Tannhauser" may still be part of the scholastic setting.

REVIVAL BRINGS NAB

Bank Night Jams N.O., Exhib on 'Lottery'

New Orleans, Oct. 28.

The manager of the Palace, film house here, revived bank night and landed in the clink Friday (24). First district police booked him with operating a lottery and being a lottery agent. He is James Beard.

Police entered the theatre at 10 p.m. and arrested Beard after they said he called out numbers that would have entitled persons present to win cash prizes of $100 and $50.

This is the first such arrest in many years, say police. Bank night was banned by city authorities after it was ruled that it was gambling.

balances. If pictures like "Ordet," "A Condemned Man Escapes," "We Are All Murderers" and even "Gervaise" have a tough time, and imported bosoms and thigh frivolities do the business, the fast-buck, short-term credo becomes: European charm needs translation into European sex, which is more readily understood and furthermore isn't as prevalent in Hollywood films.

The exhibitors aren't far behind in catching on to this "thinking." They, too, know how to compare receipts and draw what they consider logical conclusions. Art houses, which till recently built their reputation on quality (and have done nicely in slowly developing a steady clientele), are on the prowl for sexsational stuff. Added to them are the number of fringe situations which, in desperation, have swung to the "foreign sex" pitch and are exploiting it to the hilt not only on the screen, but also with provocative advertising which, apart from the screen fare, has roused a good many protests.

Art house operators who are deliberately shunning "art" and are substituting sex imports are killing the goose that laid the golden egg, Cy Harvey of Janus Films, foreign film distributors, for one, complained in N.Y. last week. He attributed the current lag in the foreign film biz to the exhibs' failure to carefully program, i.e. establish the former balance between just plain good pictures and those which, like the Bardot starrers, would attract a crowd on the sex angle alone.

Now releasing "The Seventh Seal," a Swedish import highly touted by most N.Y. critics, Harvey said many reviewers in the country appeared to have lost their initial enthusiasm for foreign pictures. "Actually, the foreign output is as good and as interesting as ever," he commented. "But exhibitors look to the quick and convenient buck and prefer the 'sure thing,' which means sex-laden exploitation films.

"The newspapers claim they are getting disgusted, but actually it's they who created a Brigitte Bardot through all the publicity. Now, suddenly, everyone is thrown into the same pot. The foreign film 'fad' is over, and we've helped to shorten its life."

Harvey and other independents say that, if the trend continues, not only will the Europeans make fewer films of artistic quality, but there'll be little incentive to import such fine pictures since the arties pass them up for the potentially more interesting sexy items. "There are many ways of cheapening and killing a business," Harvey said. "We seem to be using them all."

Sponsors Tussle for a Chance To Tango on 'Arthur Murray Party'

A three-way hassle over the question as to who sponsors "Arthur Murray Party" Monday nights on NBC-TV has developed with Walter Scott, director of tv sales, as the referee. From the latest tally of the scorecard, it appears as if P. Lorillard is the victor in preventing Pharmaceuticals from picking up half the tab on the program, with Revlon an odds on favorite to move into the slot nearly nailed down by Pharmaceuticals.

NBC last week received an order from the drug company for co-sponsorship of the Murray show. No sooner had the order been placed with the network when Lorillard got wind of the deal and protested to the network that a cigaret company does not like to share sponsorship of a program with a drug products concern.

Protest by Lorillard set off a series of meetings at the network with both contenders getting their day in Scott's court. Revlon in the meantime put in its bid to co-sponsor the program and with Lorillard refusing to budge on its stand, it appears as if Revlon will win by default.

Ted Bergmann, president of the Parkson Agency ,which reps Pharmaceuticals, stated he felt the two products were compatible and it was up to NBC to make up its mind. "Some cigaret firms are fussy as to who shares the time period with them but we don't think the audience associates the commercials of one sponsor with the sales message of another advertiser. Each commercial stands on its own." Bergmann points out that Pharmaceuticals for a period shared sponsorship of "To Tell The Truth," with Marlboro Cigarets.

At the other end of the line is Nick Keesely, agency radio-tv topper for Lennen & Newell, which handles the Lorillard account. Keesely feels there is room for all products in television but there are certain associations which you try to avoid. ABC Calls in Affils

ABC-TV called a meeting of affiliates in the 20 Trendex cities to discuss on Monday (27) in N. Y. ways and means to hypo the entire network program sked. It was a six-hour session with all the ABC top brass sitting in at one point or another.

It's understood web is going to expend a greater amount of coin in coming weeks for promotion, publicity and advertising. Meeting, one web official said, "kind of set the scene for tne all-affiliate meeting," which is scheduled for Nov. 19 in N. Y.

Italy Court Bans 2d TV Outlet As Infringing on RAI

Rome, Oct. 28.

Italian court last week seized and sealed a second video channel in Milan on the eve of its opening. Court claimed that the video installation infringed on the government's RAI-TV grant. Court acted on direct orders from the Italo government, through Procurator della Repubblica, its judiciary office, in banning the "free" station.

Banned channel is called TVL and is supported by Italian industrial interests, who wanted to launch Milan's second video channel in order to test RAI's tv monopoly in court. The industrialists, who planned to kick off their commercial operation on Oct. 24, figured that if the court let it get on the air it possibly could build up sufficient public acclamation for a second channel to force a change in current Italian video rulings. As it is, according to reliable sources, the sponsors of the Milan station have, in the court's banning and sealing of their equipment, achieved the first step on the road to a fullscale legal test of the constitutionality of RAI's dominance.

American coin is believed involved in the second Milan outlet.

There is another court fight going on in Italy against RAI. Some time ago. Rome newspaper interests began legal action in an effort to break up RAI's tv control. (U.S. sources report that the newspaper case is still being fought in the high Italian courts.)

ABC P.A.'s Get Okay to Strike

Fourteen members of the newly-formed agents' local of National Assn. of Broadcast Employees & Technicians have petitioned the union's International office for the authority to strike against ABC. They received strike authorization yesterday (Tues.) and can go ahead at any time. Union awaits another ABC wage bid. If none is forthcoming it might go out sometime today (Wed.).

Strike by the 14 planters and writers in ABC's Gotham offices could cripple the entire network. While the hundreds of technicians at ABC, who also belong to NABET, cannot pose a sympathy strike under their ABC contract, they can refuse to cross the picket lines of a brother local, which is all the p.a.'s would need. Request for strike power was made over the weekend. The local is awaiting a reply, which can only come after all the NABET board members have been fully polled on the walkout.

The pressagents and the network, after the last meeting eight days ago, ran into a deadlock on wages. Union wants $180 a week as top minimum, but the network held out for a top of $160.

HARRY GOLDEN GETS 'MONITOR' SPONSOR

B. Manischewitz & Co. has bought Harry Golden, editor of the Carolina Israelite and author of "Only in America," the best seller, for a regular Sunday five-minute vignette at 5:40 p.m. on "Monitor" over NBC Radio starting Sunday (2).

Golden's commentaries, as in his Southern publication, will be varied, ranging from observations on how to buy cigars to why other planets haven't contacted this country.

CBS Radio Affils Powwow In N.Y.

Big turnout is expected at Fifth annual convention of CBS Radio Affiliates Assn. at Waldorf Astoria today (Wed.) and tomorrow (Thurs.).

Henry Cabot Lodge Jr., U.S. Representative to the UN, originally scheduled to speak at luncheon today bowed out because of a major diplomatic conflict involving his appearance elsewhere as a representative of the White House. His place will be taken by Gen. Curtis E. LeMay, chief of staff for the U.S. Air Force. LeMay's talk will be off-the-record. He'll be introduced by Arthur Godfrey, old friend and flying companion of the air force chieftain.

A highlight of the conclave will be the banquet at the Waldorf-Astoria tonight with Morey Amsterdam as emcee; comedian Roger Price; vocalists Stuart Foster and Louise O'Brien; Johnny Puleo and his Harmonica Rascals, and Elliott Lawrence Orch.

Frank Stanton, prexy of CBS, will point up the importance of radio in the scheme of broadcasting at the affiliates luncheon tomorrow and it is anticipated that Charles C. Caley, WMBD, Peoria, Ill., chairman of the association's board of directors, and his colleagues will tackle the problem of station clearances, station payments and the current state of CBS Radio's programming fare.

Wm. Sargent as Veepee For TelePrompter

William V. Sargent has been named veepee for administration of TelePrompTer Corp., effective immediately. Sargent was formerly director of administration of NBC-TV Network.

Irving B. Kahn, prexy of TelePrompTer, said that the Sargent appointment would leave Hubert J. Schlafly Jr., veep in charge of engineering, free to work full-time on engineering research and development project.

Unions Tripped Up by Tape?

A major consideration of the television unions these days is what tape video is liable to do to their ability and power to strike. Fear today is that the networks and stations will be able to stockpile such large amounts of taped programming in coming years that the threat of a strike will carry little or no weight at the bargaining table.

With a supply of, say, even 1,000 half-hour, 60 and 90-minute tapes, networks can continue operating, even during a strike, for long periods on just these replays. Heretofore strike threats, by any major union, generally brought the networks up sharply. Except for the last IBEW strike against CBS, during which the network operated rather smoothly on substitute technical personnel, strikes have caused considerable havoc to web transmissions.

Lowell Thomas' Production Head Talks To Adventurer in So. Pacific for 10 Cents

How Things Start

The ad-libbing sleeper of the season may well be Jackie Gleason's guest appearance on Arthur Godfrey's CBS-TV daytimer throughout all of next week starting Monday (3). Gleason and Godfrey respect each others talents but have never had more than a nodding acquaintance through the years.

However, when Godfrey recently dropped a remark he'd like Gleason to appear on his show, if only for a few minutes, Gleason immediately said that a few minutes wouldn't do, but how about going on for the whole week, if it was agreeable with Godfrey. Godfrey said yes.

It'll be an unrehearsed appearance. Libel lawyers may be standing by.

This will come as depressing news to the operating heads of the A.T.&T. and to the widows and orphans owning stock in the vast public utility. Certainly, no penny-pinching outfit is Odyssey Productions, packagers of the Lowell Thomas adventure series on CBS-TV bankrolled by General Motors, but like all package producers, the outfit likes to cut production costs when possible.

When Milton Fruchtman, production head at Odyssey, telephoned from Gotham last Thursday (23) for a thin dime (that's right, 10 cents!) to the South Pacific Cook Islands he undoubtedly scored something of a record. It is conceivable that he may have chalked up the cheapest long-distance call in tv annals.

Thomas and his film crew were on the forsaken atoll of Puka-Puka (Danger Island), some 300 miles east of Samoa, or nearly 7,000 miles from Madison Avenue. Their ham radio operator called a pal ham in Minneapolis, who, in turn, luckily picked up another ham (Bob Biersack) in Rockaway Beach, L.I. Biersack, whose call letters are K2VLA, dialed Fruchtman's Madison Avenue office. Fruchtman, on his way out of the office, went to a drugstore pay booth, dialed the Rockaway number. The ham's telephone hookup was adjacent to his radio transmitter and Fruchtman was soon powwowing with Lowell Thomas.

Fruchtman, upon emerging from the telephone booth, reported that he had spoken with Thomas for 25 minutes. "A cable would have cost at least $1,000," the producer said.

So, as Fruchtman puts it: "If you hanker to ring up Puka-Puka, just dial NEptune 4-8334. It's certainly cheaper."

If a man answers, don't hang up!

'Man of the Hour' As Sullivan Sub In Onetime Entry

The CBS-TV Nat Hiken-produced "Man of the Hour," 60-minute pilot which Texaco rejected a couple weeks ago just when it looked as though they were going to buy eight one-a-month installments, will get a showcasing after all.

On Sunday, Nov. 9, the "Man of the Hour" pilot, which has Ed Sullivan as the subject in a simulation of Friars Club roasting of show biz figures, will replace the regular Sullivan entry, with Sullivan's regular co-sponsor, Eastman-Kodak, picking up the tab. Understood that both Mercury (Sullivan's other sponsor) and Eastman were both bidding for the

Sneaky Joe, Bloody Mary, Old Reliable Help Expose D.C.'s TV Repair Racket

By LIZ CARPENTER

Washington, Oct. 28.

Three doctored tv sets—Sneaky Joe, Bloody Mary, and Old Reliable—are helping expose a million dollar tv repair racket in the Washington area.

The movements each week of these sets to anonymous homes is top secret, but radio station WWDC is using them to trap the crooks among the 450 tv repairmen here.

Besides rampant overcharging, tv repair "crimes" include replacing perfectly good tubes, advertising house calls for $1 but removing the set from home for astronomical shop charges, and readjusting the iontrap on the picture tube and thus necessitating a new picture tube.

Spearheaded by Ben Strouse, WWDC's station manager and president, and by Joe Phipps, news and editorial director, the current editorial campaign of 13-minute spots daily, warning listeners against the dishonest repairman, has won the greatest community attention since the radio station initiated its editorial spots last March.

Exposure of tv repair cheating struck a much more responsive chord among Washington's 750,000 tv set owners than radio editorials against child molestors, Potomac River improvement, and other topics of WWDC's editorial campaigns.

The tv repair racket was undertaken because the Better Business Bureau found it the No. 1 complaint in Washington. Since the editorials began Sept. 24, BBB has been swamped with even more complaints.

Setting the Trap

This is how WWDC operates its secret survey of repairmen: It carefully doctors three sets so that each has one defect. A legitimate repairman checks it to be sure there was only one defect. The three sets are distributed to three homes. The homeowner calls, over a period of a week, 10 different repairmen chosen from those known to be honest as well as the shady operators. The homeowner keeps a record on the calls to see how each compares to the "fair price" which the station determines by adding the cost of the defective part to a home call service charge of $5.

On Sneaky Joe, a Silvertone Metropolitan, the trouble was an open-fused resistor which made the set inoperable. A resistar cost is 65 cents. Add the $5 home call charge and the fair price is $5.65 for the repair. But during the first week, only one of 10 repairmen charged as little as $5.75. Another examined the set, said he couldn't fix it, and charged the $5 house call. The eight others ranged their prices from $7.30 to $16.75.

On Bloody Mary, a Magnavox, the trouble was a burned out 6AG5 which causes the sound and picture to go off while the tube stays on. Fair repair cost was $7.60 but only two of the 10 repairmen charged anything in that neighborhood. Repair costs ranged up to $16.22.

Old Reliable, a Mercury, had a 12AU7 defect, a synchronizing separator, which makes the picture look horizontally and vertically crazy. Fair repair price was $7.45; but the 10 repairmen charged up to $15.95.

Sets sometimes have to be changed because the repairmen "spot" the WWDC doctored set. For instance, last week the last two repairmen who called on Old

Atlanta Presents: Ben Gunn For Hire

Atlanta, Oct. 28.

Ben Gunn resigned Thursday (23) as announcer with WAGA-TV and his resignation was accepted. J. Robert Kerns, station's managing director of Storer station, confirmed Gunn's resignation, explaining that it came Tuesday and he accepted it.

Kerns declined to comment on reports that Gunn resignation stemmed from controversy arising from program he handled recently involving dynamiting of Jewish Temple here.

Gunn, however, had a few things to say.

"I was told," he said, "that I placed the station in an embarassing position and that it would be better that I resign. I tendered my resignation. . ."

Gunn elaborated to the extent that a program he presented last Friday (17) evening was protested by Mayor William B. Hartsfield and Atlanta Chief of Police Herbert Jenkins.

CBS-TV Daytime Coin

Additional daytime revenue was obtained this week by CBS-TV for its "Love of Life" soaper and "For Love of Money" quizzer.

Block Drug Co. purchased into the soaper on an alternate quarter hour, once-weekly basis. Lever Bros. did similarly on "For Love or Money."

RUN, BOYS, NIELSENS ARE IN

Enter Nielsen—Exit Trendex

With the advent this week of the new season's first Nielsen report (for early Oct.), the greatest epidemic of Trendex fever in tv history has come to a close. The Trendex ratings, with its maximum 20-market overnight tipoff (as against a Nielsen sample reflecting audience likes and dislikes in 200 markets), will henceforth be relegated to minor consequence to networks, agencies and sponsors.

Lacking any Nielsen returns in the first few weeks, they grab at anything—be it Trendex, Arbitron, or what else, for some straw in the wind, and that went in spades this season in view of the greater three-network competition and the abundance of new shows hitting the tv lanes.

In particular the press—both trade and lay—can heave a sigh of relief, for those morning-after calls (from whom depended on which network made the best showing the night before) henceforth takes on lesser importance now that "the Nielsens have arrived."

And in the final analysis it's the Nielsens that count. Buying—or bumping—shows is predicated on what the sponsor, agency and/or network thinks of the Nielsens returns.

'NBC Kaleidoscope' Spans Variety Of Subjects: 'Amahl' to 'Movies'

The "NBC Kaleidoscope" series, which will be telecast alternate Sundays rotating with "Omnibus," was spelled out in more detail at the annual convention of affiliates last week.

The "Kaleidoscope" series, which preems Sunday (2), will have as its initial presentation, "Subway to Freedom," the story of the East German refugees pouring into West Berlin.

Remainder of schedule shapes up as follows: (Nov. 16) "American Indian: 1958"; (Dec. 14) "Amahl and the Night Visitors"; (Dec. 28) Projection '59: NBC's foreign correspondents annual report and forecast; (Jan. 10) "The Ten Commandments," the Jess Oppenheimer-Ben Hecht live drama; (Jan. 25) "Inside Brookhaven National Lab," a visit to the nuclear research center; (Feb. 8) "The Movies," a review of past stars and films with the assistance of Richard Griffith.

On March 8 the "NBC Kaleidoscope" will offer "The Story of 'The Music Man'" in which producer Kermit Bloomgarden and Meredith Willson and original cast relate story of the musical. The April 5 program will be "The Story of 'Sunrise at Campobello'" in which Dore Schary and the cast will give the story of the production.

Affiliates also were told of "The Mary Martin Shows of Easter Day, 1959" wherein Miss Martin will do an hour-long presentation for youngsters followed 90 minutes later with a 90-minute Mary Martin production for the entire family.

McKay Ain't the McCoy

In the Gregory Peck oater, "The Big Country," Peck plays an easterner named Jim McKay from Baltimore, Md.

Court reporter Jim McKay of CBS-TV's "Verdict is Yours," native Baltimorean, was discussing this name infringement with one of the barristers on the show.

It was suggested McKay sue. But further investigation revealed that the CBS-TV McKay wouldn't have a legal leg to stand on. His real moniker is James Kenneth McManus!

'Never Again' Sez Serling in New TV Censor Bout

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

Rod Serling, top television writer, says he will never again write a tv film drama (except for his own upcoming series), following rigid censorship of "Time Element," a story he wrote for "Desilu Playhouse." "Element" will be aired on the series on CBS-TV Dec. 8, but only after Serling's original teleplay was rewritten and softened, at orders of Westinghouse and its ad agency, McCann-Erickson.

"Element," a fantasy, is about a character who in a dream envisions what will happen at Pearl Harbor on that fateful Dec. 7. He tries to warn the Army about it, but they brush him off as a crackpot. At this point Westinghouse strongly protested, averring it has a lot of contracts with the Defense Dept., and didn't want the Army pictured in such a light.

Consequently, Serling was called back and told to rewrite that. He

Last Bid to Save 'Brains & Brawn'

"Brains & Brawn" producer is revamping the format of the NBC-TV quiz show and is dropping completely in-studio coverage to go all out for remote emanations. Show is sponsored in the 10:30 Saturday slot by Liggett & Myers, which has the right to cancel anytime in the next three weeks.

Show, which premiered Sept. 13, will continue being half from a studio (the brains part) and half from a stadium (the brawn) through Saturday (Nov. 1). On the eighth, producer Herb Moss takes the show's brains out on the field at Annapolis to pair off first hand with a couple of decathlon champs, Bob Richards and Bob Mathias. Moss figures the direct relationship between the mental and physical types will establish a "team spirit much more valid" than one that exists only across a tv screen. "The electronic split," he says, "has not paid off."

Moss says he's pulling another $4,000 to $5,000 weekly out of his own pocket, and adding it to $35,000-a-week production nut, in an effort to hypo the rating and keep the show going.

Breck to Stay With Shirley's 'Storybook' But as ABC-TV Reruns

When Breck shampoo ankles its NBC-TV one-a-month series the end of this year, it's going to take the 13 "Shirley Temple Storybook" telefilms and run them as repeats every third Monday on ABC-TV.

Breck begins on ABC-TV Monday, Jan. 5, in the 7:30-8:30 slot, with the repeat specials running until sometime in June. After a summer break, Breck will show the remaining four or five hour-long Temple flicks beginning again in September, 1959, in order to make up 13 weeks.

Pact was set via N. W. Ayer, with "Storybook" replacing sustaining ABC programming in the Monday slot.

CBS: 'AND HOW' NBC: 'NOT NOW'

By GEORGE ROSEN

The season's first Nielsens are in—and the boys are running for the hills. CBS is rejoicing, proudly flaunting a "nine out of Top 10" (ABC getting the other one with its Thursday night "Real McCoys"). In an enthusiastic burst of "gee whiz," CBS has tallied up all the evening half-hours cross-the-board on the three networks, 7:30 to 11 (and starting at 7 on Sundays) with what Columbia now considers the more important scorecard: CBS winning 27 of the half-hours; NBC winning 12, and ABC 11.

Says CBS: "That's just like old times." NBC's rejoinder: "The first Nielsens hardly mean a thing. They don't accurately reflect our picture since a lot of shows hadn't premiered yet. Wait for the third report." And CBS postscripts: "Give or take a show here or there, it's a trend alrighty."

The first Nielsens have burst upon the tv scene at a time of intense intra-network rancor and bitterness, with the webs almost daily taking to the newspapers and mags with full page ads, not only to 24-sheet their own claims but to disprove the claims of the rival webs. Seldom has feeling run so high in the competitive battle for the ratings, even reaching the point where ABC has been carrying on its own private feud with Trendex.

A Frankenstein

Thus the networks themselves, in creating a Frankenstein by perpetuating the rating rat race, appear to be fighting out a drama perhaps more intense than any they have on the air.

The initial Nielsens take in the two-week period ending Oct. 4. It accounts for about 80% of the new season's programming. There could be, and probably will be, a shift in the popularity trend for some of the time periods, since such entries as Dinah Shore. "Desilu Playhouse," "Pursuit," Milton Berle, "Cimarron City" and "77 Sunset Strip," along with a few others, had not yet preemed. But it's CBS' contention that, by and large, the first Nielsen report (and it's the Nielsens that carry the weight with the sponsor, the agency and the network) is pretty much indicative of how things will go this season. The breakdown on the basis of the initial tally shows CBS grabbing off five nights (and showing particular strength on Saturdays and Sundays); ABC taking Tuesday night (in contrast to network claims based on Trendex that could translate itself into a three-night leadership), and leaving NBC with a lone Wednesday night command.

Further Nielsen intelligence: In all the evening time periods where the three networks are in direct competition— 24 in all are listed —CBS boasts a walkaway with 13. ABC is second with eight and NBC has three.

Unusual aspect of the Nielsen report is its reversal of the Trendex figure which all three networks have been shouting from the rooftops. For example, the first two "Playhouse 90" shows that come within the Nielsen rating period ("Plot to Kill Stalin" and "A Day of Wine and Roses"), regarded as two of the qualitative standout attractions on the 90-minute showcase, take a beating from Nielsen, with both Groucho Marx and Tennessee Ernie on NBC shoo-in victors. On Trendex both "Playhouse" dramas ran off with the honors. NBC's "Steve Canyon" was hot on the Trendex boxscore. But Nielsen gives the nod to the competing "Gale Storm Show" by a wide margin.

If some of the agency boys who revere those Nielsens are running for cover, it's also because of the complete reversal that's taken place in regard to the two Perrys—Como and Mason. Trendex gave the play

ABC, NBC (& Trendex) Blow Up A Rating Tempest On Published Ads

By ART WOODSTONE

Upshot of the rating war that broke out in the public prints last week between NBC and ABC is that the latter threatened to cancel Trendex. And while a final decision was evidently made Monday (27) not to cancel, the industry (including some people at NBC and ABC) are inclined to look on this one as the dirtiest game of statistical pool yet played in tv.

Even though the networks are always quibbling about who is in the lead, at the top of the current mess is the fact that never before have the issues so blatantly been exposed to the public's ears and eyes.

NBC was the first to accuse. Using a letter from Robert B. Rogers, exec veepee of Trendex, as the wedge, NBC took to the rostrum and to full page ads, alleging that ABC was invidious in the use of the Trendex rating. The letter from Rogers, addressed to William Rubens, manager of NBC audience measurement, objected to a one-page trade ad that ABC printed in VARIETY on Oct. 15.

Rogers first "noted" that the ad listed average Trendex ratings for each of the three webs and that, against what Rogers later described as a tacit understanding between the rating services and its subscribers, ABC printed the initials of the other two webs instead of sticking to the euphemistic "network A" or "network B."

Then, the Trendex officer said that ABC was questioned "on the exclusion of the Billy Graham program from their commercial time period averages and informed (him) that they do not consider (paid-for religious time) a commercial program." ("It was apparently during this "questioning" that a high ABC official threatened to quit Trendex if Rogers made the issues public. ABC-TV prexy Oliver Treyz denied on Monday (27) knowledge of a threat to cancel and said none was planned. This apparently puts the kibash on several earlier reports that Rogers had been threatened. Rogers himself refused to comment when questioned on the subject.

In the same letter, Rogers also objected to a second ABC trade ad, printed on Oct. 22, also in Whaddya Drink?

Despite the fact that Arthur Godfrey has Chase & Sanborn sponsor coin riding on his morning entry at CBS-TV, there's a lot of "strange tea things" brewing in connection with his Tuesday night showcase, which is being bankrolled by Toni and Pharmaceuticals.

It appears that Godfrey's longtime Lipton Tea sponsor (when he was still doing "Talents Scouts Monday nights) has been moving in around the country buying up as many station breaks as possible adjacent to the Godfrey Tuesday show on the premise that people still identify him with the tea product.

B&B Study Shows Cost of TV Shows Continues to Rise

The cost of sponsoring network television continues to rise. The average nighttime half-hour program in 1958 cost $87,700 (time and talent) as compared to $67,400 in 1956 and $77,600 in 1957. Advertisers are going to have to shell out an estimated $92,000 to pick up the tab on a network half-hour in 1959.

The freight for reaching 1,000 viewers per commercial minute is $3.60 in a half-hour program and trims down to $3.23 for an hour-long show. It costs $19,600 to sponsor a daytime 15 minute segment and the cost per thousand breaks down to $1.90 per minute. This information is based on study by the Benton & Bowles media department headed up by Lee Rich.

B & B study shows that 10 minutes of commercial time cost one-third of the gross hourly rate; one-quarter of an hour comes in for 40%; a half-hour cost the advertiser 60% of the rate and three-quarters of an hour can be purchased for 80% of the hourly rate. Network costs follow the pattern of the-more-you-buy-the-cheaper-it-becomes.

Rich, who is responsible for an estimated $100,000,000 in media billings, 70% of which is placed in the broadcast orbit, not only has his media department do an overall study of tv, but every program

Jesuit Weekly Agrees With Soviet That CBS Erred on 'Stalin' Play

Washington, Oct. 28.

"Plot to Kill Stalin" has been given a new roasting. This time from a rather unexpected quarter. Jesuit weekly, America, had this to say about the CBS teleplay:

"It was imprudent to heat up the Cold War with klieg lights, right in the face of our initial efforts at cultural exchanges with the USSR.

"It is at least in poor dramatic taste to portray the living head of a foreign State as a homicide for the sage of entertainment, especially when the young and unwary may be led to accept the portrayal as documentary.

"There is the moral issue. We simply do not know with historical certainty the manner of Stalin's death, and hence the theme of 'The Plot to Kill Stalin' would seem tendentiously libelous."

Mag nodded agreement with Soviet Ambassador Mikhail Menshikov's statement that the play's "slanderous attacks" were "incompatible with international standards and inadvisable in normal diplomatic relations."

$4,000,000 Alcoa Deal on ABC-TV

Alcoa has firmed up Tuesday-at 10 on ABC in a $4,000,000 time-talent 52-week deal, thereby depriving bidders NBC and CBS of a chance for this late-season coin. Sponsor intends to begin the half-hour telefilm program in January, the exact date not having been chosen yet, with options to cancel at the end of 26 weeks.

Bankroller bought the stanza, with the express intent of calling it "Alcoa Theatre," a carbon of the handle given to its current-running alternate-week Monday Night NBC showcase. However, the ABC shows, being produced in Hollywood by Collier Young, are subtitled "One Step Beyond." Young show was sold by ABC Film.

Hal March Looks Set For NBC-TV Daytimer

In the event "The $64,000 Question" is dropped by Revlon and P. Lorillard, Hal March, the Sunday night giveaway program's emcee, is expected to step into a daytime assignment on NBC-TV.

Idea is to use March in an across-the-board daytime audience participation program, conceivably as a replacement for the "Tic Tac Dough" show currently in the 12 to 12:30 p.m. slot. New program would preem in January.

SAG & AFTRA Merger Up For Testing in Gotham Balloting

The 3,000 voting members of Screen Actors Guild in N. Y. will receive a referendum this week on whether to merge with the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists, only the proposition does not include AFTRA actors exclusively in radio or SAGites exclusively in theatrical motion pictures. Issue is an "organic merger of tv performers." Vote is due to be tallied on or after Nov. 8.

If a majority of the members in SAG's N. Y. branch vote for the organic merger, feeling is that there is little the SAG council in Hollywood could do to stop a merger proposition from reaching a national vote. N. Y. vote will also test the contention by the anti-merger faction that the 200 to 300 SAG members who comprised the whole attendance at a recent Gotham branch meeting do not represent the general feeling in the local toward merger.

Even though this initial resolution excludes radio and motion pic performers, there is a chance they'd nonetheless be included in an ultimate merger of SAG and AFTRA. A "yes" vote, while it is an absolute sign that the SAG majority demands merger, legal and technical refinements have still to be worked out between the two unions, which could alter the original proposition in technique if not in spirit.

Spec-ing the Blurbs

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

Teleblurbs are getting bigger than ever.

There are 12 principals and 65 extras in a series of Ford commercials being shot at Metro for four days. J. Walter Thompson agency is leasing one two-minute spot and eight others in varying lengths. Robert Carlson of JWT is in charge and Bob Cashy is directing.

Towers, NTA Pact Mantovani Series

London, Oct. 28.

Harry Alan Towers has closed a distribution deal with National Telefilm Associates for his current vidpic series starring Mantovani and his orchestra. The deal embraces the United States and all its possessions other than Puerto Rico.

Puerto Rico has been excluded from the arrangement as Towers is retaining for himself all the Spanish speaking territories. He had previously made a deal with ABC-TV for British and European rights and a separate arrangement has been closed for Canada.

The skein, now half finished, will be completed by the end of the year and is likely to start playing the British commercial network early in the New Year. ABC-TV has already sold the series for Belgium.

The series features guest performers and every alternate program will have an American guest star.

Fremantle's Flock Of O'Seas Sales

With continental Europe becoming increasingly active in video, Fremantle International racked up a larger number of overseas sales than in any other single month in the company's history. During the 30 days, Fremantle inked deals for 11 packages in 16 different countries.

Paul Talbot, Fremantle president, said that continental Europe was responsible for over 50% of the volume, "Hopalong Cassidy" features were sold in dubbed form to the French service of Belgian TV and Television Luxembourg. First sale by Fremantle to Swiss tv was also made in September, with the Societe Suisse de Radiodiffusion buying three packages. "Movie Museum," "Encyclopaedia" Britannica" and "Wonders of the Sea."

"You Are There" and "Terrytoon" cartoons, on rights from CBS, were peddled in Italy. Other sales were made in the Netherlands, Austria, Denmark and Sweden. Japan bought Abbott & Costello for Tokyo and the Australian Broadcasting Commission contracted 39 "Movie Museums" for Sydney and Melbourne, with options to pick up the same package as its stations in Brisbane and Adelaide come on next year. ATN, Sydney, and GTV, Melbourne, Aussie commercial stations, signed for 104 cartoons. There were additional sales made in South America.

Quickie 'Photocrimes' Ready for Syndication Nov. 1; $1,700,000 Cost

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

The "Hannibal Cobb" five-minute vidpix series based on Look Mag's "Look Photocrime" feature, which tees off first three segs Friday (2), will be ready for syndication sale by Nov. 1, according to Richard Feiner, prexy of Teleworld Inc., which will produce 260 stanzas between now and next June. Series will be ready for telecasting by late Spring.

Main production stars directly after first of year, with more than 500 actors to appear. Series, to entail expenditure of $1,700,000, including payment for tv rights, also will employ from 26 to 52 directors. Except for title character—still to be set—no thesp will work more than a single day on series, thus avoiding much duplication. Plans call for from three to four stanzas to be wrapped up daily.

Each show is slated to run three minutes 15 seconds on film, thus leaving room for spot commercials. Feiner and Teleworld vp Sol Dolgin, who will produce, have selected the best 260 "photocrimes" from group which spans 20 years from 1937 to 1957, and 70 already have been adapted for series.

Minimum of 26 writers will script remaining episodes, each a self-contained story with solution included.

RECENT VINTAGE PIX SET BY MEDALLION

A new package of eight features, all of recent vintage, is being peddled by Medallion Pictures. Outfit hopes to have another fresh package in another 60 days, the group consisting of from 30 to 50 titles.

In the current fresh package, titles include: "Monte Carlo Baby," starring Audrey Hepburn, produced in '52 by Filmakers; "Devil's Harbor," a '54 20th-Fox release; "Suzannah and I," starring Xavier Cugat and Abbey Lane, made in Spain, but dubbed for the American market (pic wasn't released theatrically); British import "The Brave Don't Cry," and "Mohawk." Latter pic starring Scott Brady, was released by 20th-Fox in '56 and is being sold to tv stations on a delayed basis, pending theatrical reissue.

Jerry Franken Shifts To Gross-Krasne-Sillerman

Jerry Franken, former publicity director of Television Programs of America, has moved over to Gross-Krasne-Sillerman as assistant to GKS prez Michael Sillerman.

Franken's area as assistant to the prez will encompass sales, as well as public relations, publicity and promotion. His resignation from Independent Television Corp., which acquired TPA, took effect yesterday (Tues.).

Franken, a vet trade and newspaperman, had been with TPA four years, joining the company about a year following its formation by Milton Gordon, former prez, Eddie Small, ex-board chairman, and Sillerman, sales v.p.

Sebastian to ITC

Jack Sebastian, former publicity director of CBS Films, has resigned, effective Monday (3), to become publicity director of Independent Television Corp.

Sebastion, in his new job, also will be the N.Y. manager of the Lou Smith Organization, a flack outfit headquartered on the Coast, which represents Jack Wrather. Other hats to be worn by Sebastian will encompass publicity for Wrather's Muzak and Programmatic, Inc.

Jerry King Still Puts His Syndication Chips On Film Vs. Video Tape

Sharp dissent to the prediction that video tape will replace film in the syndication field in about two years was voiced by Jerry King, v.p. of Gross-Krasne-Sillerman.

King, currently in quality control of GKS' "Glencannon" series (on film), says film will be around a long, long time in syndication. He says his company has no economic stake in filming, as opposed to taping, and would adopt tape as a vehicle if it was economically practical and if it could deliver the same qualitative show.

But the vet showman warned that tape's practical and quality development for syndication, as opposed to networking, has not arrived. It's foolhardy to feel that the demise of film in syndication is just around the corner. The tape situation should be put in perspective, he added, citing the following disadvantages of tape today.

1. It's cheaper to use film in distribution. A reel of tape for a half-hour show costs $300, as opposed to about $30 for a finished print. If 50 prints are utilized for a series, the difference in cost is about $11,000 in favor of film. True, tape can be erased and used again. But the syndicator isn't very interested in that. He wants to preserve the show.

2. About 27 markets are equipped to play back video tape currently. Syndication needs upwards of 180 markets as a potential. Even if all markets equip for tape, the stations are not going to throw out their film projection equipment. Stations will use both taped and filmed shows.

3. There is no creative editing of tape at this stage, as opposed to film.

4. Outdoor shooting, a big factor in syndicated shows, is an unknown factor presently as it pertains to tape.

5. Film delivers five times greater gradations in black and white compared to tape.

6. Lighting can be utilized much more imaginatively in filming as compared to taping.

King did not argue with the potential of tape. On the network level, it's already knocked the kined show for a loop. On the local level, it's been an advantage to stations to tape shows and commercials for use whenever they want them. Exchange of local taped shows among stations also was welcomed. But he was emphatic about his feeling that the tape millennium hasn't come, and it won't be bumping film in the syndication field for quite some time to come, if ever.

Pact 23 More Stations For 'Dream Package'

Another 23 stations have signed for National Telefilm Associates' "Dream Package," bringing the market talley to 41.

Those stations inking for the group of 85 pix include: KMSP, Minneapolis; WBAL, Baltimore; WISN, Milwaukee; WTOL, Toledo; KOLN, Lincoln, Neb.; WHYN, Springfield; KRCA, Sacramento, WKRG, Mobile, Ala.

Gang Going Again

Samuel Gang, National Telefilm Associates' foreign sales representatives, is due to leave Saturday (1) for another tour of the far East. He will visit Japan, Australia, and the Philippines, going six weeks in all.

Among properties he will be pitching are "How to Marry A Millionaire," "This Is Alice," "Man Without A Gun," "U.S. Marshall," and "Walter Winchell File."

Everybody Likes That 'Interpol' Tag

London, Oct. 28.

A three-cornered legal hussle is pending over the use of "Interpol" in the title of filmed tv series.

Warwick Productions, the company helmed by Irving Allen and A. R. (Cubby) Broccoli, has already instituted legal action against Danziger Productions, which is currently filming a series entitled "Caesar Smith—Interpol Agent" at its New Elstree Studios.

Warwick has also urged the Rank Organization to drop its project "Interpol Calling" and warned the company that action will follow if they decide to go ahead.

The dispute stems from Warwick's claim to the copyright of the "Interpol" title. The company made a feature film with that title some two years or so ago and it is still in commercial release. It also announced that in due course it would follow up with a vidpic series using the same title—but not until the commercial potentialities of its feature had been exhausted and all the revenues had come in.

Warwick's claim also includes the fact that the release of a vidpic series would damage the chances of its feature film and any sponsor who used "Interpol" in a title would, Irving Allen told VARIETY, be joined in a suit for damages.

The Danziger Bros. have already completed the first two in their series, while the Rank Organibation has stated that "Interpol Call-series, while the Rank Organization has stated that "Interpol Call-three tv skeins.

Irving Scrams TV Producers Guild, Sez First Loyalty Is to Management

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

Same day some top vidpix producers announced last week they had formed the Television Producers Guild for collective bargaining purposes, one of their members of the steering committee ankled the new group with the declaration his first loyalty was to management. His colleagues, who had no inkling of his departure until they read about it in the press, were plainly irked at the action of Richard Irving, producer-director at Revue Productions, as well as a veepee of the MCA subsid.

Irving explained: "I'm going to remove myself from the steering committee and the guild. I'm too close to management to serve the guild and the people I'm working for to the best of my ability. My first loyalty is to management. I went to one guild meeting and was put on the steering committee without any official notification. I was invited to a meeting of the steering committee, but declined politely. It's no good for me. I would like to be of service, but don't see how I can. I wish them success, but I can't help."

Irving's action came immediately after he had been named in a publicity release by the new guild as a member of the steering committee. Guild, with more than 100 Hollywood video producers repped, has no connection with Screen Producers Guild, whose membership embraces tv producers.

There has been a rumbling within vidpix producer ranks for some time for a cut in residuals

Kiermaier's ITC Slot

John W. Kiermaier has become assistant to the prez of Independent Television Corp., Walter Kingsley.

Kiermaier joined ITC at its organization this summer, functioning as business manager. He formerly was associated with the NBC-TV net, where he served as director of administration.

Latino Dubbing On Nine Guild Series

Because it was the only major telefilm distribbery that disregarded the Latin tv market and consequently failed to dub its films into Spanish, Guild Films is launching a concerted dubbing campaign involving nine series. Additionally Guild plans to subtitle 266 RKO short subjects for Central and South America.

Dubbing, which lately began full steam, is being done in three places: Cuba, where the majority will be done, Puerto Rico and Mexico. About $250,000 will be spent in Cuba alone, with Television Habanera doing the dubbing for five series, "Paris Precinct," "Conrad Nagel Theatre," "Janet Dean," "Curtain Time" and "Michaels in Africa." Since the "Michaels" skein of 26 flickers mostly requires dubbing a new narration and little dialog, it is the least expensive of the Cuban projects. Other series, comprising 170 half-hour episodes, will cost something over $190,000 to dub, considering that the average cost of dubbing a half-hour telefilm into Spanish is over $1,000. Deal was arranged through Inter-World, Guild's international subsid.

Telemundo, which owns WKAQ in P.R., will dub "Confidential File," "Sherlock Holmes" and "I Spy." Guild says the cost of dubbing has not been worked out there as yet. "Captain David Grief," the last telefilm series for syndication made by Guild, will be dubbed in Mexico. One of the primary reasons for the latter move is the fact that 18 of the "Griefs" were lensed in Mexico, and Guild wants the dubbing to match Mexico's linguistic peculiarities.

While the voice dubbing will cost under $200,000 in Havana, Guild is making provisions for what it says is the high additional cost of script translation, plus music and effects.

Webb's 'Series—1'

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

"Series—1" is the title of a new half-hour anthology series to be produced by Jack Webb's Mark VII Productions. Producer-director Webb will host the series and also star in several episodes.

Webb, longtime star of "Dragnet," plans to shoot a pilot within 60 days, and he will star in the first film. He is now negotiating for writers for the series, being aimed at a network sale.

'Fat Man' Series For Screen Gems

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

Screen Gems has acquired rights to "The Fat Man" series from its original creator on radio, Manny Rosenberg, and will film a pilot this fall with Rosenberg as producer as well as part owner of the series. Rosenberg is moving over to Screen Gems from Irving Brecher Productions for the assignment.

Deal gives Screen Gems a total of 10 properties in the works, including one entry definitely earmarked for syndication and two others on which pilots have already been made but not shown to agencies. Two completed pilots are "Brock Callahan" and "Sam Houston"; syndication entry is "Stake-Out," the Ell Wallach starrer which Sam Katzman will produce. Others are "Ensign O'Toole," the Helen Traubel series, "Promenade Home," a "Mr. Blandings" Series, "Strategic Air Command," and sci-fi "Astronaut," and series on the Alaska territorial police.

"Fat Man" project is currently in the script stage, and date for pilot filming hasn't been set, pending completion of the pilot script. Casting will be held off until script is approved as well. "Fat Man" was the subject of a Universal feature seven years ago, but Rosenberg withheld tv rights in the pic sale.

THE 'BIG FOUR' IN SYNDICATION

You Can't Go Wrong With a Repeat

If there's any doubts that "rerunites" in feature films has set in—and is bound to grow—an analysis of the four VARIETY-Pulse Feature Charts should settle that question.

Of the 80 features making the Top 10 listing the past four weeks, 53 fell in the repeat category. First-runs were limited to 27. Covered were eight markets in the four weeks since VARIETY-Pulse began its "first-run," or "repeat" tabulation.

Current issue lists the Baltimore market, which has eight first-runs making the Top 10 listing, an unusual number of first-runs for a market. Only similar market in the four-week period was New York, where WCBS holds sway with its large backlog of cinematics. Markets such as Cleveland and New Orleans, listed in past issues, had only one first-run among the Top 10; Philadelphia had three; San Francisco, two.

Only large backlog of pre-'48's new to the market is the Paramount pix being sold by MCA TV, all of which accounts for the dominance of repeats in market after market.

Conversely, the rating champs in syndication, with few exceptions, are first-run properties, as established in the listing of Pulse's top 20 syndicated shows for the U.S., printed in the current issue, and the VARIETY-Pulse chart, printed regularly.

Only off-network reruns making the top 20 in the Pulse October report are "Honeymooners," "Our Miss Brooks" and "San Francisco Beat," latter two way down in the list. In the market-by-market weekly Pulse-VARIETY rundown, "Badge 714" (Dragnet) "San Francisco Beat" (The Lineup) and occasionally such shows as "Medic," "Amos 'n' Andy," and "Frontier" will show up.

But on the whole, it's usually a fairly clean sweep in the general rating picture for the first-runners in syndication. Despite, pre-season warnings of strong off-network properties upsetting the rating applecart for first-runners, carrying the made-for-syndication label, the threat heardly ever materialized.

Sam Marx: 'Know What They Want On Madison Ave. Before Shooting'

More pre-filming scouting of Madison Ave. sentiment by indie telefilm producers was advocated by Sam Marx, former MGM-TV exec producer, now an indie engaged in the "Prince and Miss Bishop" series.

Marx said his agency trek gave him added ideas on how to film the series, the need for strong casting in secondary roles, and a feel of the receptivity of the "Miss Bishop" project. Jan Clayton, of the original "Lassie" team, has been signed as "Miss Bishop." Series is about the life of a college teacher.

Unlike major and minor telefilmeries with offices in N.Y., with execs in constant touch with Madison Ave. the indie is at a disadvantage if he remains exclusively in Hollywood. Marx said while the agencies do have officers on the Coast, too, the decisions are made in N.Y. The agency drumbeating, he recommends, should not begin after the pilot is made, but prior to the shooting.

As to whether agencies will ink for a pilot, or a series, prior to seeing the initial episode, Marx said he found most agencies stick to the traditional approach. They first must see the pilot. Marx added that the position stems more from the clients' wishes than from the desire of agency execs, some of whom would like to get on the ground floor and support a series from the inception. He said two agencies, Young & Rubicam and BBD&O, were more acceptable to the non-pilot approach. Their interest, and perhaps a deal, could be stirred from a format, recognition of the producers and stars, accompanied by three scripts.

Prior to returning to the Coast, Marx said shooting on the pilot would begin on the Metro lot in December or January.

WPIX 'Goes Ampex'

WPIX, N.Y., become the second indie in the seven-station market, to receive delivery of the Ampex tape recording machine. First was RKO Teleradio's WOR-TV.

The other two indies, WNTA-TV and WNEW-TV, have orders in at Ampex and are awaiting delivery. Three network flagships already have their installations.

Katz Sees Japan As World's Third Biggest TV Market

Tokyo, Oct. 28.

"Japan will become the third biggest television market in the world," predicted Norman B. Katz, director of foreign operations for Associated Artists Productions.

Wrapping up his sixth annual visit, Katz observed, "The strides that have been made here are unbelievable. Here it is taking a year to put up a central tv tower for four stations. In New York it took four years just to agree to use the tower of the Empire State Building.

"I read in the papers where Japan is expected to have two mil-

WFIL'S WHOPPING FEATURE RATINGS

Philadelphia, Oct. 28.

For more than a year monthly ARB figures for the Philly area give top rating to WFIL-TV's late night "World's Best Movies."

In an analysis of the top 10 feature films listed in ARB for September, WFIL-TV garnered the first eight places, with six of these near midnight entries and two in the mid-afternoon spot, formerly held down by "Movietime U.S.A." One WRC-TV and one WCAU-TV film rounded out the list. The "Jack Paar Show" placed third according to the rating service.

In September the Clark Gable starrer "Boomtown" had the biggest draw of 19.5 and at times hit the top with a 22. Errol Flynn's "Objective Burma," sponsored by Schmidt's Beer, held down the number two spot with a 12.3 average.

Guild & Official Merger Talk Dead

Merger talks between Guild and Official Films have collapsed.

Official Films, which also had overtures from Hal Roach Studios for a possible deal, has decided to go it alone. Execs are busy lining up product for next season and pushing sales on its syndication entries. Syndication lineup includes the costume adventures, "Robin Hood," "Sir Lancelot," and "Buccaneers."

Merger yen stemmed from desire of both companies to consolidate facilities and cut overhead.

ZIV, CBS, CNP, ITC DOMINATE

Compelling force to achieve major status in syndication is that today four major syndicators account for practically half of the $100,000,000 syndication biz.

The four are Ziv, CBS Film Sales, California National Productions, and Independent Television Corp. (nee Television Programs of America). None of the four majors supplied any figures, but their over $40,000,000 gross for the four, is considered a sound estimate.

Screen Gems for the first time is embarked on an ambitious first-run syndication operation, with three first-runners slated annually. It would take only a relative slight push in their syndication gross to put them up among the four majors.

MCA TV has slowed down on its half-hour telefilm operation, concentrating its major energies on selling off the Paramount library.

But MCA-TV still has a sizable half-hour syndication gross.

Not considered in this rundown are feature film sales, the special operation of the NTA Film Network, and web sales of series. (If web sales were included MCA and SG would be way up there).

But referring to the half-hour product making the market-by-market rounds, there's no doubt about it but that Ziv has the top gross. (Interestingly enough, while SG, always heavy on the national level, is expanding in syndication, Ziv, the top syndicator, is expanding on the network level).

Not far behind Ziv is CBS Film Sales, which expects to gross about $15,000,000 this year. Of the three syndication subsids of the networks, CBS Film Sales is way ahead in the biz. But nevertheless, NBC's California National Productions rates as one of the majors in terms of its gross.

Then, there's the spanking new ITC, which acquired TPA. What the combined team of the Jack Wrather Organization, the Walter Kingsley-helmed ITC, and British interests, will do to the old TPA remains to be seen. But there's no doubt about the Wrather-Kingsley yen. It's up. TPA, prior to its takeover, had achieved major status.

But syndication, like most any other business, doesn't remain static. There are rumbles from the medium and smaller companies to raise their sights and achieve major status. Michael Sillerman, who left TPA to become prez and part owner of Gross-Krasne-Sillerman has the giant gleam. Ditto a few other companies.

But it's no easy feat today, compared to four or five years ago when the field was comparatively wide open. The majors, which account for nearly half of the first-run product in syndication, are well entrenched and it'll take some doing to catch up.

SCHUBERT DOUBLES AS PREXY OF TELESTAR

Bernard L. Schubert, prime mover in Telestar Films, will wear two hats.

Board of directors, of which he is chairman, has elected him company prez. Post was vacant since the resignation of Sy Weintraub, who bought out Sol Lester Productions.

Telestar, which is adding sales offices, opened one in Washington and St. Louis. Stuart H. Goldsborough has been appointed account exec in Washington and Thomas E. Matthews Jr., in St. Louis. Goldsborough formerly was N.Y. district sales head for ITV, Inc. Matthews for the past several years has been an account supervisor at the St. Louis office of the D'Arcy agency. Both will report to David Savage, exec v.p.

In addition to Washington and St. Louis, Telestar now has branch offices in Los Angeles, Ch. ago, Pittsburgh, Atlanta and Memphis, with additional offices slated for Boston, Detroit, San Francisco, Houston and Minneapolis.

Only Six Westerns Among 71 Pilots In Preparation For '59-'60; Action, Adventure Segs Top Vidfilm List

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

First solid indication of the impending decline of the tv western is the shortage of oaters among some 71 pilots already in various stages of preparation for the 1959-60 season. An intensive survey of networks and Hollywood telefilmeries revealed only six new giddyaps currently in the works, with the trend swinging over to action-adventures and mysteries, while situation comedies pick up steam from the rear.

Pilot activity is in marked contrast to a year ago, when oaters in preparation were the rule, rather than the exception they are today. Much of the slack in new prospective western fare has been taken up by a new outgrowth of the space age, the science series, which is beginning to develop into a potentially strong tv possibility as public interest in the men of science increases.

Leading form of pilot being readied by production companies is the action-adventure drama, numbering 20 entries, followed closely by 16 prospective mysterioso. In third place are situation and family comedies, with 14 poised for pilot lensing. Next come the six westerns champing at the bit, five "science and supernatural" entries, and five new dramatic anthologies. Five other pilots fall into specialized indivdual classifications.

Hardiest holdout for western fare is Four Star Productions, with three of seven pilots it is mapping being of the horse-opera variety. Current season, too, finds Four Star production slate entirely devoted to westerns. Other new oaters are divided between Hal Roach Productions (two) and Screen Gems (one).

Leading producers of action-adventure pilots are CBS-TV and United Artists TV, with three apiece ,while former also leads in the projected manufacture of mysteries, with three poised to grind. Screen Gems tops the situation comedy field with a trio, with both UA's vidsubsid and McCadden mapping production of two.

Playing It Safer

In a new attempt to hedge on pilot risks, some major studios have adopted a "let's see if we can't make a small-budgeted feature" policy.

The writer originating the show idea is asked to submit a shooting script and two plot outlines for subsequent scripts. Studio may elect to use the pilot, along with the two plot outlines, for a small-budgeted feature, if the pilot doesn't sell.

Wrather Is Nixed On $4,000,000 Bid For Loretta's Pix

Hoolywood, Oct. 28.

Jack Wrather, who sparked Independent Television Corp., has offered $4,000,000 for the "Loretta Young Show," but was turned down.

Independent Television Corp., formed by Wrather and British interests, recently acquired "The Gale Storm Show" for $2,000,000 from Hal Roach Studios. "Gale Storm" deal came shortly after ITC's acquisition of Television Programs of America.

ITC, with its acquisitions, now has a roster of 16 network and syndicated properties. Apparently, outfit, as evidenced by the "Loretta Young" bid, is on the prowl for other product to build up its catalog.

The unsuccessful bid was for the four-year backlog of the vidfilm star's show, new productions on which are running Sunday evenings on NBC-TV.

Currently, the Walter Kingsley helmed ITC is out pitching "Sergeant Preston of the Yukon," as well as other properties. First major new telefilm show inked for ITC was the deal with Sapphire Films of Britain, titled "Four Just Men," toplined by Jack Hawkins, Vittorio de Sica, Dan Dailey and a fourth star, an American, still unselected.

12 STATIONS PACT 'MATINEE' RERUNS

Twelve tv stations have signed for the 26 film reruns of NBC's "Matinee Theatre," which California National is syndicating under a "Cameo Theatre" banner. The deals were made since Oct. 15, when the NBC distribution subsidiary broke with the package.

Some of the stations, according to CNP, will air the pix in color, and most of the 12 outlets will be carrying the show as a one-time-a-week nighttime package. Others will be using them, in lieu of longer films from the regular feature film stockpiles, on nights when there are sports events that cut into feature film showings. The "Cameos" are 60-minutes long, while most features run longer.

Rosemary Clooney Series Back Into Syndication

MCA TV is reintroducing the "Rosemary Clooney Show" in syndication.

Chirper on film was absent from the syndication mart during the past year, while Miss Clooney's live net series was aired. Show in syndication will be first-run in many markets which didn't carry the 39 episodes a year ago.

ABC, Schenck In World TV Setup

ABC Films has teamed up with Joseph M. Schenck Enterprises in the formation of World Television Programming.

Arrangement was disclosed with the network sale of World's first property, "One Step Beyond," sold to Alcoa for airing on ABC-TV sometime after the first of the year, under the title of "Alcoa Theatre."

Under the deal, ABC Films will act as the sales representative and distributor for all World product. American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres subsid also will continue to represent other producers.

World plans other telefilm shows, and according to producer Young, top talent will be attracted via the profit participation route.

ABC Films has been seeking a longterm arrangement with a production arm for quite awhile now. It had a similar arrangement with Hal Roach Studios in Rabco, the firm in which Roach and ABC Films was partnered. Rabco though took on an inactive status the last couple of years and more recently Roach bought out ABC Films' 50% interest.

Long pending deal with World was consummated by ABC Films prez George T. Schubert, Bernard Schwartz, v.p. of Joseph M. Schenck Enterprises, and other execs.

Hamlet, Act I, Scene 3

NIGHT: As Trendex reported recently, the latest complete and non-fractionalized nighttime returns (full week of October 8-14, 7:30-10:30 pm) show NBC the leading network with an audience 6% greater than the second network and 35% greater than the third.

DAY: And now Trendex returns are in for the first week of three-network daytime competition, ending October 17. They show that in all those periods where the three networks directly compete, NBC leads the second network by 11% and the third network by 61%. They also show: in those seven periods where the third network has introduced new daytime programs for the first time, NBC has increased to 40% its share of total audience, leading the second network by 17% and the third by over 200%. (The third network's new programs lost 49% of the audience share previously built up by their affiliates locally.)

More significant than any network's competitive standing is the fact that both day and night are producing ever-increasing audiences for television. Over the last year total daytime viewing has increased 13%, surpassing even the pace of nighttime audience growth. Again, we offer our congratulations to those who have contributed to this dynamic record of growth.

With competition intensifying daily, with NBC and CBS in a neck and neck race for audience supremacy*, "it must follow as the night the day" that the American people are in for the most rewarding, most satisfying season of viewing in television's history.

NBC TELEVISION NETWORK

*In the interests of the integrity of industry research and the fair use of Trendex rating data, we feel obligated to quote from a letter dated October 22, 1958 and signed by Robert B. Rogers, Executive Vice-President, Trendex, Inc.:

"In regard to the ABC-TV advertisement which appeared in 'Variety' on Wednesday, October 22nd...the inference that the figures produced during the week of October 8-14 for NBC-TV are not comparable to those produced during October 1-7 for the industry is inexcusable, and we certainly intend to bring this to the attention of ABC-TV officials."

Madison Ave. Mahouts Do Some Soul-Searching at 4 A's Meet —On Other Ad Agency Fronts

By JACK BERNSTEIN

Advertising agency business has been at a standstill for the last two days with industry leaders of the grey-flannel set having left their Madison Ave offices to march off en masse to the Biltmore Hotel for the American Association of Advertising Agencies Eastern Annual Conference. Conclave for the agencymen turned out to be a soul-searching introspective affair with some time alloted for crystal-ball gazing into the future of advertising.

Agency sessions, broken down into eight workshops, were held Monday afternoon and throughout yesterday (Tues.) and covered all phases of the agency business. Topics considered by the agencymen included two creative workshops, one devoted to print and the second to radio and television; research, account management, industrial advertising, media buying, marketing and a "Look Ahead" meeting highlighted by talks by leading agencymen.

J. Davis Danforth, Chairman of the Board of the AAAA and exec veepee of BBDO in his keynote address at the "Look Ahead" session stated, "Expanding horizons that will open before American industry in the 1960's will naturally present related problems to the advertising agencies of this country." Danforth discussed the future problems in terms of the big job advertising agencies are going to have to do, "how we are going to get the trained, creative manpower to do this job, and, finally how we are going to maintain reasonable net profits."

Danforth proposed a number of practical steps to provide the necessary recruitment and training of creative, agency manpower that will be needed in the next decade. He appealed for serious thought by advertisers and agency men toward the problem of declining agency profits. He considered a number of methods for defeating the "Law Of Diminishing Returns" as it applies to the declining ratio of net profit to agency gross income. Danforth concluded by saying that advertising agencies will be called upon to perform many new services as part of the total marketing job, but that basic creative planning will continue to be the agency's number one job.

The Good Vs. the Bad

Walter Guild, president of Guild, Bascom & Bonfigli, told the agencymen that advertising needs no defense. "I like Fax Cone's statement on the subject. He said in a recent speech: 'Advertising in itself is neither good nor bad. Advertising is like dynamite, or the telephone. You may use it for good, or you may use it with evil intent.'

"I am not here to criticize advertising, but to discuss with you some opinions as to how advertising mght be made better than it is. In America we have the finest advertising in the world. And advertising in 1958 is better than it has ever been in the history of advertising.

"Most advertising today is good. Most advertising today is effective. Most advertising today does what it is supposed to do—produce sales. But not all advertising is good. In fact, far too much modern advertising is very bad. Too much is ineffective. Too many advertising campaigns fail to produce sales. We are a long way from perfect. The classic advertising formula—AIDA—attention, interest, desire and action—has not been repealed. Too much advertising today fails to attract attention, produce interest, generate desire, and stimulate action. Too much advertising is just plain dull!

" Can we afford dull. ineffective advertising in 1958? We cannot afford dull advertising, if for no other reason than the cost of advertising today.

"I am going to gnaw on the hand that feeds us. I am going to goose the goose that lay the golden egg. I am going to say that in my opinion the advertiser is to blame for much of the bad advertising which I have been talking about.

"He is responsible because he is trying to do an honest job. His very virtues and strength are the reasons he is to blame for so much of the bad advertising we see today.

"Why? He is a practical man. He is a man of sound judgment—firm convictions. He is a leader, but he is not a writer. He is not an artist, he is not a tv playwright, he is not a musician. And generally he has little talent and limited experience in these arts. Yet this practical man usually makes the final decision on all creative aspects of his advertising."

Harry G. Little, chairman of the board of Campbell-Ewald spoke on personnel development and outlined how agencies should acquire and train young people for future growth in the agency business. His speech covered the training program at C-E which is broken down into three phases, the training program, the creative internship and the University Fellowship or Masters Program.

Arthur Bellaire, v.p. in charge of radio-tv copy at BBDO, presided over the radio-tv workship and stated that, "Because of its intimate nature and its powerful impact on the buying emotions of the public, television demands and consumes advertising ideas at a faster rate than any medium in history. Consequently, those who hide behind the ideas of others... who play it safe by following literally the platitudes of research... who apply what worked last week to this week's problems ... are not keeping pace.

"The true creative mind, on the other hand, thrives and grows with practice and pressure and competition. It knows no limits if properly encouraged and granted the right to explore and experiment and develop. In fact, on the air today you see many a commercial that has worked out successfully because somebody up there had faith in a new—perhaps even untestable—idea.

"Television is no longer new... no longer young... not even adolescent. Television is mature and so are the people who watch it. To reach and sell these people, then, requires a curious mixtures of sound advertising planning and a touch of the daring that will qualify a commercial to stand out... and do a better job of selling."

Alfred J. Seaman, exec v.p. and creative director of Compton in a speech before the tv-radio workshop stated that among commercial television's fascinating facets is an eternal triangle.

"You and I are part of it. Sometimes this triangle seems more like a frustrating tug of war than it does like a love affair; but that's only because we lose perspective once in a while.

"Like all good triangles, this one has three sides.

"First, the public, which turns on the television set for one thing only—entertainment.

"Secondly, the manufacturer, who turn to television for one thing only—sales.

"Thirdly, you, the creative man or woman, who turns to television for a multiplicity of reasons: money, creative satisfaction, unavoidable circumstances, the love of challenge or a do-it-yourself compulsion, gone wild.

"Here you are with impressive television accomplishments in the palm of your hand but with golden opportunities slipping through your fingers.

"Television commercials could be better today if you saw this eternal triangle more clearly. Your own value in business would rise more rapidly if you realized that you are the only people in the world who can keep the other two forces—the public and the manufacturer—in perfect balance. Not only that, but only by playing your role well can you achieve more of the satisfaction you expect from the creative side of advertising."

Thomas F. Naegele, art director for tv at J. Walter Thompson, also talked before the radio-tv group. Rounding out the key speakers before the workshop was Matthew J. Culligan, exec v.p. in charge of NBC radio network.

NO DOPE HE: ASTAIRE; TV 'VERY PROFITABLE'

Beverly Hills.

Editor, VARIETY:

Kindly retract erroneous article in last week's VARIETY. Here are the facts. The entire package is mine via my Ava Productions Corp. MCA merely acted as my agent with the sponsor. Nobody had any cut. All expenses were paid by me and the show definitely turned in a sizable profit.

Though I was not interested in that phase (of your story) I would like to make it clear that I am not completely nuts. I particularly directed that no expense be spared in carrying out my plans, ideas and designs for the show which I had (been working on) for some time. Thanks, love and kisses and I will do another when I get the time.

Salant Downbeats Sarnoff's Bid To Rotate Programs

NBC board chairman Bob Sarnoff's recent suggestion to rotate coverage of the country's major special events among the networks was downgraded by Richard S. Salant, veep of CBS Inc., in a luncheon address to general managers of the CBS-owned radio stations meeting in Gotham Monday (27).

"It could only result in reduced service to America's listeners and viewers," Salant asserted. "It would seem that the presentation of major news events would be the last area in which a responsible network would seek to introduce economies."

Salant also said that the future of American broadcasting's relationship with its government is in the hands "of station people such as you" and that "radio's economics may well win the industry's battle for retention of the present limit on tv-network ownership of stations."

Salant said the regulatory powers in Washington, unable to separate the video and audio facets of broadcasting for regulatory purposes, may be forced to adopt a liberal attitude toward network ownership and option time in order to assure radio's well being.

"A solidly based relationship between you—a station manager operating locally—and your Congressman can do more to convey the broadcaster's side of our story than reams of testimony before a Senatorial committee," Salant said.

WINS Accomplishes What Webs Can't Do— Sell Half-Hr. Radio Show

It's not too often that it happens anymore, but Martinsons Coffee bought the entire half-hour of a local N.Y. radio show on a firm 10-week deal, with options to renew. "The Voice In the Night," which is a Sunday night (midnight-to-12:30) rendition of famous horror stories on WINS, N.Y., by Sidney Gross, will begin carrying the Martinsons banner as of Nov. 2.

Show began last January on the N.Y. indie, and at that time it was aired on Friday and Saturday as well as Sunday. There is a possibility, what with the coffee commitment, that the station will recommence the Friday-Saturday shows.

'Anybody Can Play' Slated for Ciggie Axe

John Guedel's "Anybody Can Play" quiz-panel show, currently being aired on ABC-TV Monday at 9:30, is slated to be cancelled. Program is expected to wind up its network run midyear. "Anybody," like other quizzers this semester, is having rating trouble.

Executives of William Esty, agency for Salem, are currently huddling over a format change in which the tenure of the panel would be cut from four to two weeks.

'Boy, Do We Have Troubles'

NBC chairman Bob Sarnoff, describing the function of the network in achieving program balance before the NBC-TV affiliates last week, discussed some of the "misunderstanding" of the role of the network in television, and described the web as "a cat chasing its tail." Here's his "hasty count-down of the dilemmas and frustrations of networking":

"First, we face recurring charges of network monopoly; yet we are a business whose hallmark is no-quarter competition.

"Next, we face the paradox of a public official suggesting that perhaps more network programming would improve the quality of radio stations—at a time when other government officials seem dedicated to reducing the amount of network programming carried by television stations.

"Then, we stand in the dock on the charge of controlling too much of what the public sees; while at the same time we are being accused of abdicating program control to advertisers and agencies.

"Some feel we shun controversial programming; yet others are alarmed when our commentators express opinion on issues in the news.

"Some feel we exile informational and cultural shows to Sunday afternoon; others are distressed when we preempt regular nighttime shows for such programs."

NBC Radio Affils, With Promise Of Rate Increase, A Satisfied Lot

Hike of NBC Radio's clearance guarantee to advertisers to 85%, along with the promise to affiliates of a rate increase as a result, highlighted NBC exec v.p. Matthew (Joe) Culligan's report to the radio affiliates meeting last week in New York.

Generally satisfied affiliate body, both in terms of increased compensation and aggressive network promotional tie-ins under which stations have been signing retail outlets in adjacency positions for national network advertisers, also got the following guardedly optimistic report:

1. NBC Radio's share of total three-network sponsored time (Mutual's sponsored hours aren't available), jumped to 48%—nearly half of the total—during October.

2. Station compensation has tripled for the first eight months of this year over the similar period in 1956. It was up 75% for the first eight months of 1957 over the like 1956 period, and up 94% for the first eight months of '58 over '57.

3. NBC has raised the clearance to advertisers to 85% coverage from the previous 75%, reflecting a greater affiliate willingness to go along on the web's programming concepts. Actual clearances are short of 85%, but the web is going ahead with the new guarantee anyway. Breakdown now shows

New Era in Tape Dawning for RCA

Radio Corp. of America may shortly enter the tape manufacturing business as a result of its experiments on home-videotape. RCA engineers have developed a quarter-inch tape for its home recorders, representing a major breakthrough in terms of the present bulkiness and costliness of the two-inch-wide professional video tape.

RCA's quarter-inch tape presently can handle 10 minutes of program information on a seven-inch reel, and company spokesmen foresee a full half-hour on the same size reel within a short time. The professional tape reel is about 18 inches in diameter.

Use of the quarter-inch tape for broadcast purposes is not foreseen by the RCA people, since the fidelity isn't high enough. However, at a demonstration last week of RCA's home tv recorder, image produced by the tape was sharp and clear, more than adequate for home use.

Eventually, an RCA spokesman conceded, the quarter-inch breakthrough might evolve into a professional broadcast tape of somewhat larger size, but still much easier to handle and less costly than the present two-inch tape employed by broadcasters.

Joe Colledge to RCA

Joe Colledge, veepee in charge of facilities for NBC and a vet staffer at the network, is moving up to the parent RCA company.

Colledge becomes general manager of broadcast-television equipment for RCA.

Bob Sarnoff To Affils: 'We're All In This Together'

In the face of mounting competition and the continuing threat of Washington action against the networks, NBC board chairman Bob Sarnoff last week told NBC's affiliates that "the future of networking, the future of your stations, the very future of television itself will depend on whether, and how well, we jointly withstand" the stresses against the medium from "divergent interests that pull a network and its affiliates in opposite directions."

"Thus far," he said, "the forces of cohesion have withstood those of division." I personally feel they always will—if the fundamentals of our relationship continue to be viewed in clear perspective. The danger is that the expediencies of the moment may obscure the lasting values of these fundamentals." This value, he said, is rarely defined so sharply as it was during the Barrow hearings, when affiliates rallied to the support of the webs.

"My concern now is that this joint asset could be slowly eroded away, either through misunderstanding or through failure to recognize the narrow margin between network success and failure."

Burns & Allen Audio Replays as Capsule Segs—But for NBC

George Burns & Grace Allen will be back on radio shortly—but on tape, via replays of the soundtrack segments of their standup inserts in last year's "Burns & Allen" CBS-TV show. Series won't be on CBS-AM, however; the soundtrack capsules will be scheduled on NBC Radio as part of the web's "Stardust" pattern.

Deal, announced at the NBC Affiliates meeting last week by exec v.p. Joe Culligan, calls for Burns to hand over the soundtracks of the standup comedy inserts involving B&A. Material will give NBC enough for 260 five-minute shows, which web will run at the rate of either five or 10 a week.

MOUNTAIN TO EXIT TV DEPT.

Elevation of George Gribbin to the presidency of Young & Rubicam will spark some sweeping changes at the agency in the near future although, so far as is known, there is no definite timetable. This will not only apply to the tv-radio sector, of which v.p. Bob Mountain is head, but in merchandising, contact and other areas.

One of the first departments to be affected will be television, with Mountain scheduled to exit his present post (to which he was named about four years ago when he succeeded Nat Wolff). Mountain will probably return to the contact division, his original stamping ground at the agency.

Just who will succeed Mountain is a moot point. It's understood there are three candidates highly favored for the position, namely Everard Meade, who formerly held the post until five years ago, when he decided to retire (although within the past few weeks he accepted the radio-tv vice-presidency at Ogilvy, Benson & Mather agency); Mort Werner, who is with Kaiser Industries, a Y & R client, and thought highly of within the agency precincts, and Pete Levatis, currently operating in the media division at Y & R.

Whether or not Meade would accept the job is something else again. It would mean returning to fulltime duties, whereas in his present Ogilvy tenancy he works about two days a week. Curious aspect of a possible Meade return is that during his former stretch at Y & R one of the men reporting to him was Gribbin. Being tv oriented, Gribbin will probably put greater emphasis on the agency's tv operation in contrast to Sig Larmon as prexy (latter has moved up to the board chairmanship).

Mountain has been with the agency a number of years, although his scheduled return to contact will probably not come as a surprise. When, last spring, the media and tv departments got together and formed their tv committee (thus ending longtime conflict between the two areas), the retention of Mountain as tv-radio director was reportedly on a "reprieve" basis. But with Gribbin now assuming the agency helm, it's reported he wants a whole "new attitude and new face" brought into the Y & R tv picture.

It's been traditional at Y & R not to "move up from within." Thus Mountain's key associates, Dave Levy in the east and Walter Bunker on the Coast, will probably stay put in their present berths.

'Fat Cat' NBC-TV Affils in Pledge Of Allegiance To Sales-Harrassed Network At No-Major-Issue Meeting

By BOB CHANDLER

Virtual absence of any major conflicts in the NBC Television Affiliates meeting last week in New York was more a symptom and a reflection of the unique and somewhat ironic economic status of the industry today than an expression of satisfaction with NBC's current programming and sales status.

For while the webs are still struggling to close the final gaps in the nighttime sales picture, and to come to grips with an ever-weakening program structure, the kev affiliates are enjoying a surprising prosperity that has in some cases reached alltime record levels. And if these affiliates are dissatisfied with the NBC programming-sales picture, they're inclined to be tolerant and understanding of the web's difficulties.

In the top 20 markets, virtually every NBC affiliate and o&o is enjoying an alltime record October. Some stations for the first eight months have set alltime sales records. All are looking for solid fourth-quarters, in line with the business upturn.

Fact is that while the networks have been obviously hurt by the business recession, national spot business, at least in the key markets, has either held steady or improved. There had been some deterioration in the smaller markets, but here too there's a strong upturn this fall. During the recession, it appears, the major national advertisers held their spot expenditures strong in the major markets to meet the competition, but made their budgetary cuts on the networks and in the smaller, less vital markets.

Consequently, as one key affiliate put it, "We're fat cats today. But we know what the network is going through, and we know they're doing all they can, as far as sales are concerned. As for programming, we're not completely satisfied, but we can't program for them. We're doing okay, and we're not going to jump down

What Else Is New?

Having laid claim to fathering baseball and sundry other achievements, another facet of Russia's braggadocio was revealed by Irving R. Levine, NBC's Moscow's correspondent, at the NBC affiliates' gathering last week.

Levine told of the American tourist in a Russian train who pulled out one of the new small transistor radios.

A Soviet citizen, fascinated with the gadget, finally blurted out: "We have lots of those. What is it?"

NBC Affils See Latest Fashions In Electronics

By JO RANSON

Princeton, N. J., Oct. 28.

Significant lab progress in tv and radio equipment was revealed to flock of NBC affiliates reps and junketing tv press at the RCA Labs here last Wednesday (22) with special emphasis on the new stereophonic AM radio broadcast system functioning in the regular broadcast band.

Upcoming stereophonic system via single receiver and dual speakers on the AM band could be sent live or recorded from a single transmitter without bringing about obsolescence of present day sets. Furthermore, this advance in radio would also produce stereophonic sound in automobile radios for the first time.

RCA's engineering nabobs also unveiled their experimental endeavors with vidicon color tv systems, battery-operated portable tv receivers, miniature decoding systems, the "Electroflax" electronic printing process, an electronic music synthesizer and a pictorial account of a C Stellarator fusion research project it is doing in cooperation with Princeton Univ.

Overwhelmed at what they were seeing in new tv equipment, NBC Radio affiliate members sighed:

Updating Some Past Glories

NBC-TV's biggest pitch to its affiliate body last week was a detailed "past glories" presentation on what it termed "the greatest tv network audience shift since the medium began." The reference was to last year's swing to NBC-TV and the decline of the CBS fortunes, and v.p. and national sales manager Don Durgin took up the cudgels on the following points:

1. At the end of the '56-'57 season, NBC trailed CBS by five rating points in average evening Nielsen audience. End-of-season ratings in '58 showed virtual parity, with a 23.4 for CBS and a 23.2 for NBC (17.5 for ABC).

2. Similarly, at the end of '57, NBC trailed CBS by five rating points on an average evening minute basis on the Nielsen multi-network area reports. At the end of '58, NBC was ahead of CBS, by a 22.1 to 19.7 score.

3. On a top 10 Nielsen basis, NBC jumped from two shows out of 10 at the end of '57 to five out of 10, while CBS dropped from seven shows to three. On the multi-network top 10, NBC rose from three to six shows while CBS dropped from seven to four.

4. On "wins" by night of the week, according to Nielsen data, NBC jumped from one night to four nights, while CBS dropped from six to three-night dominance, computation being on an average audience basis.

5. Half-hour "wins" measurement showed NBC jumping from 10 to 18 per week, CBS dropping from 24 to 17 over the length of the season on the Nielsen national measurement. On a multi-network basis NBC jumped from 10 to 22, CBS dropped from 21 to 10.

6. Audience shift, Durgin said, represented a switch of 5,000,000 homes per average minute from CBS to NBC.

The audience statistics were the basis of NBC's major session with the affiliates. Prexy Bob Kintner, chairman of the board Bob Sarnoff, programming v.p. Bob Lewine and sales v.p. Walter Scott took an optimistic stance on the current season, but it was Durgin's sledgehammer presentation that left the strongest impression on the affiliate body.

Jack Harris As Damm's Successor

As was expected, Jack Harris, of KPRC-TV, Houston, moved up as chairman of the NBC Affiliates Advisory Board as successor to Walter J. Damm, of WTMJ-TV, Milwaukee, who has retired. Ed Wheeler, of WWJ-TV, Detroit, becomes vice chairman representing basic affiliates with Harold Essex of WSJS-TV, Winston-Salem, continuing as vice chairman for optionals.

In a business where verbosity is often the better part of sincerity, the tribute paid by NBC and its affiliates took on the glow of real emotion in a simple but moving ceremony at the annual affiliates banquet Thursday night (23) at the Hotel Plaza.

With his sometime antagonist and fellow pioneer, RCA chairman Gen. David Sarnoff, on the rostrum, the affiliates presented Damm with a cabin cruiser for his retirement in Florida, while NBC kicked in with a complete communications system for the boat. The gifts were pretty much beside the point in terms of the moment; it was the manner of their presentation by NBC v.p. Harry Bannister and WBAP-TV's Harold Bough that must have evoked a flood of happy reminiscence in Damm and broke him up completely. Damm could only stammer a thanks through his tears, but the moment eloquently bespoke the end of a long and colorful era.

THE HIDDEN REVOLUTION
With Edward R. Murrow, narrator
Executive Producer: James Fleming
60 Mins., Wed., 8 p.m.
NATIONWIDE INSURANCE
CBS Radio, from N.Y.
(Ben Sackheim, Inc.)

The vast and deep-going changes in American society in the era of the atom, the hydrogen bomb and the space rocket were documented persuasively in the first installment of "The Hidden Revolution," a six-part series which preemed last week (22) over CBS Radio. With Edward R. Murrow at the helm and tying together the many taped ends, it was a fascinating and searching analysis of the impact of modern technology on life and thought in the U.S.

It's heartening, in this tv-saturated age, to be made to realize that radio still has a vital function to perform. Murrow demonstrated this beyond a doubt, and the CBS Public Affairs Department, whose Unit One produced the broadcast, deserves kudos for resisting the temptation to make too many concessions. This was a show for thinking people, for those who still find the time to be concerned about the larger picture.

"Man need no longer be the victim of external circumstances, but his moral fiber is failing," Murrow quoted India's Prime Minister Nehru as saying. And that was the theme of the program—the social consequences of scientific discoveries, the gaps between the deed and the intellect, the strains and stresses of a changing society. The voices used were those of scientists, politicians, historians, economists and military leaders. None of them contributed a headline, but all voiced a real concern about the future and about the need to cope with harsh realities.

Searching studies such as "The Hidden Revolution" are rare, partly because the truths they discover tend to be painful. Murrow presented his facts quietly, yet there was no question what he was leading up to. Perhaps an hour is quite a long time for this kind of documentary, though efforts were made to back up the voices with sound effects.

Among the men heard on the show were Secretary of the Interior Fred A. Seaton, Prof. Samuel A. Stouffer of Harvard, Dean Stanley F. Teele, also of Harvard, Prof. Oscar Handlin, C. Northcote Parkinson, Vice Admiral Hyman G. Rickover, George R. Harrison of MIT, John Kenneth Galbraith, Arnold J. Toynbee and others.

Many interesting and revealing points-of-view were discussed. For instance, a Harvard professor said it wasn't true that Americans were conforming more, they were simply more concerned over it. Conformity, he argued, is essential to creativity. Toynbee warned that we are moving towards a "civil service world."

"The Hidden Revolution" said nothing that was new, but it pointed up a host of concerns that today move thinking Americans. It was a sharp, well-edited compilation of a cross-current of thought in an era dominated by fear and uncertainties. The voices of the men who appeared on the show had weight and one can only hope that what they had to say will linger. Hift.

DON McNEILL'S BREAKFAST CLUB
With Fran Allison, Sam Cowling, Dick Noel, Eddie Ballantine Orch, Diane Maxwell, others Producer: Cliff Peterson
Director: Lou Perkins
Writer: Eddie McKean
60 Mins., Mon.-Fri., 9 a.m.
ABC, from Chicago

After 25 years—count 'em—on the same network in approximately the same time period, the "Breakfast Club" format is long past being quibbled with. What's in order at the start of the program's 26th year is not another review but a tribute.

It must be a comfort to the first of the show's four generations of listeners to know that some things endure in the world, even on radio. Except for the girl singer (Carol Richards is leaving to become a mother) everything is just as it was a year ago; and, excepting male singer Dick Noel, things are pretty much as they were 15 or 20 years ago, as far as "BC" is concerned. Still prevailing from the show's earliest days are its institutional "Four Calls to Breakfast" on the quarter hours, "Hymn Time," "March Time," "Memory Time" and "Moment of Silent Prayer." Sure it is folksy and full of sentiment and corn, but these qualities are patrolled by good sense and restraint and never get out of hand.

"Breakfast Club" is a wholesome show, and the values it promotes are healthy ones. It is old-fashioned in the warmest sense of the term, and host Don McNeill is paternalistic in the kindest sense. In these days of the screaming ET announcement on radio, McNeill's personal sell on the soft pedal is, in fact, a human kindness.

Who can say why "Breakfast Club" has lasted so long and continues to be inspired broadcasting? By now it is apparent that the formula contains that mysterious common denominator that cuts across cities, suburbs and grasssroots, in this decade as well as in the two preceding, and probably even in the next to boot. Les.

MARIAN ANDERSON REPORTS ON THE UNITED NATIONS
With Howard Sanders
Writer-director: Norma Greenstein
15 Mins., Sun.; 7:30 p.m.
WLIB, N. Y.

Approaching the calibre of major station programming was a 15-minute taped interview with singer Marian Anderson which was recently beamed on New York indie WLIB. The top Negro concert artist primarily discussed her duties with the United Nations since being appointed as a U.S. alternate representative to the UN's 13th general assembly.

Miss Anderson, who said she found her new assignment "very exciting," conceded that she knew little about politics but welcomed the post as a means of working to bring about world peace—a subject she's always been interested in. Interviewed by Howard Sanders, the singer explained that "we belong to Committee Four, which has to do with trusteeships of places in Africa and some smaller countries that need the protection of larger nations."

An indication of Miss Anderson's modesty and humble qualities was shown through her use of the third person during the entire interview. "I always use 'we'," she said, "because it's impossible in this world to do anything without the help of someone else." Writer-director Norma Greenstein helped dress up the program with a bit of production that included some background notes on the singer. In addition, Miss Anderson sang a spiritual, "Sometimes I Feel Like A Motherless Child."

Withal, this show obviously fits very nicely within the "public service" concept many stations aim for but often miss. It goes without saying such interviews are of vast interest to WLIB's large Negro audience. Sanders, incidentally, eschewed the "Mike Wallace type" interview and kept things on a high, although non-controversial plane. Gilb.

VARIETY, and accused ABC of giving an erroneous impression about the incidence of Trendex reports. ABC's second ad carried an asterisked footnote which said the ad was based on the regular week Trendex report, Oct. 1-7 week for "all sponsored evening programs (excluding news and religious programming) for the prime evening hours—7:30-10:30 p.m." ABC irked Rogers by adding, a seemingly gratuitous remark: "Important: these figures are from the latest (and only) official Trendex reports available to the television industry . . . and not from a special study prepared for any specific network." Rogers objected to the fact that Trendex also does special studies and, in a clarification on his letter to NBC, said that ABC had given the impression at large that Trendex only had its regular all-industry reports to sell, which was not the case.

The special survey ABC shied away from was one done for NBC by Trendex for the week of the 8th. It was an NBC ad in the N.Y. Times, on Monday (20), a day which fell between ABC's first and second trade ads, which made use of the special Trendex report. Strengthened by Rogers who said that whether it be a regular Trendex or a special Trendex "the sample size is identical, the distribution . . . identical and the results . . . compared directly," NBC said its average program standings were higher than those of ABC's. Naturally, this equation was based on the Oct. 8 week report.

After the second ABC ad, which virtually denied the existence of a Trendex special report, NBC again retaliated, with another ad in the Times, dated Friday (24). Also using an advertising footnote, NBC printed, in the same bold type ABC used, this afterthought: "In the interests of integrity of industry research and the fair use of Trendex . . . we feel obligated to quote from a letter dated Oct.22 and signed by Robert B. Rogers." NBC's quotation laid special stress on a remark by Rogers that ABC's attitude toward the special Trendex was "inexcusable." To make sure that advertisers got the point, NBC veepee Don Durgin read the same letter to advertisers, agencies, affiliated stations and the press on the previous Thursday, during the annual network affliate meeting.

The NBC Times advertisements hinged largely on the point that it was the "leading network" on the strength of the Trendex Oct. 8-14 report. That report included a special by Bob Hope, which ABC was careful to stress, NBC did not say in print. With Hope, NBC pointed proudly to the fact it had a 6% greater audience than CBS, which it did not name according to the rules of the game, and a 35% greater audience than ABC, which it also did not name. ABC countered that when the Oct. 1-7 report failed to serve NBC's purposes, it made the "Hope report," but without the comedian's one-shot strength, NBC would have been behind CBS and "only fractions" (approximately 1 point, in fact) ahead of ABC on the averages. Not to be "out-countered," NBC replied that while it had Hope, the Oct. 1-8 week gave ABC Bing Crosby. Moreover, NBC said, many of its new programs didn't preem until the 8th.

ABC pointed out that the NBC averages were based on data at least as selective as its own. It left out the three sponsored weekly programs in the 10:30-11 time. An NBC exec countered this accusation by saying it was his "impression" that the 10:30 period, since it was local option time, was never included in its rating analyses.

NBC, on the other hand, based its case against ABC on the facts that (1) it virtually denied the existence of a second report and (2) it was being selective in the omission of Graham's low rated telecast.

Coyle's Followup

Still contentious about the major points at issue, ABC issued a release early this week, signed by veepee Donald W. Coyle. Coyle said his network did not imply the "Trendex data used in the advertising of another network is invalid, rather we have pointed out and wish to emphasize the period used by the other network differed from the regular rating week covered by the rating service's monthly reports." Coyle continued, "ABC used data from the regular Trendex report, and the two are not comparable. We feel that there is a definite difference between rating averages based on a period selected by the ratings services and averages for a period selected by a network."

After the appearance of Coyle's last statement, an NBC spokesman reiterated NBC's position. Major points were that (1) NBC inferred from ABC's ads that "audience and not commercial impact was what counted," and if that is to be the case, sez NBC, then all, say, the former DuMont network had to do, with its limited commercial schedule, was count the handful of sponsored programs it had and on that basis perhaps come up with higher ratings than the other webs who were counting all their shows. (2) Regardless of the yardstick used, NBC maintains, "NBC had audience supremacy for the full week of Oct. 8-14." (Even using ABC's commercial base, NBC adds, it runs 22% ahead of ABC). Last NBC point was that the initial ads by ABC was based on "incomplete information" and consequently NBC "was virtually forced in its own defense" to carry followup advertising.

In a last conciliatory effort, being caught in the middle, Trendex's Rogers issued still another letter, but this time to the entire industry. He stated, in effect, that ratings are ratings, only problem being that when networks use different bases for their studies, the resulting implications are bound to be different.

GATEWAYS TO THE MIND
With Frank Baxter, Bill Idelson, Lou Charles, Kark Swenson, Mason Curry, Peter Brown, Billy Barty, Bob Lynn, Peter Walker, Gil Perkins, Art Kendall
Producer-Director: Owen Crump (for Warners)
Writer: Henry F. Greenberg
Animation Director: Chuck Jones
60 Mins., Thurs. (23), 8 p.m.
BELL TELEPHONE
NBC-TV (film)
(N. W. Ayer)

Writer Henry F. Greenberg, with 13 full-fledged scientists to tap for counsel, delineated with total clarity and simplicity the function of the human senses for a mass nighttime audience. To use a standard line: It was entertaining as well as informative, although at times the presentation became precious in an effort to attract the juvenile audience.

"The Gateways To the Mind" was prepared for Bell Telephone by Warner Bros. reportedly under the personal supervision of Jack L. Warner, who inherited this prime time science series from Frank Capra. Like Capra before him and Walt Disney, who from time to time deals with these scientifics in his ABC series, the rather complicated scientific information was refined to its most interesting and essential characteristic and articulated as light entertainment. If there is to be any quibbling, it is with the method of entertainment. The series' regular host, Dr. Frank Baxter, whose regular pastime is English, was subjected to inane questions at times by his foils. The preciousness of questioning (somehow the Doctor's answers remained dignified), while obviously intended to keep pace with the presumed needs of moppets, was nonetheless a mark against the overall performance, which possibly a little more judiciousness could have wiped out.

Setting for the explanation of sight, hearing, smell, touch, and taste was the studio in which the show was being made, with various animators acting as stand-ins for scientists and cameramen, made to act kind of foolish, as the main foil to Baxter. Lining up the senses with parallel video techniques proved a very successful gimmick.

The animation, designed by Maurice Noble and directed by Chuck Jones, served its purpose well. The Noble designs were flexible and fit each specific need.

The key to the entire series is that Bell is one sponsor with a public conscience. It is willing to expend great sums for programming in prime time to give the general public a feel for science. Art.

ORIGINAL AMATEUR HOUR
With Ted Mack, others
Producer: Lewis Graham
Directors: Lloyd Marx, J. Robert Blum
30 Mins., Sun. 5:30 p.m.
PHARMACEUTICALS
CBS-TV, from N. Y.
(Parkson Adv. Agency, Inc.)

Ted Mack's Amateur Hour is a show that the networks can't displace. With it's new season on CBS-TV, this show had made a round-robin of all the circuits. Seemingly, the industry has learned to live with it. Perhaps the reason is that it has a base in popular support, and always finds a sponsor. Geritol has been with it for some time now.

Another reason is perhaps the inevitability of a vestigal bit of ham in virtually any viewer, and but for the grace of Major Bowes, he perhaps could be on a national network juggling spoons or playing the washboard. This kind of viewer is perhaps glad to see somebody trying to break out from the mold of orthodoxy.

The inaugural show on CBS was made up of champs. It's starting on the highest level that the show can reach. The votes coming in by mail will determine the final winner. There was thus a more genteel type of entertainment.

Ted Mack had an assortment of Irish tenors, a male contralto, an accordion player introed as a Hungarian Freedom fighter, a song and dance man in Army uniform, a 12-year-old boy soprano, a romantic couple singing from "The Student Prince" and a group of youngsters in a square dance. There was something for everybody and the artful pitch for votes from each of them would be pretty hard to resist for anyone on a Geritol jag.

The show is now in its 11th year on video and it's 25 years since the late Maj. Mowes first spun the wheel and rang the gong. Mack has taken the cruelty out of the show and given it an aura of respectability. At least the tyros are starting off better than they used to even if there's not as many jobs open to them in the professional world. Jose.

GEORGE BURNS SHOW
With Bea Bernadaret, Harry Von Zell, Larry Keating, Ronnie Burns, others
Producer-Director: Rod Amateau
Writers: Norman Paul, Keith Fowler, Harvey Helm, William Burns
30 Mins., Tues., 9 p.m.
COLGATE
NBC-TV (film)
(McCann-Erickson)

George Burns should sue his writers for breach of promise. There was a lot of promise in the peg "What will George do now that Gracie's retired?" but it was never adequately fulfilled in the material handed Burns on the opening segment of his new series. There were a few laughs, to be sure, but not enough for a strong teeoff for Burns as a "single."

Burns has a prime 9 p.m. time slot, and he'll need yarns with more substance, more heart and less of the tradey angle to post a sizeable rating.

First seg opened with Burns and his pals pondering what he should do now that Gracie's left show biz, and they came up with the answer he should be a producer. He buys a private eye property and proceeds with a casting. Here the writers attempted a satire on the private orbs, but missed. When a pal (Bob Cummings) advises him he's bought a turkey, Burns gets out of the deal by telling the writer they're going to eat at Romanoff's with a seal! That's not much meat to deliver a comedian with the ability of Burns. On the way, there were a couple of humorous sequences, one with Jack Benny giving his opinion on Burns going it alone; the other featuring a slinky, slithering, sexy blonde (Lisa Davis).

On the whole, however, the show lacked spark and imagination. Burns' format is still a question-mark, since the first stanza didn't go beyond the "now I'm a producer-now I'm not" idea. Providing okay support were Benny, Bob Cummings in a brief bit, Bea Benadaret, Larry Keating, Harry Von Zell and Ronnie Burns, of the B&A gang; Miss Davis as the siren, and John Stephenson.

Writers are Norman Paul, Keith Fowler, Harvey Helm and William Burns. Direction of producer Rod Amateau was okay. Daku.

RED CHINA: THE GROWING CHALLENGE
With Arthur Van Horn, host-narrator; William Worthy, Ed Hochman
Producer: Marlene Sanders
Director: Al Kassel
Writer: Herbert Dorfman
30 Mins.; Wed. (22), 9 p.m.
WNEW-TV, N.Y.

An interesting half-hour on New China was telecast last Wed. (22) night by indie WNEW-TV. Show, using film clips and interview format, could have been of greater interest had the producer not muffed part of the story.

The film clips were obtained by the writing-photographic team of Ed Hochman and Larry Moyer. These two young men, both anti-Communists, had been living in Paris when they were offered a cheap tour of Russia, if they attended the World Youth Festival last spring. They made the trek, extending it to China. Moyer became a U.P. correspondent on the trip, doubling with Hochman in taking the China footage.

Host-narrator Arthur Van Horn, prior to showing the film clips, had Hochman as a live guest. Much was made of the fact that the footage about to be seen represented a rarity, U.S. newsreel companies and newsmen being barred from Red China. But how Hochman got into Red China wasn't touched upon.

The footage itself was only fair. There was some good shots, especially of the children and the life in the river boats. But there also were undistinguished segments. What also was lacking in the footage was some thematic line. Narrator Van Horn tried to supply it with words, hardly a substitute for the pictures.

To roundup the program, William Worthy, the U.S. correspondent who defied to State Department ban and travelled to Red China, was the second live guest. Again Worthy's troubles with the State Department was bypassed. Lack of inside information about Maoland is part of the China story.

Station, which will offer another half-hour tonight (Wed.) on Red China, using additional filmed material of Hochman and Moyer, could have gotten a stronger program across. Personalities also make the news. Yet, the DuMont indie evidences boldness in slotting such public service programs in prime evening hours. Horo.

PURSUIT
With Sal Mineo, MacDonald Carey, Stu Erwin, Vivian Nathan, Carol Lynley, Robert H. Harris
Exec Producer: Norman Felton
Producer: Herbert Hirschman
Writer: Adrian Spies
60 Mins.; Wed., 8 p.m.
MENNEN CO. (alternate weeks)
CBS-TV, from Hollywood
(Grey, Warwick & Legler)

This new dramatic series got off to a promising start last Wednesday night (22) with a sharply produced play. Titled "The Vengeance," the script by Adrian Spies used some formula ideas, but the final result was a hardhitting melter that was fast-paced, credibly motivated and excellently performed. If this show can maintain the level of the opener, it should be a potent contender in the ratings sweepstakes.

The plot had the form of a double chase, in line with the overall title of the series. Sal Mineo, as a tough teenager, was the pivotal character hunted both a city detective with an obsessive hatred for him, and a pair of killers. The coup hounds Mineo for crippling his son in a fight, while the killers want him because he witnessed a murder they committed.

The interplay of story lines was handled in direct style with only a very slight overlay of psychological probing. MacDonald Carey portrayed the detective with a persuasive hardness while Mineo played the incipient hoodlum with his usual flair for this type of role.

The standout performance of the play, however, was turned in by Vivian Nathan, as Mineo's mother. Her evocation of the dreariness and hopelessness of a slum-bound mother of a delinquent and wife of a drunkard was a memorable exercise in realism. She was supplied with a script that struck a perfectly accurate note. Also contributing fine portraits were Stu Erwin, as a level-headed detective; Carol Lynley, as Mineo's romantic interest; Robert H. Harris, as the latter's father, and several other minor players.

Attention to the small part characterizations was typical of a first-class production, that extended from the settings through the camera work to the jazzed-up background scoring. Telecast on tape, the show had all of the immediacy of a live dramatic show.

Mennen, the alternate week sponsor of this series, had plugs scattered liberally throughout the show. Program is still looking for a second bankroller. Herm.

TV Gets a Healthy On-the-Air Going Over By Some Bigtime Pros

Practicing what he has preached for quite some time, David Susskind last week (21) turned in a fascinating and wholly enjoyable "Open End" show on WNTA-TV, Newark. It was adult, it was literate, the conversation flowed smoothly and the participants—Peter Glenville, Leland Hayward and Faye Emerson, along with Susskind himself, of course—not only knew what they were talking about, but injected into their gabfest the kind of informality and sense of humor that's so frequently missing from this type program.

After a false start, "Open End" now appears to have hit its stride, and if the current quality is maintained it certainly deserves network airing. A good deal of the plus factors on "Open End" last week must be traced directly to Susskind himself.

He has a most pleasant personality and an uncanny knack for getting a conversation going. Certainly, he's the most candid moderator any panel show on tv has ever had; what's more, he has a definite and intelligent point-of-view, which he manages to express in convincing terms without seeming to impose it on his guests. The fact that his views aren't necessarily complimentary to the medium he happens to be discussing—ears of tv executives who may have been listening to last week's "Open End" must have been burning—adds to make this one of the most refreshing gab shows on the air.

Of course, Susskind did some clever "casting" for his show. Glenville, the British film and legit director, has the looks of an actor and the mind of the intellectual, without being stuffy about it. His asides, on such subjects as tv in the U.S. (there's too much of it), legit and films not only had validity, but were genuinely funny

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY
(The Red Sell: The Propaganda Mill)
With Walter Cronkite, narrator; Daniel Schorr, others

Associate Producer: Isaac Kleinerman
Writers: Marvin L. Kalb, Marshall Flaum
30 Mins., Sun., 6:30 p.m.
PRUDENTIAL
CBS-TV, from N. Y.
(Reach, McClinton)

CBS-TV's "Twentieth Century" Prudential-sponsored series out of the network's Public Affairs shop, premiered for the new season on Sunday (26) with the first of a two-part documentation of "The Red Sell." It was a compelling visual documentation of the highly aggressive, supercharged propaganda mill of the Soviet hierarchy in its relentless cold war against the West and in proclaiming to the underdeveloped countries of the world that the future lies in the Soviet way.

In terms of translating to the American populace the shattering impact and brilliance of the Red propaganda machinery in virtually all areas of advancement (technically, culturally, economically, etc.), Russia can henceforth forgive CBS all its past "transgressions," so skillful a job was accomplished in this 30-minute initial installment in detailing the "mass persuasion" capabilities of the Soviet toward influencing the minds of men.

Producer Burton Benjamin and his staff of editors and cameramen, along with narrator Walter Cronkite and reporter Daniel Schorr turned in a swift and meaty half-hour documentation, backed by some remarkable film footage, to demonstrate the cleverness of the Soviet Union in manipulating the thoughts of peoples around the globe. It showed how Russia grinds out its 325 propagandists a year; the perfection with which its movies can make a mockery out of a Versailles treaty; the tremendous impact of its literature; the devious ways it can jam free nation broadcasts (spending more in their jamming operations than the U.S. does for all its overseas broadcasts); again through the medium of the movies it showed how effectively Russia can convince its people that Americans are drunkards, looters and degenerates.

In its portrayal of the World Youth Festival (these were particularly engrossing clips) it demonstrated the profound impression made on the visiting youth of the world; of its "we lead the good life" propagandizing as it jockeys for political advantage (in its equal welcome to all dignitaries, whether obscure or top level) and finally Sputnik ushering in a whole new era in the taunting of the west and the play for the neutral countries as Krushchev & Co. even outclassed the Sputnik feat in the subsequent propaganda campaign.

It was so real and effective that it was frightening. Rose.

THIN MAN

30 Mins., Frl., 9:30 P.M.
COLGATE-PALMOLIVE
NBC-TV (film)
(Ted Bates)

To those who remember the old William Powell-Myrna Loy feature pix of the same title, this half hour "Thin Man" is bound to be disappointing.

This is an average video whodunit—or possibly a step below average—without too much suspense, and with rather standard and sometimes even obvious plot situations, and plenty of cliches.

Story concerned Nick and Nora Charles moving into a brownstone house, only to learn that a woman had been murdered there, although her body had never been found. Twenty five teevee minutes and some contrived gags, fights, private-eyeing later, it expectedly turned out that the woman hadn't been murdered, but her husband was planning the crime for insurance.

As Nick Charles, Peter Lawford was sometimes urbane, often supercilious, while Phyllis Kirk as his wife tended to ham it up greatly. Balance of the cast did a competent job with the material at hand.

C-P commercials were possibly more entertaining than the first episode of the new season. Don.

(J. Walter Thompson)

"Omnibus" has returned to tv for its seventh go-round (though trimmed this season to an hour display) and under reduced sponsorship auspices, with Aluminium Ltd. of Canada as the sole bankroller. The fact that "Omnibus" is back is one of the commendable aspects of a semester overburdened with trivia. But the fact that producer-packager Robert Saudek chose to kick off the new Sunday afternoon season with his visual examination of "Capital Punishment" offers a debatable point.

Designed as "an examination of society in its role as executioner," with an old "Omnibus" favorite, Boston lawyer Joseph N. Welch as the on-camera "guide," its resort to histrionics and questionable episodes in extracting the last ounce of horror from condemning a man to the electric chair, or a hanging or a lethal chamber, could only create the impression that "Omnibus" was hellbent on matching the sensationalism of the conventional show that characterizes prime nighttime tv.

One can question the motive in projecting the issue of capital punishment within this "Omnibus" framework of displaying all the gory details. (Which makes understandable host Alastair Cooke's repeated "apology" to the parents of kids, but nevertheless doesn't excuse it).

The entire issue is a moral one, or one of the essential value of the death sentence as a crime deterrent. Taken from there, with a clinical examination and espousal by Welch of the various aspects of capital punishment in helping the viewer determine whether human conduct has kept pace with other social advances, it might have made for some fascinating viewing.

But unfortunately barrister Welch was relegated to secondary interest as "Omnibus" went off the deep end in its assorted drama vignettes and documentation just one step this side of some of tv's lowercase vidpix entries. Welch did pose in a quiet, composed and detached manner some provocative questiors as to right or wrong, guilt or justice; or shall we return to public executions (illustrating as examples Italy during Mussolini, Germany during Hitler and the Soviet Union returning to it in '54). But that's as far as it went. "Omnibus," for that matter, couldn't quite seem to make up its mind just where and how it did want to go—winding up with the employment of a lot of actors and with some horrendous episodes in depicting the latest fashions in executions through a couple of centuries (though presumably this was the updated story of killer "Joe Grimes.")

A moving documentary, perhaps, but one which walked the last mile as a tv counterpart of yellow journalism. Rose.

WAYNE & SHUSTER HOUR
With Denny Vaughan, Joan Fairfax, Paul Kligman, Sylvia Lennick, Robinson Trio, Samuel Hersenhorem Orch, others Producer-Director: Don Hudson
60 Mins., Fri., 8 p.m.
EVEREADY FLASHLIGHTS, ANACIN, JOHNSON'S WAX
CBC-TV, from Toronto
(Stanfield, Johnson & Hill; Y&R; Needham, Louis & Brorby)

For their fourth season on Canadian tv, Wayne & Shuster teed off Friday night for 48 coast-to-coast stations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. for five monthly 60 min. shows, this in addition to their Ed Sullivan program appearances. In Canada, it's the same format and personnel as last season, with The Robinson Trio added. All of the principals will be on all five of the Wayne & Shuster shows this season.

Canadian comedy team presented three satires—"Wide, World Underworld," "The Professor" and "Mark of Zero," again showing choice of nomenclature. All scored, with the first a kidding of current tv gangster series as scatterbrained Wayne & Shuster headed a crime syndicate, complete with weather forecast on successful bank holdup possibilities; Wayne as a dialectic fashion expert, with Shuster on the mike as questioner, this

We can hardly contain ourselves

Only last week, in these historic pages, two mighty networks squared off in a conflict of claims. The fur fairly flew. The combatants fired deadly footnotes at each other, and somebody, 'tis said, got hopping mad. Today we are met in harmony and peace. For mighty Nielsen has spoken out.

We have been up to our ears, these past days, in the October Nielsen Report. And be it assured: it points to the most tremendous fall season (by far!) in all the history of television. More hours programmed. More sets tuned in. More – many more! – people watching.

Nielsen, with lavish hand, bestows credit on all three networks . . . but the bulk of it on ABC.

So far this fall, the frost is on nobody but the pumpkin. In one year ABC's audience, per average evening program, has increased by 1,277,000 homes – a thumping leap of 22%! Another network has added 877,000 homes – a jump of 10%. The third network has added 514,000 homes – up 6%. In other words, ABC has added almost as many homes as the other two networks combined!

Naturally, we (and our advertisers) are feeling expansive.

VARIETY-TELEPULSE CITY-BY-CITY PROGRAM CHART.

VARIETY's weekly chart is based on the 22 major markets regularly reported by Telepulse each month, in addition to 133 other Telepulse tabulated U.S. markets, covered over the course of a year. Cities will be rotated weekly. The VARIETY chart is a compilation of data on syndicated films, as well as network and live programs, in each market. Under the top 10 multi-weekly heading, the (†) stands for local programming and the (*) for network shows.

VARIETY-PULSE FEATURE CHART

VARIETY's weekly chart, based on ratings furnished by Pulse's latest reports on feature films and their competition covers 155 markets. Each week, two different markets will be listed, with the 10 top-rated features tabulated.

Factors which would assist distributors, agencies, stations and advertisers in determining the effectiveness of a feature show in a specific market have been included in this VARIETY chart. Listed below is such pertinent information regarding features as their stars, release year, original production company and the present distributor included wherever possible along with the title. Attention should be paid to such factors as the time and day, the high and low ratings for the measured feature period and share of audience, since these factors reflect the effectiveness of the feature and audience composition, i.e., a late show at 11:15 p.m. would hardly have any children viewers, but its share of audience may reflect dominance in that time period. In the cities where stations sell their feature programming on a multi stripped basis utilizing the same theatrical throughout the week a total rating for the total number of showings for the week is given, the total rating not taking into account the duplicated homes factor. Barring unscheduled switches in titles the listed features for the particularly rated theatrical filmed show are as accurate as could be ascertained. Under Time Slot, S. O. stands for Sign-Off.

84% clearance in the 10-12 morning period, 80% in the afternoon block, and 76% at night. "Monitor" pulls down 80% clearance.

4. CBS, Culligan said, has been forced for the first time to set up a merchandising operation in order to effectively compete with NBC's local-national sales tie-in campaigns, which have netted NBC's affiliates a total of 5,000 spots from retail outlets of the national advertisers used.

Culligan also outlined some new razzle-dazzlers in the way of marketing, involving the new "memory-vision" concept which is designed to impress on advertisers the effectiveness of various types of sound in creating emotional impact in the mind of the listener, and a followup concept designed not to move goods off the store shelves, but off the pantry shelves at home.

On the programming end, he announced pacting of the "Burns & Allen" capsule series as part of the web's "Stardust" group, a series of comprehensive "Image" reports, first of which is a 30-40 hour report on Russia (see separate stories), and "Stardust Analysis," series of capsules in which the web's top personalities will do commentary on subjects other than news. Included in the latter are Dave Garroway, David Brinkley, Leo Durocher and Marlene Dietrich.

Radio Affiliates' meeting was hosted by Harry Bannister, veep for station relations, with George A. Graham Jr., director of sales planning, discussing the "Summer Time Is Outdoor Eating Time" campaign and stressing the current "Fall Food Promotion Campaign" as well as the effectiveness of the "National-Local Plan" wherein closed circuit broadcasts with local dealers in attendance produced results.

Dr. Thomas E. Coffin, director of NBC Radio Network Research, recounted the research survey of Universal CIT Credit Corp.'s participations in "Monitor." Familiarity with sponsor's services more than doubled among listeners according to the research study, Dr. Coffin said.

Harvey Heads AM Affils

George W. Harvey, veep and general manager of WFLA, Tampa, was chosen chairman of the NBC Radio affiliates board of delegates and officers.

Douglas Manship, prexy of WJBO, Baton Rouge, was elected secretary-treasurer. Members of the board are David M. Baltimore, prexy and general manager of WBRE Wilkes-Barre; William Grant, prexy of KOA, Denver; Harold Hough, director, WBAP, Fort Worth; Willard Schroeder, prexy and gen. manager, WOOD, Grand Rapids; Frank Gaither, gen. manager, Atlanta; Ralph Evans, veep, WOC, Davenport, and William E. Goetze, gen. manager, KFSD, San Diego.

Baltimore, Grant, Hough and Schroeder were re-elected to the board.

their backs because they're having a tough time."

Actually, only one major affiliate demand rose up during the meetings. Another, that the web foot the bill for taped delays in daylight savings areas, was granted even before the affiliate arrived at the Hotel Plaza for the sessions, with the web capitulating on that point.

Affiliates demanded that NBC create a minimum of 15 90-second station breaks per week during daytime. Basis of the demand was the station contention that daytime advertisers want minute spots more than any other type of buy, and that CBS-TV has already granted its affiliate body the 90-second breaks. Idea would be to cut three strip shows short by one minute, giving the stations a minute, 20-second and 10-second ID in each case.

Another lesser demand was that the web extend all station breaks from 30 to 32 seconds, enabling the stations to program more promos and make their station ID's "cleaner."

RCA Decree

"reasonable" royalty rates for the next 10 years.

(2) All other patents now held in the field by RCA will be made available without licensing charges. Future patents acquired by RCA in the next 10 years will be available on the same "reasonable" royalty bases.

One of the complaints against RCA was its practice of licensing patents only in packages, which might or might not suit the needs of licensees.

Consent decree was announced by William P. Rogers, the U.S. Attorney General, who called it "one of the department's most important anti-trust cases." Also commenting on it was Victor H. Hansen, head of the Justice Department's anti-trust division, who said the judgment "cut through the jungle of patent and patent rights and makes them available to the entire industry."

Signing the decree for RCA were Robert Werner, John T. Cahill and special counsel Bernard Segal. David Sarnoff, RCA board chairman, and John L. Burns, prexy said, "RCA welcomes the determination of this long and burdensome litigation."

"Terms of the decree," said the RCA officers, "deal primarily with apparatus for radio purposes. They do not affect RCA's present activities in the important new industrial fields, such as automation, electronic computers, atomics, electronic tape recorders, electrofax and medical electronics."

The patent pool established by the Federal judge and okayed by the Justice Department will include what RCA describes as its "important" color patents and the color patents of other pool participants.

Ed & Pegeen in Shift To New Playbill Room

A last-minute decision by William Zeckendorf Jr. to shift Ed & Pegeen Fitzgerald into the new Playbill room of the Hotel Manhattan, twin hostelry to the Astor, caused WOR and AT&T into a rush job over the weekend so that the Mr. & Mrs. team could originate from its new spot. The Fitzgeralds, long in the Hunting Room of the Astor, will continue their luncheon broadcasts from The Playbill, a Melanie Kahane-designed show biz room (as the name implies) which was given a theatrical premiere Sunday night (26) with show biz personalities as invitees.

The managing director of Hotel Commodore, another in the expanding Zeckendorf operations, has also made a bid for the Fitzgeralds to originate either AM or tv from the East 42d St. spot.

Boston — WHDH, WHDH-TV, Hub's newest tv station, Channel 5, is going into a brand new station, to be constructed on Morrissey Blvd. Ground for the new studios and office bldg. was broken Thursday (23). Construction is starting immediately.

Inside Stuff—Radio-TV

WCBS-TV's "Right Now" show last Saturday (25) in which the four candidates for governor of N.Y. met face-to-face, achieved a rating for the hour of 14.8 (Arbitron) which is deemed high for any public service or political show. Rating beat all opposition including WRCA-TV's "Brains and Brawn," news and "Movie Four" in each quarter hour. Press coverage of the event was heavy with Trib printing a WCBS-TV-supplied transcript in full. Station preempted "Sea Hunt" and moved back the start of "The Late News" and "The Late Show" half an hour in order to present the program. Major attraction appeared to be Nelson Rockefeller, GOP candidate for governor, who was "counseled" by one Pat Weaver. Latter was doing for Rockefeller what another former NBC personality, Robert Montgomery, is in the habit of doing for President Eisenhower when the latter takes to the airlanes.

Sterling (Red) Quinlan, ABC veep in Chi, whose just-published Doubleday novel, "The Merger," is getting a publicity buildup from his publisher, is in New York on the ballyhoo pitch. He is also huddling with his agent, Annie Laurie Williams, on a play which the broadcasting exec has in work.

Doubleday bookstores had Quinlan yesterday (Tues.) on a publicity whirl and tonght (Wed.) Ruth and Maxwell Aley are "pouring" for the press and tv bunch at their home.

Federal Trade Commission's attitude toward radio-tv commercials will undoubtedly come under scrunity during FTC Chairman John W. Gwynne's address at initial Radio-TV Executives' Society Round Table luncheon today (Wed.) at Hotel Roosevelt, N.Y.

This marks first of seven such luncheons to be staged by Sam Cooke Digges, Round Table committee chairman and general manager of WCBS-TV.

Gwynne recently charged Congressional investigators with headline hunting, slander mongering and general irresponsibility.

After having had to delay a Pittsburgh onward-and-upward pitch since early October, because of a hotel employees strike there, ABC has rescheduled it for tomorrow (Thurs.) and is flying out members of the trade press to view the Cellomatic presentation along with several hundred Pittsburgh agencymen and advertisers.

ABC-TV's prexy Oliver Treyz, and AB-PT boss Leonard H. Goldenson will speak at the meeting on the theme "Business Builds Business." The ABC Pitt affiliate is WTAE, which went on the air in September, making that market the last of the top 25 cities to get three stations.

Membership rolls of Radio Television News Directors Assn. have risen to an alltime high of 550 after the 13th annual convention that ended a week ago in Chicago. With such speakers as Edward R. Murrow, Meade Alcorn and Paul Butler as lure, the 1958 parley of RTNDA was attended by almost 500, including 243 members and 63 wives, making it the biggest convention of the association to date.

The BBC has commissioned two works of art for the Television Centre now being erected at Shepherds Bush, London. One is a mosaic mural by John Piper which will feature an abstract pattern in brilliant color. The other is a fountain, which will be erected in the central garden of the main block, which comes into use in 1960.

"We guess we'd better liquidate our biz in view of these competitive items." Among other things, they had in mind is the battery-operated portable tv receivers that would be brought into cars, on the beach and other public gathering points.

Gen. David Sarnoff, who was on hand to greet the press and affiliate reps, hastened to assure the audience that AM, once a thing of the past, now is a thing of the future because of the advent of stereo sound.

Bob Sarnoff, chairman of the NBC Board, in introducing his father, referred to the latter as a "gentleman." This moved Gen. Sarnoff to remark: "It's a compliment to have a son refer to his father as a gentleman."

Gen. Sarnoff, in a reminiscent mood, recalled a recent meeting of his with Dr. Lee DeForest, inventor of radio and the man who put the grid in the vacuum tube, the basis of all that followed. "A pioneer is a man who makes money for others." Gen. Sarnoff said, noting that Dr. DeForest "is not too flush" nor was Marconi.

Hosts at the RCA Labs included James Hillier, veep; Irving Wolf, veep of research, and Humboldt W. Leverenz, assistant director of Research.

right to put on the onetime entry.

Texaco, in a $4,500,000 potential deal, wanted to latch on to "Man of the Hour" but nixed the pilot offering, resulting in a no-deal impasse. On the other hand, CBS execs were so bullish as to the comedy potential of the initial runoff that they just couldn't see writing it off without exposure. Eastman-Kodak was the answer.

Washington—Mutual Broadcasting System moved Monday (27) into more spacious, more attractive Washington studios, giving up a floor of a downtown office building for a wing of the Sheraton-Park Hotel.

The Day My Husband Heard His Own Funeral Service!

By Pat Carroll

If my husband, Lee Karsian, ever complains that his job at the William Morris Agency lacks excitement, I just remind him that he had more excitement by the age of 19 than most men do in a lifetime. It happened during World War II, when Lee was a radioman aboard the cruiser Honolulu. When a torpedo ripped a hole in his ship during the Battle of Leyte, Lee was trapped in a tiny radio shack. Over the intercom he heard his mates preparing to abandon the sinking ship. At one point he passed out. When he awoke, Lee heard the chaplain reading his funeral service!

The whole story of Lee's 20 hours of terror is told in an exciting article, "Trapped!", in the November READER'S DIGEST. I know that all of Lee's friends—and mine—will want to read it. The November Digest is at your newsstands now.

with a beauty parade; and the zany pair in "The Adventures of Zero," a hilarious takeoff of the "Mark of Zorro," set in the California of 1836.

With Wayne & Shuster doing their own writing, trio of satires were all swift-paced, fresh and funny. The comedians never lost out on their three sketches and their work continues in fast routines and lines without any comedy letup. (One of their biggest laughs was having frozen-faced Sullivan, via kinescope, take a bow from the audience.)

For their costume changes, plus variety injection, the series had blond Joan Fairfax straight-singing "It Could Happen to You," with the Boyd Robinson Trio (two boys in top-hats and tails, girls in furs and briefies) in for a dance specialty; and Denny Vaughan at the grand and singing his own accompaniment to "They Can't Take That Away from Me," with Vaughan and Fairfax back for a neat minstrel medley in straw hats and sticks.

It was a fast 60-min. teeoff, interspersed by brief commercials, with Wayne & Shuster, plus the entire cast, excellent throughout on a swift show that had the expert backgrounding of the Sammy Hersenhoren orch of 30 and the directional speed of Don Hudson, together with the timing and professional know-how of Wayne & Shuster. McStay.

FRAN ALLISON SHOW
With Frazier Thomas, Robert Trendler Orch (21), Gary Mann, others
Producer-Director: Bud Ellingwood
Associate Producers: Sheldon Cooper, Bill Brevall
Writer: Frank Hart
60 Mins., Mon.-Fri., 10 a.m.
PARTICIPATING
WGN-TV, Chicago

If Fran Allison were an unknown quantity it might be excusable that WGN-TV doesn't seem to know quite what to do with her, now that she's dotted for a cross-the-board stanza in the ayem. Miss Allison is a video pro if ever the Windy City airwaves bred one. Still remembered from her long "Kukla, Fran & Ollie" term are her qualities of charm and gentility, her talent to sing touchingly, and her ability to adlib with wit. Seemingly, any producer equipped with such talent ought to have it made.

Miss Allison's fate, however, is to be strapped in one of those rickety audience participation vehicles that makes the least of her talents. Most regrettable is the fact that the star is capable of upgrading the intellectual and taste level of daytime television but finds herself cast in a strictly lowbrow enterprise.

Apart from the fact that little, if anything, consequential transpires in the hour, the show suffers from two patent excesses—too many interviews and too much Frazier Thomas. The interviews betray a lack of ideas at the braintrust level of the program. When the singer has done his bit and the chitchat weakens, what is there to do but call up one of the ladies from the audience and kick it around about life in Podunk? As for Thomas, he could foil Miss Allison splendidly if he were not so often on camera. Thomas is a voluble, good-natured, hearty-laughing assistant who has a tendency to upstage and a more deplorable one to get over-solicitous. He cloys quickly.

Miss Allison's part in the show is to exchange trivia with Thomas, conduct the interviews, introduce guests and occasionally sing a song. There's the old cup-carrying game with a prize for the woman who can carry the biggest stack, and the ladies of Niles High School PTA, plugging their forthcoming benefit show, gave out with a gratis demonstration of the Charleston. Gary Mann, who guested as male vocalist last week, contributes a couple of songs in okay fashion. (They're still using that oldhat stunt of bringing on a girl from up front so the boy can warble a love song.)

Occasionally makeup artist Sid Simon comes on to show what miracles makeup can perform, and also occasionally book reviewers like Florence Burke-Ellis make with recommendations for the latest in John P. Marquand.

More of what's needed, as long as the show is mired in interviews, are conversations like the one Miss Allison conducted last Thursday (24) with a woman from Ceylon, who showed how the sari was worn and talked about child rearing in her country.

Withal, it's a show that merits casual tunein for the star but is hardly made of the stuff that infects the dialer with habit. Les.

TV's Going-over

in the (expected) sophisticated way.

Hayward is a well-known show biz figure, though he expressed some strange views on the show. (Actors don't draw, you must give the public what it wants, etc.) Whatever the wisdom of his position, and he appeared to contradict himself a couple of times, it was well expressed and helped to give the show spark and life.

But, when all was said and done, it was still Susskind who emerged as the most interesting participant. He demonstrated, for instance, that tv was virtually saturated with westerns, and deplored the lack of balance between "popular" programming aiming at the lowest common audience denominator, and the good shows. Path of least resistance will ruin tv, he maintained.

There were some nice personal touches in "Open End," apart from the fact that the guests treated one another and their various opinions with obvious respect. When coffee was served, and only three cups came to the table, Susskind quipped: "This would never happen on a network show. But, of course, here we are on a local station."

"Open End" had the quality of a group of intelligent, witty people sitting around informally in someone's living room, mulling over "the arts." That kind of easy atmosphere is rarely achieved on tv. If Susskind can keep it up, he should grab off a large and grateful audience for his show. Hift.

Japan TV

lion sets soon;" Katz continued. "Two million sets here are the equivalent of four or five million in any other country. I've never seen anything like sets in parks like they have here. All that does is increase the number of viewers. The important thing is the viewer count, not so much as the set count."

Katz spent two weeks in Japan negotiating sales for AAP. Huddles are being continued by local AAP rep Leon Britton.

Bulk of AAP sales come from the Warner and Monogram libraries which have contributed heavily toward giving the company a gross of $48 million since about two years ago when they acquired the WB films.

Time has not diminished the demand, Katz indicated. "In America, there is a tremendous shortage now. Feature films are repeated and repeated. In some major cities the same films have been shown 10 times. And there are cities where the libraries have played four different stations.

"Feature films do something the half-hour film can't do," Katz asserted. "They have the star value and production value that can't be matched. Don't get me wrong, there are many good half-hour films, but there's no comparison with feature films. And features are wonderful for the station too, giving them a chance for six, seven and eight sponsors."

and other benefits, and it was suggested this be attempted through SPG, but that guild stated it was not formed as a collective bargaining group, and would not seek such benefits.

TPG will seek a basic agreement in the industry, and a steering committee has been named to head the group until it has a general membership meeting within 30 days to elect officers. Ben Brady, producer of the "Perry Mason" series, is chairman of the committee, and other members are Cecil Barker, George Cahan, David Dortort, Ben Feiner, James Fonda, Alex Gruenberg, Hal Hudson, Roy Huggins, Richard Irving (resigned), Charles Isaacs, Sheldon Leonard, Ralph Levy, Nat Perrin, Edgar Peterson and Darrell Ross. N.Y. rep on the committee is Mort Abrahams.

Ritchie Paine has been named labor administrator for the guild, and Judge Lester Roth is counsel.

Eligible for membership are individuals responsibly connected with the production of live and filmed shows telecast globally, nationally or regionally.

While the group now has only a Coast setup, it's planninf to establish one in N.Y. following the membership meeting.

TPG members feel that directors are part of the management area in that they in some instances hire and fire, yet through Screen Directors Guild they draw residuals. While some of its members own pieces of series and some are exec producers considered part of management, the guild feels they are not definitely in the area of "pure" management, and consequently entitled to benefits.

Tele Follow-Up Comment

Person to Person

This was showbiz night, the glittering past and the hopeful, pregnant present, as vividly reflected by Rozicka (Rosie) Dolly and Roger Williams on Edward R. Murrow's Friday (24) drop-in-on-the-neighbor program over CBS-TV.

The contrast in personalities was most effective and made for first rate human interest viewing: Rosie Dolly living like a silken dowager dame in tufted surroundings with abundant memories of riotously rich stage door admirers and also knee-deep in precious gems, and Roger Williams, the young and gifted pianist-composer, with his clean-cut, devoted wife and mother of two children.

Murrow opened this edition of "Person to Person" with a peep into the posh Park Avenue apartment of the remaining sister of the onetime famed Dolly Sisters. Miss Dolly, who was raised in the Bronx after a brief stay in Hungary, was ensconsed in a peau de soie gown, cap-sleeved and off the shoulder, with the sculptured bodice criss-crossing into an Empire. The opulent bell-shaped skirt ended in intriguing knots at each side of the hemline. She was weighted down with a heavy, glittery three-strand necklace and long-drop two-strand earrings. She also wore a wide matching bracelet. On her bosom she displayed a stunning brooch in the form of a flower basket, a gift from her late husband. With her adornments and the severity of her centre-parted coiffure tightly drawn into a full, low chigon, she was indeed a dramatic sight on the video screen.

She told Murrow she was working on a book and currently engaged in charity work. She recounted how she broke the bank at Monte Carlo, running a paltry $10 bill up to the tidy sum of $500,000. She spoke of her sister, Jenny (Yanci) Dolly, and recalled showbiz encounters with Rudolph Valentino, Maurice Chevalier, Marlene Dietrich and others.

The visit to the Williams home opened with the pianist working on an arrangement of "Warsaw Concerto" and then segued to the living room where his wife and two children were at a piano-shaped coffee table. Williams, open-faced, friendly, articulate, gave an amusing account of his wedding day. The program closed with Williams and one of his daughters doing a Halloween piece on the piano with mother and other daughter looking on. There was an air of wholesomeness and fresh entertainment in this segment of the program. Rans.

Steve Allen Show

After Steve Allen made the usual vaudeo concession to the teenage viewer with a Laura Leslie vocal of "Lollipops and Lipstick," a banal juve disk item, the Sunday (26) stanza got down to adult fare that turned out to be a neat blending of spoof and song that made for enjoyable viewing.

In addition to his indispensable team of regulars, Louis Nye, Tom Poston and Pat Harrington Jr., Allen brought in Peter Ustinov to build up the comedy element. Ustinov did a satire on politicos, English, American gangster and Nazi style that built yocks easily and also toyed with a takeoff of an "Omnibus" program that used the Dave Brubeck Quartet straight and to good effect and built laughs via a parody of progressive jazz group headed by Allen. Also in the comedic vein were Allen's "Report To The Nation" on the moon rocket and the "Question Man" bit. Both good for strong laughs.

The musical end was neatly taken care of by Dorothy Collins who set up a nice mood with "Lover" and "But Not For Me" and by Warren Covington leading the Tommy Dorsey orch through a rehash of his Decca click, "The Tea For Two Cha Cha." Latter number had Augie & Margo leading a line through the Latino beat.

Unusual aspect of Miss Collins' stint was that Allen plugged her "Hit Parade" show, which is now on "another network" and her Coral album, "Picnic." Thrush has scrammed the Coral roster for a shot with the newly-formed Everest label while Allen, also a one-time Coralite, is now recording for Dot. Gros.

Desilu Playhouse

There were corns, rather heavy ones, attached to the hour-long Desilu filmed production of "Debut" with Susan Strasberg in the lead. Nor could a more unmoving vehicle have been provided for the tv debut of Miss Strasberg in an adult role. The saving grace of this Paul Monash written-produced affair for Westinghouse over CBS-TV Mon. (27) was the airy ballet sequences provided by choreographer Eugene Loring and were it not for these dance segments, "Debut" would have turned out an altogether plodding, pedestrian production.

Miss Strasberg was given the assignment of portraying a young Russian dancer in Paris torn between her love for an American architect who ached to transport her to American shores and her mother's frenzied efforts to turn her into a prima ballerina as she herself might have been had it not for an unfortunate automobile accident. Love ultimately triumphs and Miss Strasberg, as the young dancer, leaves her crippled mother, played by Maria Palmer, sitting in a wheelchair, and with tears on her pale cheeks accepts the offer of the American boy (Martin Milner) to build a home and family in Los Angeles.

Wolfe Barzell as the ballet master contributes an affectionate job as the dedicated ballet master and Henry Daniell does a standard bit as the hard-faced ballet impresario. Miss Strasberg, who has undoubted talents, fails to rekindle them in this vastly overblown, soporific ballet soaper.

Westinghouse's commercials for its new shaped electric light bulbs and vacuum cleaner, in this instance, proved more entrancing. Rans.

Ed Sullivan Show

With Ed Sullivan in Alaska, the emcee chores on his CBS-TV show last Sunday night (26) were taken over by Esther Williams, film star, who also appeared in a picturesque swimming sequence, handled the hostessing assignment a bit nervously, but, in the overall, was pleasant and visually appealing.

Peggy Wood and Imogene Coca, costars of the new Broadway entry, "Girls in 509," were spotted in a scene from the play along with other cast members. The sequence, in which the femmes trap a professor in the hotel room where they've been holed up for years, came off as an okay trailer for the comedy.

The vocal end of the bill was generally satisfactory with Lisa Kirk, Johnny Mathis and Janet Blair splitting the song assignments. Comedian Shecky Greene was good for a few laughs although his bit on a coal mine cave-in was hardly in the best of taste in view of the disaster last Thursday (23) in Springhill, Nova Scotia.

TV Repair Racket

Reliable, took one look at the set, quickly replaced the part at the fair price, and hurriedly left.

Favorite Victims

WWDC's survey has shown that Negroes are a favorite victim of the dishonest repairman. Women, and particularly the housewife in lower income brackets, are also easy prey for overcharging.

To clean up the repair industry here, WWDC advises those who need tv set repairs:

1. To check the Electric Institute (a trade organization which polices its 150 repairmen members) for a list of repairmen considered reliable. ("Our telephone calls had quadrupled since WWDC began its campaign," W. D. Watkins, training director for EI which is operated by Potomac Electric Power Co., said.)
2. To complain to the Better Business Bureau if you suspect you are being over charged. (BBB says the complaints on tv repair overpricing have "greatly increased" with the WWDC campaign.)
3. To schedule the tv repairman's visit when the man of the house is home. WWDC found thtat overcharging happens less frequently if the repairman must deal with a man.
4. To ask questions about the trouble. Honest repairmen don't mind explaining; the dishonest ones are apt to grunt a reply.
5. To refuse to give up the parts and tubes replaced.
6. To demand an itemized receipt.

carried on the three networks is kept track of from the rating point of view. The agency, according to Rich, will predict the success of new shows on the air and established programs in new time slots with an 80% accuracy.

Benton & Bowles programming-media setup differs from all other agencies in that both the programming and media departments must act jointly in selecting programs. If for one reason or another the radio-tv programming sector or the media department nixes a show then the program is written off. Some of the considerations in selecting a new show, says Rich, is a study of the network competition, the night of the week, the sets in use, the lead-in and the lead-out. These plus other factors make up the media side of the argument as to whether to buy a network show.

did, and in the newer version the lead goes to a newspaper to tip them about Pearl Harbor, but it brushes him, saying it doesn't want to get involved in Army red tape. There were a number of other changes ordered by McCann-Erickson, which, incidentally has in the past rejected Serling's "Patterns" and Reginald Rose's "Tragedy in a Temporary Town." Both had originally been submitted to the now defunct "Studio One," and nixed. Later, "Patterns" scored a tremendous hit on Kraft, and "Tragedy" was a success on the old "Alcoa Hour."

'Suzie Wong' Lead Pacted by Sullivan

France Nuyen, who plays the lead in "World of Suzie Wong," has been signed by Ed Sullivan for two or possibly more exclusive guest shots on his CBS-TV stanzas within the next few months.

She'll make her first appearance on Nov. 16 when Josh Logan, who staged the Broadway production, will produce a five-minute musical image which she'll do with several members of the B'way cast.

She won't do a scene from the play about the Oriental prostie but a specially created vignette for the Sunday night airer.

Nielsens Are In

to Como. On the Nielsens, Mason is the winnah. More surprising, Como is even edged out by CBS' "Wanted—Dead Or Alive" in the 8:30 to 9 period—and Trendex didn't give the CBS entry even a flicker of a chance. More surprises: Pat Boone was a "Trendex baby" in competition with "Zane Grey Theatre." On the Nielsens "Zane Grey" walks away with the honors. ABC's "Zorro" is a big hero on the Trendex charts. Nielsen leaves him trailing behind CBS' "December Bride." NBC's "Restless Gun" is the big champ on Trendex. On Nielsen his CBS "Texan" rival comes out ahead.

And so, as the sun sets on the first Nielsen report, the panic is on. While there's happiness within the CBS precincts, based on what has come up so far, NBC, by virtue of some late entries and improved shows, cries: "Let's be fair; wait for the second and third Nielsens." And ABC might claim a foul on the basis of a one-night-only victory and cop the same "it's far too early" plea.

But if anything the more respected Nielsens, with their wide divergence vs. the overnight Trendex sample, has compounded the confusions and the nervousness that are now basic network staples. It's another indication of the persuasiveness of the pulse takers and the nose counters in practically dominating an industry, and in keeping the medics busy.

Unfortunately none of this has anything to do with the quality of programming, unless one goes on the premise that the quality show gets the audience. But that'll get you a fight in any respectable drawing room.

Montreal — A two-alarm fire heavily damaged Canada's oldest radio station CFCF. But station continued its regular schedule from temporary quarters with only about one minute lost in actual broadcasting and is currently identifying itself with: "CFCF Radio—the hottest spot on your dial."

Jack Paar 'Tells All'

Takes on Visiting Press Boys and Tangles With 'TV Guide' Over Story

Jack Paar's refusal to continue with his late-night NBC TV'er beyond next July, when he completes his second year on the show, stems from the web's refusal to cut a half-hour off the show after it promised to do so, Paar said last week.

Final half-hour constitutes a repeat of the first half-hour commercials, although the content is different, and is done only to service stations in other time zones, which carry only an hour of the show. Paar said the web had promised to tape the first half-hour and repeat the tape, eliminating the necessity of doing 90 minutes, as soon as videotape equipment arrived in New York from the Coast.

At the end of the summer, he said, he was called into a meeting and told that the tape plan had been dropped, that he'd have to continue doing 90 minutes a night. Reason, he said, was that affillates in the east wanted all 90 minutes, that they'd lose money if the show were cut to 60 minutes; this despite the fact that the commercials in the last half-hour are repeats. Thereupon, Paar said, he gave notice he was quitting at the expiration of his second year next July.

Decision had nothing to do with offers for half-hour shows, of which there have been two from major advertisers, he said. He didn't want it to appear as if he were playing the late-nighter against the half-hour prime-timers, he added, but simply gave notice because of the tape hassle. Paar said he had been cautioned not to talk about the situation by NBC, but gave forth with the story on his Thursday night show (23) under questioning by a panel of reporters selected from the visiting NBC press junket.

Paar had a virtual 24-hour round of interviews, starting the previous night, when he blasted TV Guide on his show, following this with an impromptu press conference with the visitors that stemmed from the TV Guide blast and ran into 4 a.m. that morning. He picked it up again at a party he hosted for the press, scheduled in advance, the next day at Toot's Shor's, then swung into the scheduled nighttime panel.

Paar took exception to a reference in this week's TV Guide to the appearance of Dody Goodman on his anniversary show. Story had reported Paar had been forced to use her by NBC, which put pressure on because it had to play out her contract. Paar called the statement untrue, and took out after TV Guide on several other counts.

Magazine replied with a statement to the press, in which it termed Paar's outburst "unfortunate." It declared Paar, upon learning it wanted to do a piece on him, demanded the right to name the writer who would do the piece, which it refused. It termed "amusing" his allegation that the mag is experiencing circulation troubles, citing an Audit Bureau of Circulation figure of 6,699,000 last week. His "emotional state," it suggested, "was, perhaps, responsible for his irresponsible statements."

By HERM SCHOENFELD

Connie Francis (MGM): "FALLIN'" (Aldon†) is a good rocking tune with an offbeat idea which this thrush handles very effectively. "HAPPY DAYS AND LONELY NIGHTS" (Fisher-Advanced*), an oldie, gets an approach that'll appeal to the kids.

Frankie Vaughan (Columbia): "ONE THING LED TO ANOTHER" (Rancom*) is a nifty rhythm number which should pick lotsa spins via this bright slice. "SO HAPPY IN LOVE" (Pickwick*) is a lilting ballad in a catching format.

Eydie Gorme (ABC-Paramount): "THE VOICE IN MY HEART" (Summit*), a fine ballad with an interesting idea, gets a nifty rendition that'll earn plenty of spins. "SEPARATE TABLES" (Hecht-Lancaster-Buzzell*) is an okay entry that delivers the plug for the film.

Lord Rockingham's XI (London): "HOOT'S MON" (Southern*) is a solid instrumental rocker with Scot overtones which lends a fresh flavor. Could be big. "BLUE TRAIN" (Southern*) is a catching Latin-flavored item colorfully performed by this British combo.

Fats Domino (Imperial): "COQUETTE" (Feist*), the oldie, turns up in a slow rocking slice that'll give it a new round of spins. "WHOLE LOTTA LOVING" (Marquis†) is a familiar uptempo rocker.

Julie London (Bethlehem): "SOMETIMES I FEEL LIKE A MOTHERLESS CHILD" (p.d.) is projected very effectively by Julie London in a tasteful arrangement. "A FOGGY DAY" (Gershwin*), the standard, gets a swinging, atmospheric slice.

Francois Charpin Trio (Kapp): "EL RANCHO DE MARIA" (Cromwell*) is a charming Gallic slice which could fit right into the current trend of foreign-language pops. "BAMBINO" (Raphael*), the French version of "Guaglione," also gets a winning workover.

Buddy Holly (Coral): "WELL, ALL RIGHT" (Nor Va Jak†) is a tuneful ballad delivered by one of the best rockabilly practitioners. "HEARTBEAT" (Nor Va Jak†) is a listenable ballad with a light Latin beat.

Malcolm Dowds (Decca): "THIS IS REAL" (Roncom*) is a catching rhythm number with a fine lyric which this singer handles in straightforward style. The kids may latch onto this one. "I'LL ALWAYS BE WITH YOU" (Broadway*), in slow tempo, is another strong entry for the current market.

Sallie Blair (MGM): "SHE SERVES A NICE CUP OF TEA" (Alamo*) is a somewhat wordy piece of material with doubtful pop chances. "DADDY" (Republic†), the standard, gets a savvy vocal by this songstress.

Eddie Heywood (RCA Victor): "ST. LOUIS BLUES" (Handy Bros.) gets a suavely melodic keyboard rendition that adds new values to this oldie. "RENDEZVOUS" (Witmark) is another fine instrumental entry for change-of-pace programming.

Poni-Tails (ABC-Paramount): "SEVEN MINUTES IN HEAVEN" (Stratton†) is an okay rocking item delivered in the usual style by these juve thrushes. "CLOSE FRIENDS" (Rush†) is another routine number in the same groove.

Hillard Street (Capitol): "IT WILL NEVER HAPPEN AGAIN" (Sands*), a good ballad with a lyric the kids understand, is stylishly vocalled by this tenor. "RIVER LOVE". (Shaw*) is a pretentious ballad.

Jo Stafford (Columbia): "HIBISCUS" (Melrose*), a light rhythm ballad with a pig latin lyric is attractively bounced by Miss Stafford. "LAZY MOON" (Ankerford*), from the "GOLDILOCKS" score, is a pleasant piece of old-fashioned-style material.

Big Al Downing (Carlton): "MISS LUCY" (Mustang†), a driving rhythm tune, is belted with a powerful beat by this blues shouter. A solid juke item. "JUST AROUND THE CORNER" (Mustang†) is a rocker with some interesting melodic figures.

Jimmy King (Herald): "BROKEN VOWS" (Angel†) is an above-par rocking ballad belted in the modern manner for good impact. "KNOCKIN' ON YOUR DOOR" (Angel†) is a familiar rock 'n' roll stuff.

The Sugar Canes (King): "SIOUX ROCK" (Jay & Cee†) is a driving instrumental rocker with a solid dance beat. "POOR BOY" (Meridian-Parkwood†) is another well-executed instrumental due to catch spins.

Album Reviews

"Ella Fitzgerald Sings The Irving Berlin Songbook" (Verve). The click results which Verve chief Norman Granz garnered with Ella Fitzgerald's Cole Porter and Rodgers & Hart "song books" are a cinch to be repeated, if not exceeded, in this Irving Berlin wrapup. This songstress' swinging beat, fresh phrasing and warm projection are focussed on a superb songalog. It encompasses not only Berlin's familiar hits, but several fine numbers that failed to make it big, such as "Suppertime," from the 1953 show, "As Thousands Cheer," and "I Used To Be Color Blind," from the 1938 "Carefree." The song selection from the embarrassment of Berlin riches includes such evergreens as "Always," "How Deep Is The Ocean," "Puttin' On The Ritz," "Remember," "The Song Is Ended," "Cheek To Cheek," "Alexander's Ragtime Band," among others of equal stature. Although Miss Fitzgerald occasionally indulges in some of her colorful scat jazz phrasing, on the whole she delivers with a lucid directness that frames the Berlin lyrics in their most appealing setting. Paul Weston's orch backs up in faultless style, supplying an attractive instrumental setting without ever overwhelming the star of this double LP set.

Lena Horne: "Give The Lady What She Wants" (RCA Victor). A sophisticated song program performed by Lena Horne with her customary flashing style adds up to potent entertainment. Her workover of "Honey In The Honeycomb," is an instance of savvy technique which sells, but never oversells. An excellent sheaf of tunes include "Diamonds Are A Girl's Best Friend," "You'd Better Know It," "Speak Low," "Bewitched," "Baubles, Bangles and Beads" and "Love," among others. Lenny Hayton batons a big orch in expert backing.

Freddy Martin Orch: "Concerto!" (Capitol). The basic source for numerous Tin Pan Alley creations are candidly accredited in this lush instrumental set of pop hits borrowed from the classics. Among the syncopated longhair themes is "Tonight We Love," from the Tchaikovsky First Piano Concerto, which furnished a tremendous hit for Freddy Martin some years back and now has returned in its original form via the current Van Cliburn smash. This is easy listening, with a slight cultural seasoning, of melodies by Rachmaninoff, Debussy, Chopin, and Beethoven, plus a smattering from Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Kaye Ballard: "The Fanny Brice Story in Song" (MGM). This is a nostalgic tribute to a bygone star which makes for an interesting packaged format. Kaye Ballard, a hep nitery performer, takes off on a collection of songs associated with Fanny Brice and succeeds in suggesting the comedy-pathos of the latter without any attempt at straight carbons. Included are such material numbers as "I'm An Indian," "Becky Is Back At The Ballet," "Oh How I Hate That Fellow Nathan," "The Shiek of Ave. B" and the memorable "My Man," in which Miss Ballard falls somewhat short of the original's tragic impact.

The Mary Kaye Trio: "Too Much" (Warner Bros.). Mary Kaye, by her brother Norman Kaye and Frank Ross comprise a slick, versatile song combo. By various solo and ensemble arrangements, they lend an ususual pace and variety to this offering. This set ranges from "Lazy River" through "Hawaiian Wedding Song" to "My Heart Belongs To Daddy."

Vienna State Opera Orch: "Foolish Heart" (Westminster). This is the sound of music presented on WPAT, which services the Greater New York with a consistent brand of pop instrumentals that fall into the "mood music" groove. This LP achieves a uniform programming concept with an interweaving of themes from band to band. It's a relaxing background sound stemming from lilting melodies by Kern, Gershwin, Weill, Arlen, Porter and other standard writers.

"Lawrence Welk Presents Keyboard Kapers" (Coral). A quartet of keyboard performers featured on Lawrence Welk's television shows take the spotlight in this production. In conformity with Welk's overall style, Tiny Little, Larry Hooper and Frank Scott, on piano, and Jerry Burke, on the Conn organ, blend into a tuneful, unpretentious musical styling in which the song is the main thing. This repertory includes such standards as "The Peanut Vendor," "Wunderbar," "I Want To Be Happy," "The Glow-Worm" and "Just One Of Those Things."

Tommy Dorsey Orch Starring Warren Covington: "The Fabulous Arrangements of Tommy Dorsey In Hi-Fi" (Decca). Warren Covington, who has been clicking as maestro of the band playing the book of the late T. D., here revives the music of that swing organization. Covington, who plays a fine trombone and also handles a vocal neatly, fronts a clean sounding orch on such T. D. numbers as "I'm Getting Sentimental Over You," "Song of India, "Opus One" and "Boogie Woogie." Covington's easy vocal of "My Baby Don't Care For Me" rates special attention.

Mohammed El-Bakkar & His Oriental Ensemble: "Music of the African Arab" (Audio Fidelity). Mohammed El-Bakkar, who has given middle-eastern music some b.o. impact via his previous albums, here switches to Africa, with another package of colorful, swinging sounds. Whatever the ethnic validity of this music may be, El-Bakkar gives it a native gloss. And if the music doesn't get you, the cover photo of the bare-bosomed slave girl will.

Jose Melis: "Christmas With Melis" (Seeco). Pianist Jose Melis, backed by organ and bells, turns up in attractive set of Christmas numbers. Melis plays the hymns and carols, like "Silent Night" and "Noel, Noel" with complete simplicity and also performs "Sleigh Bells," "Winter Wonderland" and "Merry Christmas Music" in tasteful arrangements. Herm.

ASCAP STORM SIGNALS FLYING

Japan's Vast Disk Potential Parallels U.S. Market in Major Details: Marek

Tokyo, Oct. 28.

Japan's social centers, the coffee shops, were given a boost by George R. Marek, RCA Victor veep and general manager, who was here on a two-week visit. He arrived back in New York yesterday (Mon.).

After making the rounds of Tokyo's java points and absorbing recorded sound that ranges from rock 'n' roll to the classics, Marek said, "the best way to sell records is to have people hear them. So I feel in a way that the coffee shops are the disk jockeys of Japan."

It is Marek's belief, based on the appetite for music he has discovered here, both from casual and statistical study, that Japan has a bright musical future. He said, "Without posing as an expert on Japan, I feel very strongly that Japan could be one of the biggest markets in the world."

Here for huddles with officials of the Victor Co. of Japan, Ltd., an indie outfit that holds the Victor franchise here, Marek has learned that Japan's sales breakdown is "remarkably like the U.S." Speaking only for Japanese Victor, he said that the two biggest hits in the last two months, Elvis Presley's "Hard Headed Woman" and Perez Prado's "Patricia," have also been the company's top sellers in the U.S.

Nothing that Bethoven and Tchaikovsky are most popular in the classical field, Marek offered, "Classical music is more or less the same the world over in taste." Marek was all puzzlement, however, when asked about rockabilly's feverish fad in Japan. "I'd be a genius if I could answer that," he smiled.

One of the results of Marek's meetings with the local Victor people is the decision "to go very hard to develop stereophonic sound in Japan." Some stereo records are already on sale here. "Of course before you have a record business, you have to have

MGA Asks NLRB For Control Over Disk Musicians

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

Jurisdiction in the recording field is asked by the Musicians Guild of America, which recently became bargaining rep for tooters in major studios, in a petition filed today (Tues.) with the National Labor Relations Board. MGA has notified approximately 35 diskeries of its intention to push such jurisdiction, and has asked them to refrain from entering into a pact with the AFM.

Meanwhile, MGA bested AFM, which in past years always supplied musicians to Ringling Bros-Barnum & Bailey Circus, in signing for current 10-day stand at the Hollywood Bowl. Circus won a temporary restraining order against AFM picketing, with court expected to rule on the injunction today. Central Labor Council, to whom circus performers belong via the American Guild of Variety Artists, is also interested in the outcome. Should they decide to throw in with the picket line, it would cause the circus to close before Nov. 2, its skedded last day.

McGrady is also planning to scout the disk field with a view to doing tie-ups with Yank labels. The a&r man will be asked to sign on for about two years and get the label on its feet. He will also train a young Briton to take over.

PROBE, GILBERT IN SPOTLIGHT

On the eve of the New York membership meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel tomorrow (Thurs.), there's more internal friction looming for the American Society of Composers, Authors & Publishers.

The current reexamination by the Dept. of Justice of ASCAP's setup as an aftermath of the recent Congressional hearings, is seen sparking a new bitter battle from the floor between the administration and its critics. Latter are now pressing for an overhauling of both the distribution and electoral systems, claiming that they are in violations of the consent decrees. The critics, moreover, now believe they have support from the Justice Dept.

Also L. Wolfe Gilbert, veteran Coast writer and member of the board, has again come into the spotlight of controversy as a result of reports that he's due to be dumped from the Society's board in elections next spring.

Gilbert is hitting back against these reports and has demanded that the ASCAP leadership deny the specific yarn about his removal that was published in Walter Winchell's column last week. There's little doubt that Gilbert will take

Seeco Decision Sets Fed'l Court Rule Over Pub-Diskery Licensing Deals

Major publishers, represented by Harry Fox, agent and trustee, won a key legal action last week against Seeco Records, establishing their right to go into Federal Court to insist on the exact terms of the Copyright Act in mechanical licenses.

New York Federal Judge Edward Weinfeld ruled that Seeco Records could be charged with violating the Copyright Act if it failed to adhere exactly to the compulsory licensing provisions involving notice of use and observance of the accounting periods. Plaintiff publishers represented by Arnold J. Bernstein (Abeles &), were Joy, Hawthorne, E. B. Marks, E. H. Morris, Crestview, Mayfair, Paramount, Famous and Shapiro-Bernstein.

Seeco attempted to dismiss the case in the Federal courts on grounds that its licensing agreement with the publishers were based on a normal contractual arrangement, rather than the Copyright Act. Breach-of-contract suits would ordinarily be brought in N.Y. State courts. Advantage of having Federal jurisdiction for the publishers stems not only from the easier calendar situation but from the more important fact that a violation of the Copyright Act could bring treble damages to the publishers plus attorney's fees.

Prior to this case, publishers did follow the practice of bringing similar suits for proper accounting in the state courts. Transfer of jurisdiction to the Federal Court, which Judge Weinfeld granted, now gives the publishers a heavier club to police the diskers.

Case against Seeco was filed after Fox's accountants charged that there was shortage in royalty payments. Another suit, involving whether Seeco must pay publishers on the basis of records manufactured or sold, is still before the courts.

Arithmetic on a Hit

Max Youngstein, vicepresident-partner in United Artists, has a new-born interest in recordings via the UA subsidiary. This prompted the film showman to declare recently his opinion that artists ought to get 50% of the profits of a hit.

This carries an inference of being a big jump over regular royalty practice but needs some explaining. The standard Class A contract of 5% is on 90% of gross sales. Hence, 50% of net profit would probably figure out 7-8% of the gross sales.

AUDIO FIDELITY GETS CINERAMA PIC TRACK

Audio Fidelity Records has copped its first soundtrack album in a deal with Stanley Warner Cinerama Corp.'s current pic release, "South Seas Adventure." Alex North wrote the score for the film.

The Cinerama track, which is designed for stereo sound, will be released by AF in both monaural and stereo form shortly.

Col Gets Cast Set For R&H Legiter; 'Redhead' to RCA

Richard Rodgers & Oscar Hammerstein 2d are returning to the Columbia Records fold with the original Broadway cast package of "Flower Drum Song." With the "Drum Song" acquisition, Col is now pacing Victor in the original Broadway cast album sweepstakes, two packages to one. Col adready has "Goldilocks" in the groove and Victor has wrapped up "Redhead." It's reported that Victor invested $150,000 in "Redhead" thus assuring the original cast album rights.

Broadway opening for "Redhead" is scheduled for Feb. 5 with original cast grooving set soon after. Tuner, which has a score by Albert Hague and Dorothy Fields, stars Gwen Verdon. Grooving date for "Flower Drum Song" is scheduled soon after the Broadway preem Nov. 1. Cast is headed by Miyoshi Umeki, Jaunita Hall, Keye Luke, Larry Storch and Pat Suzuki.

It's not yet been determined whether Miss Suzuki, a Vik pactee, will be released for the Col package. Vik is RCA Victor's subsid label.

Similar situation between Columbia and RCA Victor arose last season with "Oh Captain." Col had the original cast rights but Victor had show's co-star Abbe Lane under an exclusive deal and they nixed an okay for the Col shot. Columbia did the album with Eileen Rodgers singing Miss Lane's songs.

Pop Biz Hurting Because...

With reports in from a 30-city study, Teen-Age Survey Inc. has come up with the following reasons for lagging pop single record sales:

1) There is nothing exciting on records to make the teenagers want to rush into the store to buy a record.

2) Young people find the dollar harder to come by.

3) There are so many different records on the market that confusion reigns and there's indecision as to which to buy.

4) The regular weekly visit to the record shop is fast becoming a lost custom.

5) Many people now wait for a hit record to get into an album and purchase the LP for better value.

The survey concludes that the era of order taking has long passed. Dealers must get a better grasp and knowledge of the business. They must utilize showmanship and salesmanship to get traffic into the stores. Business no longer drifts in automatically, and dealers must reach out and bring it in.

Inside Stuff—Music

A group of American high fidelity fans will leave next May 23 for a four-week musical tour of Europe. Plans include hi-fi recording sessions in Austria and Germany, stopovers at leading music centers and an optional sidetrip to Moscow. Trip is under auspices of Committee for the International High Fidelity Music Festival to be held in Washington early next year. M. Robert Rogers and Pierson Underwood, music figures in Washington, D. C., will conduct tour. Anybody can go for $1,295.

A major crossplug disk-pic campaign for Figaro's "I Want To Live" production has been set by United Artists, the pic's distributor, and the UA diskery. Latter will release two LPs based on the score, including a soundtrack set featuring Johnny Mandel's jazz score and another album with Gerry Mulligan's combo playing the same music. The film division, meantime, is setting screenings for some 1,200 disk jockeys in 33 exchange areas and the pic ads and lobby displays will spotlight the LP platters. Pic stars Susan Hayward and was produced by Walter Wanger.

PARNELL HEADING HERE TO SET DEALS FOR PYE

London, Oct. 28.

Val Parnell, managing director of Associated TeleVision, is to plane out to America within the next few days to scout both the disk and tv fields. It is likely he will concentrate more on the platter business as ATV has confirmed it has bought a "substantial interest" in Pye Records.

The tv company's interest is reported to be a 50% share. It will be represented on the Pye diskery board by Prince Littler, Val Parnell, Lew Grade and Richard L. Meyer.

The Pye-ATV tieup is not new but is an expansion of an existing association in which Pye holds 9% of the equity of the tv outlet, and C. O. Stanley, Pye's chairman, is a director of ATV.

The new partnership is almost certain to upgrade the diskery into a major platter power. Since it began operating three years ago the label has developed fast but, faced with stiff opposition from Decca and EMI, has cornered only a small percentage of the market.

Pye recent split with the U.S.' Mercury Records after several disagreements, and shortly before that Leonard Smith resigned his managing directorship of the label after reported disagreements at a board meeting. The company then formed a new outlet, dubbed Pye International, with which it intends to freelance throughout the world, buying up material wherever it is available.

MGM On Ink Spree; Capitol Repacts Thompson; Esquivel's Dual-RCA Deal

Morty Craft continued his pacting splurge for MGM Records and its subsid labels, Cub and Metro. Craft handles all the pop recording operations for the parent company and its affils.

Added to the MGM label were the Webtones whose first disk is "My Lost Love" and "Walk, Talk and Kiss." The new pactees for Cub are Al Martino, Jimmy Williams, Toby & Iris and The Five Reasons. Joining Metro are Lee Laurence and Dotts Johnson.

Shifting from MGM to Metro were Georgie Shaw, Buck Griffin and Richard Barrett.

Cap Repacts Thompson

Hank Thompson has signed a new long-term pact with Capitol Records as singer-guitarist. He has been with the label for the past ten years during which time he has risen to one of company's top oatune artists and disk sellers.

Ken Nelson produces all of Thompson's sessions, which also include his Brazos Valley Boys band.

Esquivel's Dual RCA Role

Esquivel, Mexican bandleader whose current package, "Other Worlds, Other Sounds," has climbed into the bestseller lists, has been inked by Victor to a dual deal as artist and musical director. Besides recording with his own band, he'll back Victor's top vocalists. Diskery also plans to give Esquivel's orchestral arrangements a maximum stereo push. Herman Diaz Jr., manager of pop artists & repertory programming, set the deal.

Winograd To AFL

Arthur Winograd, American conductor, has joined Sidney Frey's Audio Fidelity Records to direct an album series for the company's new classical division. Winograd left for London to join Frey who has been supervising the recordings of an initial Audio Fidelity classical series under the direction of Alfred Wallenstein.

Winograd has close to 30 titles on other labels in the classical field.

ABC's Randazzo

Teddy Randazzo has been picked up by the ABC-Paramount label. Crooner previously etched for Vik Records.

First disk for Randazzo under the new tie will be cut under the supervision of Don Costa, head of ABC's album division.

Imperial's Juve

Ronnie Diamond, 14-year-old youngster from Honolulu, has been signed to a recording pact by Imperial Records. Lew Chudd, prexy of the diskery, spotted the juve singing in the Islands. Initial session is set to roll this week.

Contemporary Inks Pepper

Art Pepper, jazz alto saxist, has been pacted by Contemporary Records, a Coast label. Pepper originally came into the jazz spotlight while playing with the Stan Kenton band of 1947-52 and since then has freelanced with his own combo in the Los Angeles and San Francisco areas.

BMI Competition Aids Young Longhair Writers

Broadcast Music Inc., which has been rapped for accenting the rock 'n' rollers too heavily, will award $9,250 in prizes to young longhairs in its Student Composers Awards program. The competition, which kicked off last week, is designed to encourage the writing of concert music by students.

Including the 1958 awards, BMI has given over $50,000 in the seven years of the contest with grants ranging from $500 to $2,000. The 1958 winners will be disclosed next June.

FRED JACKSON HEADS KAHL'S BRITISH FIRM

Phil Kahl starts his London firm rolling this week with Fred Jackson as managing director. The new firm will be known as Planetary-Kahl (London) Ltd.

Jackson will work in conjunction with the New York office to coordinate releases throughout the world and also to acquire compositions on the Continent and in the U.S., outside of the Kahl firms. Jackson had been associated with Mills Music for the past eight years.

Philips Buys German Labels; Cliburn Bally

Berlin, Oct. 21.

Philips, which handles the U. S. Columbia repertory here, has now also taken over the Fontana and Durium labels. It's a considerable expansion. Durium comes along with the most successful Italian song-stars and pop tunes, while Fontana brings besides pop music also classical repertory on the German market.

"Everybody Loves a Lover" (Doris Day's Columbia platter) is currently one of the big top tunes in Germany. To cash in on song's wide popularity, Philips has come out with the German version of this tune. Latter has the title "Junge Leute brauchen Liebe" (Young People Need Love) with Nana Gualdi, diskery's new songstress, on the vocal.

German versions of foreign hit tunes are extremely successful these days. Aside from "Everybody Loves a Lover," Philips has now also the German version of the world success "Nel Blu Dipinto Di Blu" which Aurelio Fierro brought to Germany. German title is "Bambina," sung by Philips' Greek-born singing star Leo Leandros.

Meantime, Teldec is currently riding a publicity campaign for Van Cliburn. Latter's Tschaikowsky concert No. 1 is now on sale. It belongs to the RCA repertory which is handled by Teldec in Germany.

'Geisha' and 'Roots' Latest Tracker Sets From 20th

With the soundtrack sets of the late Glenn Miller pix ready to roll as its first album project, the 20th-Fox label is now prepping two soundtracks from current films to bolster its plunge into the package goods field. The new soundtrackers, slated for November release, are "The Barbarian and the Geisha" and "Roots of Heaven," both 20th releases.

Score for "Geisha" was written by Hugo Friedhofer while that of "Roots" was cleffed by Malcolm Arnold and Henri Patterson. The Miller soundtrackers are from his "Sun Valley Serenade" and "Orchestra Wives" pix.

In the offing for the 20th-Fox's LP push are soundtrackers from the old Shirley Temple pix. Deal on these, however, has not yet been closed. The wheels were set in motion by Henri Onorati, diskery prez, on his recent trip to the Coast studio.

While in Hollywood, Onorati also initiated a deal for Jayne Mansfield to record for the 20th label.

ASCAP Storm Signals Up

off on the rumor at the membership meeting.

Gilbert, who served as chairman of the Coast ASCAP committee for nine years before that group was dissolved last year, is known to have incurred the ire of several top ASCAPers when he made his unprecedented open bid for the Society's presidency three years ago. At that time, he charged that a "powerhouse" dominating ASCAP was determined to keep him out of the presidency. These charges about so-called "powerhouse" were repeated by others at the recent Washington hearings and have been a sore point with the administration since.

Gilbert, now 72, intends to fight for his post as board member by vigorously telling his side of the story to the membership, here and on the Coast. The veteran writer, however, no longer has any ambitions to be ASCAP prexy and will make no effort in that direction when a choice for Paul Cunningham's successor will have to be made next spring.

Meantime, Pinky Herman, a longtime firebrand in ASCAP's ranks who has been more or less reconciled to the leadership in recent years, is on the warpath again. He's bitter over the fact that the administration has persistently ignored his advice to invite the Dept. of Justice and Congressman Emanuel Celler to the Society's membership meetings. Herman also has protested that the formal portions of the ASCAP meetings have been so long that there was no time for discussion from the floor.

phonographs," he considered. "I think it'll be very important to introduce some good low-priced phonographs here. I know that Victor plans that," he said.

Marek said he was definitely interested in the possibilities of releasing records of Japanese artists in the U.S. He is taking back an armful of locally-pressed Victor disks to explore the matter.

Those already stacked for further hearing included clarinetist Shoji Suzuki and his Rhythm Aces and thrush Izumi Yukimura. The latter will be brought to New York after her shot on the NBC-TV Japanese special in February.

In addition to business meetings in Japan, Marek has been filling his two-week schedule with personal efforts to further stimulate music here. He has lectured on Puccini, on whom he is an authority, having authored that composer's autobiography, has attended record concerts both here and Osaka, appeared on a NTV forum with local opera notables and talked to a number of record dealers.

Ice Show Biz Up 25% Over Last Year; Guessing Game on Reasons

Ice show business is approximately 25% ahead of last year in virtually every stop that the three major shows have worked. The entrepreneurs are hitting higher grosses than ever in many situations with reason for the increase difficult to pin down specifically.

One of the reasons may be the fact that there are only three major companies on tour with most towns getting one show only. A fourth company is the second edition of "Ice Capades." Other companies are "Holiday On Ice" and "Ice Follies."

Another reason for the increase is attributed to the fact that two of the shows, "Ice Capades" and "Holiday," had two of the best layouts in their histories last year, bringing an accrued dividend at the boxoffices this year.

However, there is one debatable item. "Ice Capades" ascribes a great part of its spurt at the wickets to the increased use of video. In some towns, the show has bought spots up to the saturation point. This has given the show an upbeat in towns such as Boston, Cleveland and elsewhere. In addition, the display has run the normal complement of newspaper ads. Much of the advance, they believe, is due to the stress on television.

On the other hand, "Holiday" which also tried saturation tele ads, hasn't done too well in that medium. The show still relies mainly on newspapers.

Oregon Expo Wants Big Packaged Shows For 100-Day 1959 Run

Portland, Ore., Oct. 24.

Floyd Maxwell, managing director of the Oregon Centennial Exposition and International Trade Fair, is now in the process of lining up his giant stage shows. The exposition will run 100 days from June 10, 1959, to Sept. 17. The arena will seat 8,000 to 9,500, depending upon type of show presented.

Maxwell is looking for package shows. Each layout will be booked not longer than two weeks. Budget has already been set for $25,000 to $40,000 per week. Maxwell is in the market for circuses, aqua-follies, vaulders with name headlines, or any other packages that will draw. He hopes to have the entire 13 weeks lined up by Dec. 1. Construction crews are busy remodelling the Exposition Building, adding new structures, midways, etc.

Marie McDonald's 8G Can't Be Hung Up on Fur Coat

Dallas, Oct. 28.

Marie McDonald got the legal right Thursday (23) to claim her $8,000 salary for a fortnight's singing stint at the Statler-Hilton Hotel, over the protest of a New York furrier.

Dist. Judge Paul G. Peurifoy ruled that the signer's salary could not be claimed by the furrier, Milton C. Herman. Judge added that the decision has no bearing on any alleged debt Herman claims against Miss McDonald. Also, she probably won't get the money while the case is on appeal. Her local attorneys concede that a bond by the N.Y. furrier will tie up the money until the appeals court makes a decision.

Herman claimed Miss McDonald owed him $5,000 on a $7,000 chinchilla coat bought last December. She testified in court here that her ex-husband, Harry Karl, bought the coat and that she hadn't seen it since last Christmas.

Gastonia Fair Grosses $37,000; Net Only 5G

Greensboro, N.C., Oct. 28.

Spindale Center Fair in Gastonia grossed $37,000 this year. This includes gate receipts, the association's share of midway income and payments for leased concession and commercial exhibits. Expenses were $32,000.

Leon Schneider, a department store owner at Gastonia, is spokesman for a group seeking to ban midway attractions from the annual fair.

Robbins Exits Flamingo Post to Resume Trouping

Archie Robbins has resigned as entertainment director of the Flamingo Hotel, Las Vegas, and will return to work as a performer.

Robbins sails for England next week to open in a musical revue at the Winter Garden, London, Nov. 15. He's also set for a television show in Manchester the following day.

Lido Producers Set A 2d Revue For Vegas Spot

Pierre Louis-Guerin and Rene Fraday, producers of the Lido, Paris, returned to their home-base over the weekend after o.o.ing "C'est Magnifique," their nitery show at the Stardust, Las Vegas, and also firming up a second six-month semester with Allard Roen and Frank Sennes, who bought the Gallic revue for the Nevada spa. Guerin and Fraday's current frolic on the Champs-Elysees is establishing a parallel milestone by being held over for a second season, a departure for the Paris spot which usually changes shows annually.

The show for next year at the Stardust will also be a Donn Arden-staging, under their direction, and will be titled "Ca C'est l'Amour," and like the current show will be rehearsed and packaged in Paris and flowing over intact, including scenery, production, principals and even the choristers. The acts will all be European, hence first time seen in America which, they all agree, is one whyfore of the show's current longevity. It will have been seen by 200,000 customers come Nov. 1 at the Stardust, which was a shuttered convention hotel until the Wilbur Clark interests (Roen) took it over. Incidentally, Fraday stresses that all the publicity about the nudity of his French show is an incidental, since the undraped beauty parade is but one component, considering the elaborate mechanical effects, the swimming pool, ice-tank, fireworks, etc., that is part of the elaborate French package.

Fraday-Guerin-Arden will utilize the huge waterfall effect for the next Vegas show—this was part of Maurice Chevalier's one-man show at the Empire musichall, Paris, some seasons back. Theatre, incidentally, is now in its third year with Cinerama, showing the third-of-the-series; this is the one with the Vatican scenes which, especially now with the change in Papacy, has heightened audience interest and attendance.

More Casinos, Liberal Liquor Laws Seen Need To Help Irish Tourism

Dublin, Oct. 28.

Casinos and more liberal liquor laws are what the Irish need to hypo their tourist biz which last year was around $102,000,000, according to Kenneth G. Besson, prexy of Royal Hiberian and Russell Hotels, two of Ireland's most elaborate hostelries. He made the point at a luncheon meeting of caterers, tourist industry toppers and public leaders after opening of Catering Exhibition in Dublin.

Besson, who has been a long-time advocate of casinos for Ireland, had a project to build one in the mountains overlooking Dublin on site of famous "Hell Fire Club," resort of 18th Century dandies. Revision of liquor laws is likely to come quicker than an okay for gambling as new legislation is to be introduced during the coming session of Dail (Congress).

According to a survey made by Irish Tourist Assn., tourist biz was off slightly this year, with the weather being blamed.

Pitt Show Biz Perks After 22-Day Walkout Of Hotel Workers Ends

Pittsburgh, Oct. 28.

Theatres, niteries and taverns all over the downtown sector relaxed last week when the damaging hotel strike came to an end on Thursday (23). Penn-Sheraton, Roosevelt, Sherwyn, Pittsburgher and Webster Hall had been strapped by the walkout for 22 days, practically wrecking the amusement business in the Golden Triangle.

Cost to the hotels alone was placed at over $1,000,000 in lost business, especially from conventions. At least a dozen were cancelled during the duration and several others booked for next couple of weeks conked out because they couldn't wait any longer.

The break came suddenly after a series of unsuccessful negotiations just when it looked as if the strike might last as long as the previous one in 1946 when the big inns were shuttered for 53 days.

Chief sufferers, aside from hotels themselves, were cafes in the few blocks radius which bounds the hotel belt and the musicians. Latter were not only knocked out of steady work at different spots but a lot of spot jobs, always an adjunct of every convention, were erased, too.

The contract which sent service employees back on their jobs again will run through Sept. 30, 1961.

Havana Nacional Gets New Setup

Havana, Oct. 28.

Changes in the Havana casino scene are starting to make themselves felt following the withdrawal of Las Vegas coin from that town. The Nacional Casino, which had been operated by Wilbur Clark of the Desert Inn, Las Vegas, has been sold to the McIlhenny Bros. and Al Schwartz, who have been prominent in casino operation in several cities. Reportedly, Canadian mining money capitalized the venture.

In another change in the hotel, this one having nothing to do with the casino. William Land, who recently resigned as resident manager of the Savoy Hilton, N.Y., has become general manager of the Nacional. He was formerly manager of the Caribe Hilton, San Juan.

Sam Tucker, who had been in charge of the casino under the Clark regime, is still in charge of operations for the time being. Merle Jacobs of Cleveland is still booking the spot.

Exotic Fined in Mass.

Lowell, Mass., Oct. 28.

Juliana Brooks, 29, New Bedford exotic, pleaded guilty in Lowell district court last week to participating in an immoral show and was fined $100. She was arrested 10 days ago when state police raided Duke's Night Club in Tyngsboro.

Cases of three others in the police raid were continued to Friday (31). They were Benny Gailos, Lawrence; Julas Linsky, Dorchester; Frank Costello, Tyngsboro. Gailos and Linsky were charged with participating in an immoral show and Costello, alleged proprietor of the nitery, with presenting it.

Bill Miller to Reopen Cafe de Paris With Sepia Show; Renamed Riviera

Bill Miller has acquired the Cafe de Paris, N. Y., started by Lou Walters and which folded after a little more than a month of operation. Miller, operator of the long-shuttered Riviera, Ft. Lee, N. J., will open around Dec. 27 with Larry Steele's "Smart Affairs" and spot is expected to operate on a sepia talent policy afterward.

Miller said that he will change the name of the spot, and make certain alterations, such as the installation of a circular bar in front of the house with 48 seats. He stated that the new venture will be bankrolled at $250,000. His partners in the deal are Dave Shear, a Boston shoe manufacturer, and Abe Berg, with the Hotel Corp. of America. Miller claims a 10-year lease on the spot. It may be rebilled as Miller's Rivera.

The bankruptcy filed by Walters, says Miller, has given him control of a cafe that is free and clear of previous encumbrances. The spot, at its folding had about $500,000 backlog of liabilities, which made it difficult for new new money to come in. However, the legal procedure makes it possible for a new operator to come in and start from scratch.

Miller is currently interested in the Monte Carlo Hotel, Havana, which is currently in the process of being built.

He is a former hoofer who later became an agent starting out in the office of Charlie Morrison. At various times he operated Luna Park, Coney Island, with the Danziger Bros., operated his own talent agency, was talent buyer for the Sahara Hotel, Las Vegas. He tried his hand with Las Vegas inn operation on his own when he took over the Royal Nevada, and the Dunes, both of which didn't turn out successfully. However, he started the burlesque policy at the Dunes, which still pays him a healthy commission weekly. Last year, he booked the Deauville, Miami Beach.

Harlem-on-Broadway

Broadway will be upbeat on Negro shows starting late December. Already announced has been Bill Miller's takeover of the Cafe de Paris which preems Dec. 27 with Larry Steele's "Smart Affairs," colored revue. Set immediately afterward was Sallie Blair's entry into the International, for the same period. The Jack Silverman spot is next door to the Cafe de Paris, in the same building.

In the adjoining edifice is Birdland, which always has a series of Negro artists on tap.

Diners Club Gets Hotel Chain Tie Via Sheraton

In an agreement completed last week, The Diners Club has acquired the assets of the newly established Sheraton Central Credit Corp., a subsidiary of the Sheraton hotel chain, in exchange for 150,000 Diner Club shares. Deal was initiated about two weeks ago following the collapse of DC dickers with the Hilton Hotels which was about to set up a separate organization to handle the credit corporation. Difference on stock-swap terms snafued the deal.

Inasmuch as a huge chunk of hotel and nitery business comes as the result of credit card organizations, Sheraton chain, according to president Ernest Henderson, expects earnings of the hotel chain to rise and anticipates a tremendous amount of new business. The Sheraton Corp. will continue to issue courtesy cards, good only for its own hotels. It will switch holders of Sheraton credit cards to the Diners Club, which is anticipated will enroll another 250,000 members into the organization which now has around 850,000 card holders.

The arrangement between both organizations points up anew the necessity of credit to keep the hotel industries going. It is believed that with the entry of stiff competition into the field, such as the American Express forming its own club, and the Hilton chain going in for its own credit club with collapse of DC dickers, it was best that the Diners have the backing of a substantial organization to insure a steady business backlog.

H'wood Bowl Converts For Ringling Circus; 7,500 at Bow in Rain

Hollywood, Oct. 28.

The Hollywood Bowl, long a stronghold for symphonic entertainment, has reached a new milestone after nearly four decades of "Symphonies Under the Stars" and other melodic treats. For a 10-day period, beginning last Firday (24), open air forum is catering to the tanbark set, for a 20-performance stand of Ringling Bros., Barnum & Bailey.

For this stop, scaled to $4, the huge shell has been moved via tracks off the stage and out of sight, to provide space for the three-ring circus that still boasts the best in the field. Opening night saw approximately 7,500 stalwarts and smallfry brave the elements which only an hour before the bell threatened to more than dampen hardy spectators. As though on signal, the shower halted as the ringmaster's proverbial whistle sounded.

Circus, which last year played Gilmore Stadium, is in the Bowl on a percentage arrangement for Bowl Assn., ranging from 5% to 10%, dependent upon take, with a minimum guarantee of $500 per show to Bowl. An advance sale of $25,000 for the two weekends was reported.

Eddie Jackson's Split With Jimmy Durante Breaks 40-Year Tie

A historic show biz partnership dissolved last week when Eddie Jackson announced that he was leaving Jimmy Durante's act. It's an association that, with only a couple of interruptions lasted about 40 years. Reason given by Jackson was that the present routining of the act gives him little to do during the turn.

During Jackson's recent illness, Sonny King was brought into the Durante act and has become a permanent fixture. Much of the time previously allocated to Jackson, is now being done by King including the famed "Bill Bailey" number.

The team of Clayton, Jackson & Durante has as it sole survivor Durante. Lou Clayton died some years ago after serving as Durante's manager after he retired as a dancer. Jules Buffano, with the act for 18 years, is the sole outside member of an old retinue. Drummer Jack Roth, who unerringly caught all the piano parts that Durante threw around, returned several years ago. He's been 40 years with Schnoz.

There were a couple of periods when Jackson was not associated with Durante. Early in 1940 Jackson was the senior number of Jackson, Stone & Reeves, which had a vogue on 52d st. for a while.

'8:05' Revues Rack Up Peak Gate In Scotland

Glasgow, Oct. 28.

Howard & Wyndham's two "Five-Past Eight" productions, annual spring-to-fall revues, have notched up new records here and at Edinburgh this year. The current show, starring Stanley Baxter, Rikki Fulton and Kevin Scott, has played to 328,000 customers in a 24-weeks' run, beating last year's record of 317,000 customers in 21 weeks. Top is $1.45, and theatre seats 2,250 capacity.

The Edinburgh edition of "Five-Past Eight" has run for 22 weeks, including a four-weeks' season at Aberdeen, and one in new terrain at the Gaumont Cinema, Dundee. On its Edinburgh run this production played to 170,000 customers in a 1500-seater King's Theatre in 17 weeks. Top is, as at Glasgow, $1.45. Jimmy Logan and Jack Radcliffe, Scot comedians, starred with Gil Johnson, U.S. dancer, in the Edinburgh version of the Howard & Wyndham coin-spinner.

Cafe Continental Revives Little Revue in Chicago With 'Leftovers of 1923'

Chicago, Oct. 28.

Cafe Continental, moody cellar dinery in the near north side bistro district, is set to unveil a little revue after the fashion of the Julius Monk cameos in New York.

Titled "Leftovers of 1923," show preems tomorrow Wed. in the eatery's Embassy Room, which has under 200 capacity. Apart from gambling on the layout itself, boniface Irv Roth has decided to launch it with a $2.50 per minimum. However, room will serve liquor only.

It's been years since the little revue was a staple in any Chi nitery. Last to try it was the old Blackhawk (which has since remodelled and forsaken talent). Shortly after the second World War, the Sherman Hotel's whilom College Inn switched from name bands to a revue policy helmed by vet writer-producer Sherman Marks.

The Cafe Continental bill was prepped by agent Dick Champley and hoofer Rudy Noel (of the Nicki & Noel duo), and stars portly chirper Laverne Pearson, an alumnus of the Spike Jones troupe. Featured acts include the song-and-terping De Wolff Sisters (2) and singer Tony Caruso, plus several dancers and a four-piece band.

Show's in for a month with options.

INJURED AT A.C. ICER, WINS 25G FROM CITY

Atlantic City, Oct. 28.

A jury here last week awarded Lawrence M. Weitzel, of Lancaster, Pa., $25,000 for a broken leg and other injuries received in a fall while attending an "Ice Capades" performance in Convention Hall more than three years ago. The panel assessed the full amount against the City of Atlantic City, owner of Convention Hall, where "Capades" breaks in its new show each summer. Weitzel had sued both the ice show's management and the city.

Weitzel claimed that while he was leaving the show and descending a stairway leading from the balcony to the garage level, the lights suddenly were extinguished, which caused his fall into the basement pavement below.

Ice Capades Inc. denied any negligence with the claim that all the hall lights were under the sole control of the city, from which it merely leased space for its show.

Greensboro, N. C., Oct. 28.

Not a gag but literally true —A North Carolina industry offical reports that sales of headache remedies have "skyrocketed" at Little Rock, Ark., recently.

So reports Mrs. Sarah Hicks, vice president of the Hicks-Capudine Chemical Co. of Raleigh, manufacturers of a headache remedy. Her firm's orders at Little Rock have doubled lately.

Jets Spurt Convention Biz

tions and availibility of entertainment.

Night Life Important

Conversely, according to some travel agencies, any town that lets its night life go to seed is liable to be hit with more losses since entertainment is an essential part of the convention scene. Department stores, hotels, theatres, souvenir shops, etc., suffer with the absence of convention trade. It is pointed out that in this instance, the 20% cabaret tax is contributing to the decline of convention trade in the U.S., and aiding surrounding countries, especially in the Caribbean area, in getting many confabs and sales award trips that might ordinarily go to an American city.

There are other factors as well. For example, one manufacturer turned down an otherwise favorable locale because of the lack of sufficient hospital facilities.

One of the prize convention plums is the confab of the American Society of Travel Agents, a body that frequently controls the fate of resorts. This meeting will be attended by hotel operators from every city in the world. The Tropicana, Havana, thinks sufficiently of the selling power of this group to bring up their entire nitery show to entertain the agents.

Henry Kronengold, prexy of the New York State ASTA, on an October cruise of the Caronia recently inspected hotels in four different cities in the Caribbean as possible sites for next year's powwow.

It is also pointed out that while entertainment is one of the major factors in determining palaver sites, it is only one aspect. Entire communities are pitted against each other in the pitch for confab business. Macy's may not like to lose business to Gimbels, but that store is now seen as being in direct competition with Carson, Pirie & Scott, Chicago; May's Hollywood, or La Belle Creole, Port au Prince.

Jamaica recently took cognizance of this fact and enacted free port legislation that enables that island to compete with Curacao, Hong Kong and Haiti. Upbeat in tourist and convention trade has been highly evident since the shopkeepers have been able to lower the prices.

The various governments of the world have learned that convention business is wholesale tourist trade. The new tax setups in the U.S. make it feasible to travel far and wide. And with the advent of the jet age, the returns of convention business will become increasingly higher. There is hardly a government in the world that isn't cognizant of that fact and gearing an important part of their economy to that goal.

Friars Club

In this instance, the basement bistro was taxed to capacity.

Leonard's one-liners were a marathon of inside quips like "Beldon Katleman—in our business is known as a sore winner . . . Danny Thomas couldn't be here because he's entertaining the troops in Lebanon . . . Alan Gale —the Jewish Billy Graham . . . Joey Adams, illegitimate son of John Quincy, and he has jokes to match . . . Harry Hershfield who refereed the Lincoln-Douglas debate . . . we're surrounded by GAC, MCA and William Morris, the enemies of our craft . . . so many Eytralians here they oughta start a Sicilian B'nai B'rith . . . Joe E. Lewis, the only guy in the world who has an honorary liquor license," and many others.

Pari-Mutuel Decor

There was a ribald pseudo-horserace recording; the table props were scratch sheets and parimutuel tickets; the humor attested to the honor guest's prowess with the bottle and the babes. A similar idea was used for the Humphrey Bogart luncheon several years ago.

Jack ("21") Barry was the natural target of the quizling gags and, after a deft sentimental speech, he signed off, "see you in 20 years." Erroll Flynn managed well, considering the league he was in; Jack Waldron, Leonard's mentor, was authoritative in his equips; Met singer Robert Merrill made it a quickie; Joey Adams' closeups on Lewis were unique, funny and also sentimental, as he paraphrased a Will Rogersism, ("I never met a man I didn't like") with "I've never met a man who didn't like Joe E. Lewis."

Hershfield was his usual effective self as raconteur; Alan Gale's dais stint was likewise socko, including the sage observation that the public and profession alike "never goes to see Lewis—we go just to visit with Joe."

Seagram's contributed a solid gold shot glass to its prime exponent of the brew-that-cheers; the William Morris office also made a suitable gift presentation.

Lewis' rebuttal was brief and keynoted the underlying show biz sentiment as he expressed gratification in the honor as abbott of the Friars, considering that the great George M. Cohan likewise was a former abbott. And, in making reference to the finale-on-earth that must come to all men, Lewis cracked, "And when it's ghost time, in that white sheet, I'll still be with the Friars in spirit."

New Acts

GORDON MacRAE
WITH SHEILA STEPHENS
Songs, Comedy
50 Mins.
Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, N.Y.

Gordon MacRae, who originally came from radio and thence to vaude, is now working in a different milieu. His wife, Sheila Stephens, has now moved in as an integral part of his act, hence this entry into the New Act files.

MacRae remains a personable singer. His voice is virile and expressive and he has enough acting ability to enlarge his scope so that he cannot be classified merely as a singer or as a satirist. The turn with the blonde Miss Stephens is a combination of both—and loaded with entertainment. This is MacRae's first trip to the N.Y. supper club circuits. Because of Edith Piaf's accident in France Waldorf exec Claude C. Philippe had to shift booking plans for the Empire Room, thus the MacRaes' a fortuitous byproduct of a personal tragedy since it gives Gotham a set of new and impressive entertainers to its roster.

The modus operandi of the act is such that each abets each other. There are alternate and tandem turns so that personablity in such copious doses won't be outworn in a single evening. MacRae, with an impressive backlog in film musicals, starts off on a familiar footing with one throwaway opener, but follows up with some of the impressive tunes from the Todd-AO verson of "Oklahoma," in which he costarred. Thence follow the personality impressions with Miss Stephens.

She has a sure feeling for satire. Her ribs of Katharine Hepburn and Dinah Shore are top-drawer. She captures some of the more obvious mannerisms, combines them with subtleties, and creates a portrait that bears a strong relationship to the original. Her takeoffs on Zsa Zsa and Lena Horne (latter with black wig), while not as strong as the others, have attributes that clicked with the crowd.

MacRae is also bullish on the mimicry, being able to give a portrait of Arthur Godfrey with reasonable relationship to the original, and he does an amiable Perry Como.

However, the strong points of the turn is an ability to sing and a tune catalog that's easy to take. In this department they pass the high standards of the Waldorf set. They charm with a rewrite of "I Remember It Well" as their sole straight duet. The solos are by the male half and are mainly from this films, and reap beaucoup mitting.

The MacRae-Stephens combination is another in the list of man-and-wife teams who have made good in this room, notably Peter Lind Hayes & Mary Healy and Anne Jeffreys & Robert Sterling. Domesticity apparently pays off at this hospice. It was again evident by the crowd's reaction when the McRae's introduced their brood of four who were ringsiding.

Van Alexander, prominent in the big band era as a batoneer and composer, capably leads the Emil Coleman outfit as the MacRaes' special maestro. Jose.

DEE LAWSON
Songs
20 Mins.
Village Vanguard, N.Y.

Dee Lawson owes a lot to Chris Connor for her vocal styling. Miss Connor's cool phrasing is evident throughout Miss Lawson's work and unfortunately she doesn't take it any further than that. She has an interesting jazz feel that could be better developed if she added some new techniques of her own.

Her repertoire is standard stuff including "S'Wonderful," "Round Midnight," "Bewitched," "I'll Remember April" and the seldom-heard oldie out of the Arthur Schwartz-Howard Dietz catalog, "Confession." Thrush has an easy stage demeanor and is an okay bet for jazz rooms. Gros.

TWO GUYS & GEISHA
Dance, Songs
13 Mins.
Brown Hotel, Louisville

Dance trio, together since last February, but not listed in New Act files, went over big to a packed Bluegrass Room. Occasion was the Kentucky Bankers Convention, cramping the floor space. Act, however, comprising two lads in sailor costume, and Japanese femme, adapted their routine of lifts and fast stepping to the limited space, and customers gave 'em a hefty salvo.

Femme sheds her kimono and fan, and goes into a fast routine of lifts and stepping with the two guys, both youthful and fast working with the shapely and attractive gal. All mix some vocals with the dance numbers, a medley of "Funny Valentine" and "Concentrate On You," plus a Japanese tune by the femme, all make for contrast and audience acceptance. Gal is a well stacked nisei Japanese, and the trio works fast to please. Monica Lind is credited with the choreography.

Excellent turn for any nitery or stage, and okay for video shots. One of the lads has an excellent voice, and is a good bet for waxing. Wied.

LITTLE, DANE & MASON
Comedy-songs
15 Mins.
Den in the Duane, N.Y.

This well-groomed male trio goes in for straight vocalizing and comedy songstering. Delivery is okay, piping pleasant and comedy ideas are generally bright. Unfortunately, though, not all of the material pans out in execution.

Their fugue routine, for instance, in which they start off with a neat workover of "Fugue for Tin Horns" (from "Guys and Dolls") and then follow up with some similarly-styled numbers, is basically humorous. The overall risible impact, however, isn't too strong.

They work at a fairly fast clip and in a personable manner. For a pace-changer they do a fine job on a straight rendition of "Everytime We Say Goodbye" from "Seven Lively Arts." However, their closing workover of "Heart" from "Damn Yankees" is a little too noisy. Jess.

Jones Seeks Arbitration on Philly Charges Against AGVA's Bright

The running battle between Dick Jones, former eastern regional director of the American Guild of Variety Artists, and Jackie Bright, AGVA national administrative secretary, entered a new phase last week, when Jones, in a letter to the Associated Actors & Artistes of America, offered to submit the charges lodged by him against Bright to impartial arbitration. Paul Dullzell, 4A chairman told Jones the matter would be presented at its next meeting.

Jones' charges were read into the record of the AGVA national board meeting two weeks ago, but were tabled immediately afterward. It is unlikely that AGVA will do anything to hear the charges in the immediate future.

The charges were the result of a censure by the national board that the Philadelphia branch, of which Jones is a member, acted unconstitutionally in proferring charges against Bright and the national board.

Jones' charges stated that the AGVA is under a dictatorship acting with the full knowledge and approval of the national board. Complaint called Bright a dictator and charged him with constitutional violations.

Jones' letter stated that the charges hurled by him at Bright and the national board cannot be heard impartially in AGVA inasmuch as they are in no position to try themselves. Also since AGVA counsel Harold Berg is also attorney for the 4As, there is a decided advantage to AGVA in that body as well. He therefore proposed an impartial body to determine who violated the AGVA constitution.

MANAGING DIRECTOR

October 13, 1958

Miss Anna Sosenko
25 Central Park West
New York City, N. Y.

Dear Miss Sosenko:

We were more than pleased with Soocha Renay. The coverage by our two newspapers described well the way that she was received and were both extremely complimentary about our having brought her to Dallas and the Century Room. I couldn't give you a stronger recommendation than the fact that we would like very much to have Miss Renay back next fall.

My personal thanks for your calling and recommending her to us. We know that with your name associated with a personality, it identifies the personality as an outstanding one, because, in my opinion, you would not associate yourself with any act that didn't have great possibilities and expect to reach the top.

Sincerely,
Andy

House Reviews

Roxy, N. Y.

Robert C. Rothafel presentation "The 49th Star" with Millie Vernon, Mark Reddy, Ian Bruce, Rayo Bros. (2), Balladeers, Dancers Moderne, Robert Boucher Orch; staging and direction, Mervyn Nelson; choreography, Ray Frost & Kenny Springer; costumes, Winniford Morton; sets, Bruno Maine; "The Last Hurrah" (Col) reviewed in VARIETY Oct. 15, '58.

The Roxy's second stageshow follows closely along the lines of the preem display. The hallmarks instituted by Robert C. Rothafel are very much in evidence despite the engagement of Mervyn Nelson as the new stager. There is tendency to overextend its forces because of the vastness of the stage. Nelson, who has mounted a long series of nitery shows, is perhaps not yet used to working on the Roxy's scale, but there is evidence in his maiden try that he'll mate his background and the Roxy stage for overall good results.

The theme of the present show is "The 49th Star." It's difficult to get excited over Alaska at this time. As a matter of fact it's safe to assume that the majority of the folk locally haven't yet found any romantic attachments to the annexed area. However, stagers have managed to put some warmth into the igloo country. For example Betty Winsett & James Eiler, in a bit of special material, cleverly deliver a tune kidding Alaska. There's humor and a lot of charm in their work.

Another good sequence is a penguin number with Millie Vernon as a school marm. The number is nicely staged and choreographed. Miss Vernon shows humor and personality as well as an ability to move about, and the episode comes off well.

The sequence wherein a bunch of the boys were whooping it up in the old Malamute saloon tends to become overdramatic and loses its punch. Miss Vernon, presumably the "lady known as Lou," Mark Reddy and Ian Bruce as the major danseurs, try to extract too much emotion out of this bit. However, there is color and a lot of good movement in this sequence. A tightening up process should give it the desired effect.

The Rayo Bros. (2) appear in the opening sequence. They're on too briefly to properly assess their work.

Robert Boucher conducts capably, a difficult process since the orch is hidden from view until the final sequence. The sets are colorful. There are a lot of good bits in the display. A contraction of some episodes would give the stager the added touch to out it into the hit column. Jose.

Apollo, N. Y.

Bo Diddley & Co. (3), Buddy Johnson Band (14) with Lee Thomas and Ella Johnson, Thurston Harris & Masters (5), Wynona Carr, Belmonts (4), Clay Tyson, Shields (4); "Gun Brothers" (U-A).

This is one of those occasions at this Harlem vaudery when the musicians and singers are skilled professionals, one and all, but with the exception of top-bannered Bo Diddley, there isn't an act on the card with particularly strong marquee pull for the rock 'n' roll crowd. Buddy Johnson's aggregation of sidemen, the three singing groups—Thurston Harris and his Masters, the ofay Belmonts and The Shields (each with exceptionally polished lead singers) — Wynona Carr and Bo Diddley are confident performers and convey the niceties of music.

Johnson's veterans open and set a pace for all to follow. Sidemen are satisfying throughout—nothing spectacular but real steady. Ditto the band's singers, Lee Thomas and Ella Johnson, the batoner's sister.

Main body of the program begins with Thurston Harris, and the quality of his group's "Pretty One" and "Over and Over" is indisputable. The Belmonts are a novelty in this house: they're white boys whose command of the idiom is as great as any colored troup's. Moreover, they extend their feel for the particular tempo of rock 'n' roll to instrumentalizing as well as singing; three of the boys take up electric guitars, the fourth handles the traps for slick results in their finale. The third vocal group, The Shields, isn't quite as experienced as the other two, but they nonetheless don't forget that music has its subtleties, even when the dominant characteristic of selections is the blare of r 'n' r (to keep the teenagers from getting restless).

Soldist Wynona Carr, her own piano accompanist has a clear, strong voice, and does a variety of musical selections to the marked satisfaction of pewsters. Diddley's clowning (plus that of his two supporting precussionists) is clever. Not only that, these guys are musically distinctive; their powerful beat caps an all-together fine bill.

Comedian Clay Tyson's arrival on stage has the audience titering even before he says a word. He's a masterful pantomimist and his monolog is as droll as that of any laugh-getter to play this house. Art.

Alhambra, Paris

Paris, Oct. 28.

Charles Aznavour, Delta Rhythm Boys (5), Carsonys (3), Theda Sisters (2), Bobby May, Elise Vallee, Jean Leccia Orch (22); $2 top.

Charles Aznavour, the small, raspy-voiced singer, is in top form. He comes on with a high voltage rendition of a song on youthful desires and keeps it up with sudden shafts of rueful poetics. He is one tracked on love and its various aspects.

Savvy lighting, less overstatement in his gestures, and a surety in tone, gesture and delivery have made Aznavour one of the top personality singers here. His individuality makes him definitely ready for specialized Yank boite or video chances. Aznavour's jazz beat and his good English would also help in the U.S.

Delta Rhythm Boys (5) bring in a lively, zesty medley of choral numbers and add some French lingo bits that also help. They get solid mitts. Not so Elise Vallee, ex-dancer-turned singer, who seems to have stagefright. When she gets with it she will be an okay chirp for orch possibilities. She is sleekly turned out.

Carsonys (3) are a suave acro group with effortless grace concealing rigorous acrobatics. Theda Sisters (2) do a well synchronized bit on a double trapeze to emerge a fine filler. Bobby May's rapid, exemplary juggling, ending with a group of lit up objects in the dark, is firstrate.

Jean Leccia Orch is okay for medleys and backing. Show is in for six weeks. Mosk.

Empire, Glasgow

Glasgow, Oct. 23.

Shirley Bassey (Griffith Lewis at piano), Howard Jones & Reggie Arnold, Bob & Marion Konyot, The Hi-Fi's (3), Les Brazilianos (3), Joan Winters & Guy Fielding, Horler Twins, Bobby Dowds Orch.

Dark-skinned Welsh thrush Shirley Bassey headlines another lightweight layout at the ace Scot vaudery, and scores a personal victory despite sameness of act from last time around. Thrush gives out with a vibrant and intense personality, and wins mitting for "Birth of the Blues," "Burn the Candle at Both Ends" and other tunes.

Act could be sharpened still further if it were given some definite shape and if femme would give more distinction and clarity to gabbing, plus evoking a smile or two. As is, the personality that emerges is too serious and sad, and requires a spark of gaiety. Given this, it would have solid impact.

Howard Jones & Reggie Arnold, musical duo, wind the first segment with comedy and instrumentalism, plus some strong vocalizing by Jones. While Arnold is seated at piano, he offers comedy interruptions of his partner's songs to good effect, particularly in "September Song."

Bob & Marion Konyot garner yocks with some spoof ballet and knockabout acrobatics, and have customers in continuous chuckles. Male half is garbed as an artist, and emerges from easel to paint his partner, then hoists her aloft for what at first appears to be classical ballet, winding into lively knockabout stuff.

Joan Winters is joined by her partner Guy Fielding for some comedy business and gabbing; distaffer, a blonde looker, has more personality than her partner, whose ultra-sophistication hampers his impact, although pair do better as a couple of moppets in their second-segment offering.

The Hi-Fi's, three males in harmony, register with a well-rehearsed song routine. Les Brazilianos, luminous-garbed trio, are easy-on-eye spectacle as dancers and jugglers. Horler Twins open both segments with well-patterned dance bits.

Billy O'Sullivan, Irish comedian, brings welcome blarney and style to a pre-finale spot, and wins strong reaction with jaunty style. Winds with the song "When I Leave the World Behind."

charge. He declared that on one date he had a rough time, but he played that stand again and was accepted wholeheartedly. He explained that managers of the various post clubs are changed periodically. A new manager came in this instance and everything was okay. This, he said, was typical of many situations. While abroad he met other Negro actors who reported similar impressions.

The conditions abroad for actors generally, Rogers stated, could improve. A lot of money is being spent foolishly. There should be better pay, better organization and better travel facilities. He reported that scale for U. S. acts was highest, and that German and British acts were being discriminated against financially and for no particular reason, he added. He also said that on certain bookings, where acts must stay overnight, the lodgings bill should be paid. It is not now done, he said. Rogers stated that free auditions should be eliminated They are generally given in front of an audience at the various post clubs, and they should be paid for them inasmuch as it substitutes often for a regular turn.

Rogers also said that there was unnecessary misunderstandings. His initial contracts issued to him addressed him as 'Herr' or 'herrn.' "Until I found out it meant Mr., I thought I was being called a she-type guy."

However, Rogers remains bitter about the Bailey incident and the Army's acquittal of the officer on several of the major charges including "conduct unbecoming an officer." "Was this then conduct becoming to an officer?" he asked. "We must have had Little Rock on the jury."

the original Russian, is currently working on the screenplay.

Rights to the work reportedly were obtained in a pre-production deal and Dragon staked claim to the title Sept. 5 with the Motion Picture Assn. of America's Title Registration Bureau. Similar claims were filed later with the bureau by Joshua Logan and Warners. Dragon is said to have had its version in preparation for the last three months.

Distribution deal with a major company for "Zhivago" is now in negotiation according to Dragon. Latter previously turned out such pictures as "Chase a Crooked Shadow" for Warners release and "The Plunderers" for United Artists.

Well publicized since author Pasternak won the Nobel prize, "Dr. Zhivago" indicts the Communist way of life as having corrupted the Russian people. Book, originally published in Italy, has not been printed in Russia for obvious reasons. In fact, repercussions to the Nobel award Monday (27) resulted in Pasternak's expulsion from the Soviet Writers Union and loss of the title of Soviet writer.

companies. Johnston said the satellites sought reciprocity along the lines of the Russians, but that he explained the impossibility of this to them. Johnston several times stressed his preference for regular commercial transactions as against the type of semi-diplomatic deal he signed in Moscow. The MPEA prexy said he didn't favor U. S. Government aid to the film companies in meeting expenses incurred in connection with the handling of the Russian films. "That would give them an aura of propaganda, and we want to avoid that," he said.

Johnston noted that foreign market problems were mounting, and that he expected to have to spend more of his time abroad. He's due to go to Japan in early December.

Hotel Pierre, N. Y.

"An Evening With Sigmund Romberg" narrated by and with Earl Wrightson and Felix Knight, plus Betty Benee starred; produced by Stanley Melba; staged by Dolores Pallet; orchestra, Joseph Ricardel; lighting, Leslie Wheel; $2 couvert.

Stanley Melba pulled a sleeper with the opening "Evening With Victor Herbert" and, if the waiters and the pro in the powderroom are any criteria (and they are invariably the best barometers on saloon biz), the second show, "An Evening With Sigmund Romberg" should be more of the same. If so, Melba, who has been 18 years entertainment director at the posh Pierre, has achieved a neat trick—a box-office gimmick at low-cost. He tried it last year with a fiddle policy which, while good for Chez Vito in New York and the manifold violin boites in Paris, didn't come off. The $2,500-$4,000 names left little black ink for the Cotillion Room. He figured that if Herbert, Romberg et al. on records are perennials, if the al fresco municipal auditoriums and outdoor theatres can do business year after year with revivals it might work in a class saloon. It did.

In Earl Wrightson and Felix Knight the room has a couple of seasoned pros and the blonde diva, Betty Benee, who was at the Cotillion last year with the string policy, is no novice either, for all her young years. They're an ideal combo for the pot-pourri of Romberg melodies—and what a medley that is!

Longtime Broadway musicomedy favorites like "Maytime," "Desert Song," "New Moon," "Up in Central Park," "Student Prince," "My Maryland" and "Blue Paradise" are richly productive of most of the melodies, plus a filmusical excerpt, "When I Grow Too Old To Dream," from "The Night Is Young." Not part of the Wrightson-Knight narration, it may deserve mention that the last song is the lone 1,000,000-copy pop seller for either Romberg or Oscar Hammerstein 2d who did the lyrics. A nice professional touch for future program credits would be inclusion of the divers lyric collaborators — without Mrs. Rida Johnson Young's and Hammerstein's words, perhaps, even the highly durable Romberg melodies might not have the same significance. Strangely enough there are no excerpts from "Blossom Time"—there was long a show biz axiom that "the sun never sets on a 'Blossom Time' company which is touring somewheres in the world." In fact, one Coast revue, later brought to Broadway, made much of a scene about a "lost" company of "Blossom Time" troupers, so prolific and vagabondia have been their tours.

"Desert Song" and "Student Prince" each contributed three ballads to the company; there are two from "New Moon"; and the rest are scattered. Wrightson, in attractive Van Dyke, is a goodhumored barytone and so is tenor Knight, no stranger to full-length Romberg productions. The beauteous Miss Benee is the right dignified touch as the romantic vis-a-vis and in her solo opportunities.

The staging seems improved as they make their entrances from the slightly raised balcony tables on the sides and full-stage centre. The narration is also in proper mood, light, informative and literate. The titles strike responsive chords with the more mature moneyed crowds and the tunes are undeniable to any listener of any age: "Will You Remember?", "Riff Song," "Wanting You," "Romance," "Softly As In A Morning Sunrise," "April Snow," "Deep In My Heart," "When I Grow Too Old To Dream," "One Alone," "Lover Come Back To Me," "Serenade," "Golden Days," "Your Land and My Land" and "Auf Wiedersehn."

Click of this policy has prompted other hostels to buy the original unit; and when the Richard Rodgers show (lyrics both by Lorenz Hart and Hammerstein 2d) comes in Dec. 3 this, too, will go on tour. Mimi Benzell so far is the only one signed for the Rodgers "night."

New managing director William Ebersol and entertainment director Stanley Melba seem to have hit on the right formula for the Cotillion Room. Idea, also, of one dinner show nightly, Tuesday-Thursday is good; there's a midnight frolic only on Fridays and Saturdays (room is closed Mondays). It's a realistic awareness of current conditions where supper business is a problem. Maitre d' Pasquali is again happy to handle the traffic (the predecessor show did so well that it was held over an extra week) and "Gogi" continues as the new personality host; his New York, Hollywood and Palm Beach following has interpreted itself in socialite patronage.

Joe Ricardel backstops the difficult musical pot-pourri as expertly as he gets them up on the dance floor. Incidentally, he has a cutie of a thrush who is not only decorative but acts as if she's constantly "with it." Many of the vocal lookers just sit there; this canary, Marilyn Mitchell, contributes to the general spirit. Abel.

Hotel Carrera, Santiago

Santiago, Oct. 18.

Johnnie Ray (with Herman Kapp), Marcel Lebon, Los Huasos Quincheors (4), Saul San Martin Orch (12) with Jorge Foster, Valentin Trujillo Tropical Orch (6) with Lucho Aranguiz.

Intercontinental's Hotel Carrera temporarily moved its Hanga-Roa nitery on the mezzanine to the more spacious and terraced 15th story roof garden to accommodate the overflow crowds for Johnnie Ray, Warbler, on S.A. tour, flew into Santiago from Buenos Aires to make personal appearances at the Astor Theatre, Radio Cooperativa Vitalicia, and the Carrera in a hectic 2-day stay.

Programming included French singer, Marcel Lebon, and curtainraiser, a Chilean quartet known as Los Huasos (Chilean Cowboys) Quincheors. Only Lebon was bedded with high fever and couldn't make it to the roof.

Quincheros, who've been pacted by Intercontinental to perform at hostelries in Venezuela, Puerto Rico, Cuba, Mexico, El Salvador and Colombia, trimly outfitted foursome, specialize in rhythmic ballads known as "cuecas," Chile's national tune. Four guitarrists are brightly attired in typical Chilean cowboy costume of jingle-jangling spurs, short white pea jackets trimmed with Chile's national flower, the scarlet copihue, high-cut trousers and colorful ponchos. Quinchero group has been around for some time, changing members with the years, and present group's looks are okay for the distaffers. Repertoire is strictly Chilean but they've varied presentation with a parody on rendition of "Rio Rio" as it would be presented by Argentines, Mexicans, Cubans and Americans, to healthy mitting. They top off warbling with call for volunteers in audience to dance the cueca while audience joins rhythm-makers by palming the catchy cueca beat.

Ray's appearance was widely heralded, and there was plenty of curiosity regarding the emotional yanqui warbler. Not many U.S. acts get down this way and Ray's arrival had been well paved in advance by his disks and film work. Opening night crowd, including heavy attendance by younger generation, was a bit taken aback when one of Ray's coterie appeared to set up mike with careful "1-2-3-4-Mary-had-a-little-lamb" call for testing. Why this sort of thing hadn't been done beforehand was a mystery or was it just buildup? But if the Chilenos were going to sit on their hands, they didn't for long. Vocalist ingratiated himself with efforts to say a few words in Spanish which the polite Chileans liked, and he was off to the races with around 10 of his best-known songs. His belting, contortions, and stylized warbling drew hefty palms. He went over big and when he suddenly bounced over to the sidelines to buss a gray-haired matron, the crowd loved it. Final number was a spiritual with which he tried for audience participation but with only fair success. The locals didn't seem to go for that kind of tuning. Herman Kapp ("my musical director and friend") handled the drums with local ork expertly batoned by Saul San Martin although the lads had a tendency in the opening phases to almost drown out Ray. Edie.

Ritz Carlton, Montreal

Montreal, Oct. 23.

Fernanda Montel, Johnny Gallant, Paul Notar Trio; $2-$2.50 cover.

An established fave with the patrons of the Ritz Cafe, Fernanda Montel is currently scoring in this attractive boite with her husky piping, glamorous appearance and breezy songalog.

With practically no English songs when she first played this city, Miss Montel is now in the 50-50 stage and experience acquired over past few years is evident throughout. Payoff numbers, of course, are still on the Gallic side and this time around she intros several new Parisian clicks and reprises the standards for plaudits. General manner with a song and with the customers is better and visually, she is more striking than ever.

Johnny Gallant gives her fine backing, resulting in a more relaxed performer capable of handling comedy or the torchants with equal ease. The Paul Notar trio, besides assisting during the Montel sets, [illegible] treated to a display of verbal fire [illegible]

Copacabana, N. Y.

Nat (King) Cole, Blackburn Twins & Jerry Collins, Peggy Womack, Lou Donn and M. Pagan Orchs; staged by Doug Coudy; music and lyrics by Mel Mitchell and Marvin Kahn; orchestrations, Deac Eberhard; $5.50 minimum.

What Joe E. Lewis does for the Copa's yock department, Nat (King) Cole does for its song division. Following Lewis in for the second show of the fall season, Cole wraps it up with one of the slickest vocaling jobs in the biz. There are few singers around who can hold the floor for more than 50 minutes and run through a songbag of 17 tunes and still have the tablers asking for more, but that's just what Cole did opening night (23) and it should be credited more to his showmanship than to the partisan preemers.

Working mostly with arrangements concocted by Nelson Riddle and backed by an augmented orch, the instrumental sound is perfectly suited to the Cole pipes. In between the opening number, "St. Louis Blues," and the closing "Joe Turner's Blues" are nifties from the standard and recent pop catalogs. When he does some piano doodling as on "I Want to Be Happy," the musicianship is particularly evident. All in all it's a rich and rewarding session.

The Blackburn Twins, aided by Jerry Collins, are not in the same league. The Blackburn boys are okay in the hoofing department but their attempts at funstering, with Collins, don't come off. And it also takes up too much of their act. It's noisy and slapsticky and not very funny.

The Copa line is one of the prettiest in some time and their decked out handsomely in costumes designed by Billy Livingston and executed by Mme. Berthe. Jeggy Womack is solid in her solo terping stint and Bob Warren handles the Mel Mitchell-Marvin Kahn production tunes in acceptable manner. The Lou Donn and M. Pagan bandsmen keep the terp crowd happy. Gros.

Palmer House, Chi

Chicago, Oct. 23.

Marguerite Piazza, Martelli Trio, Ben Arden Orch (11); $2 cover.

Opera diva Marguerite Piazza is a handsdown winner in the ritzy Empire Room with it's "mature" clientage. It's an easy 30-minute conquest for the svelte soprano. But her warmup skein of light aria fluff, condescending for its triteness, is mechanically paced for a let's-get-past-this effect. She does as well as an operatic thrush can with the "Witchcraft" juke hit, but tune's inclusion is of moot point to the act overall. More's the perplexity why Miss Piazza chooses for her operatic nod a tenor aria, the w.k. "Vesti La Giubba," when there's any number of soprano lyrics suited for the clown dramatics that accompany.

Star's pacing is overall brisk. Effective entry has her caroling at ringside, and there's not a fork-plunging tabler in the house for the later strip bit that's followed by some nostalgic song-and-hoofing. Getaway is boff for its visual appeal, a circusy number with toy instruments.

Martelli Trio, in eight-minute warmup, plies smooth acro-ballet for comedic emphasis. Two males and a loose-limbed blonde looker do some exciting variations on the torso-tossing art. It's a chucklesome act among the best in its class. Ben Arden orch (11) is excellent behind the show, especially with Miss Piazza's orchestrations. Los Chavales come in Nov. 20. Pit.

Steuben's, Boston

Boston, Oct. 23.

Marge Cameron, Inga & Rolf (2), Lucio & Rosita (2), Don Dennis, Tony Bruno Orch (5); $2.50 minimum.

Marge Cameron, tall, svelte brunet comedienne, rocks Steuben's with a barrage of chi chi material and solid one liners delivered with wham effect. In for two frames to Nov. 5, she's a performer who takes full advantage of her sex.

Opening with "Laugh It Up" song, she covers a lot of territory ranging from femme outer and inner accoutrements to tv commercials, marital problems and hula hooping. She's sock with an impresh bit of Dinah Shore selling the auto, a cigar commercial and a frantic Presley takeoff in which she kicks off her shoes and knocks herself out with "Heartbreak Hotel." Her material is probably the most sophisticated verbiage ever unleashed in this spot. She hits her marks effectively working in badinage with ringsiders, dividing it up equally with both sexes.

Seldom has Steuben's been works with sizzlers such as put out by Miss Cameron. Called back, she takes a red hula hoop for gags and impresh bits of Leo the Lion, goes into moppet gags, marital, monster and martian affairs, after previously ducking her head in a bucket for "echo chamber" version of how hot disks are cut. She's good with the sight gags and fast on the trigger with a voice that carries, all adding up to socko entertainment.

Lucio & Rosito, Latin dancers, open the show. Black-haired looker and white suited partner go through medley of torrid Latin dances, cha cha, samba, merengue, for nice mitting. Don Dennis takes an eight-minute spot for singing after warming up aud with party announcements and introing celebs and honored guests.

Inga & Rolfe are a visually pleasant production number of ballet movements performed in graceful fashion by distaff side of the team. To "Lieberstraum," the dark haired femme spins and twirls in clocklike precision with partner coming in for nice spins, lifts and twists. Femme gets impact with costume changing in view of aud, and wrapup is a saucy "Mdle. de Paris," with shoulder lift and spin to floor for heavy mitting. Tony Bruno cuts the show in zestful fashion. Guy.

Sands, Las Vegas

Las Vegas, Oct. 22.

Dean Martin, Mattison Trio, Texas Copa Girls (12), Antonio Morelli Orch (21); created & staged by Jack Entratter; $3 minimum.

Along the Strip this is normally that time of year when the crowds thin out and competition becomes keen for the customer's cartwheel. In this respect, the Sands—for the next four weeks at least—can consider itself in fine shape, with Dean Martin's name on the marquee a surefire bet to draw long lines through the casino to the turnstiles of the adjacent Copa Room.

Martin's act is altered little, if any, from his last appearance here a few months ago—it needn't be, if opening night reception to his format can be used as a gauge. While he has proved himself in all of the mediums, a night club floor certainly seems to be his natural forte. He's a charmer from the opening bar to the final curtain, weaving his tunes and patter in such a casual manner as to immediately arrest his nitery audience.

Particularly ingratiating to local showgoers is Martin's injection into familiar lyrics a seemingly spontaneous run of gambling lingo, a surefire way to nail the attention of casino patrons and outsiders alike in this town.

Producer Jack Entratter's bill is rounded by the Mattison Trio—two guys and a doll—who turn a neat toe in a series of well executed dance routines. Act is a new one to this beat, and bears watching by local bookers. Mattisons confine themselves to strict adherance of technique, costuming and lighting, relying on no flash stuff at all. They might, however, strive for more balance by reslotting their "Bolero" number to follow the dance medley of Rodgers-Hammerstein show scores, instead of preceding the latter with Ravel's w.k. dance. This, since "Bolero" is by all means their most effective number. The R-H salute is almost identical with that being presented at the Tropicana by their former boss, George Tapps.

Colony Club, Omaha

Omaha, Oct. 23.

Henny Youngman, Colony Club Trio; $1 cover.

Henny Youngman and his rapid-fire oneliners are apparently just what the doctor ordered for the swank Colony Club. It's a matter of ropes up every night, and the comic's stay was extended one week as a result.

This marks Youngman's first appearance in this region for many semesters, but recent exposure on the Jack Paar Show has made him a name. And the vet doesn't disappoint, doing a bangup 30 minute show at 10 and midnight, and spending the other minutes table hopping.

At show caught, Youngman went to work on his hotel and wife jokes and had the crowd palmed early. His blue but funny lyrics on "My Fair Lady" set up the pins for his w.k. violin stint and a big blowoff. Frann.

Hotel Plaza, N. Y.

Hildegarde, with Martin Freed; Ted Straeter and Mark Monte Orchs; $2.50-$3 cover.

It has been almost 10 years since Hildegarde played the Persian Room of the Hotel Plaza—"just imagine, over 3,000 nights in other places," she soliloquizes, as she mentioned she has since been three times abroad, played Cuba, Mexico and spanned the country countless times—but somehow even the waiters imparted it was good to have the chantoosie from Milwaukee back "home." First at the across-the-Plaza Hotel Savoy-Plaza (it's now called the Savoy-Hilton) she was a fixture in the Cafe Lounge, and then ditto in the Persian Room.

Hildegarde is a class saloon staple of unique proportions. She is an ageless, boundless-in-energy pianist-singer whose gamut from unmitigated corn—her studiously disarming manner of self-spoofing the deliberate outrageous puns is good showmanship—to sentimental schmaltz has been surefire in almost every strata of cafe entertainment. In her long runs at the Persian Room the competitive saloonkeepers would crack "they (meaning the hinterlanders visiting Gotham) get off the train and go direct to the Plaza." For all her pseudo-Gallic sophistication she is a folksy chanteuse who can alternately ingratiate herself and scold an inattentive customer—and score with both. It's her basic desire to please, and the whole-hearted application to doing a compelling show charms the payees.

Hildegarde is too much the pro not to know about leaving them hungry. Dinner show reportedly ran 80 minutes, but on the supper show caught she had pared it to an hour.

On the other hand, considering the strong personal rapport with virtually everyone in the house, those two opening shows, the asides, ad libs, by-name greetings, etc. are understandable and will undoubtedly go by the board automatically as the days progress.

Hildegarde, ever a clothes-horse, flashed a Fontana number that ain't off the Klein's racks. Always easy on the orbs, for both sexes, the wardrobe gets the femmes and she charms the guys what brung 'em.

Chanteuse tried for change-of-pace with several new numbers but the fractured-French, the Viennese, the pops in German (viz., "Bake A Cake"), the "Gigi" medley and the like score best. Intended perhaps as Hildy's defi to Van Cliburn was her Russian pianolog medley. She essayed such new items as "Never Give Anything Away" which somehow, with its leerical motivation, doesn't become the warm, house-party aura that she imparts to the Persian Room. Her French rock 'n' roll number is good; so is practically all of her repertoire save for the over-generosity.

Per usual, the Ted Straeterites give her expert backstopping besides their assertive dansapation, and that goes also for Mark Monte's Continentals. Biz looks beaucoup bullish with the "Darling, Je Vous Aime" star incumbent for the next month. Abel.

Le Cupidon, N. Y.

Mary Small, Howard Beder, Ish Ugarte Orch (3), Catun's Latin Orch (3); $3.50 minimum ($5 Sat.).

A solid singing stint is chalked up by Mary Small in for at least a fortnight at this cozy spot. She carries her 40 minutes at a well-paced clip, showing a wealth of special numbers and adding much by zestful interpretations. A big assist came in this opening night from her husband, Vic Mizzy, sitting in at the piano, and some of his clefings crept into her repertory to also heighten the event.

Show gets under way with a pair of tunes from singing host, young Howard Beder, who smooths the way okay. Then Miss Small is into it with "A Woman Must Be a Lady All the Time," an opener done with more import on story line than on verve. She goes to the pop lists for "Something Wonderful" and "The Day That the Rains Came," the latter extra well liked, then runs into several originals, all fetching nice response.

A quartet of numbers in the Freudian vein, among them. "Shrinker Man" and I've Got the Will To Fail," takes particularly well with the clientele of this high-styled haunt. She is among the first to extract from the "Goldilocks" score, and closes strongly with "Whose Been Sitting in My Chair," "I Never Know When" and "Give the Little Lady a Great Big Hand." Gale Robbins is due next. Quin.

Dancers: Fumi Akimoto, Paula Chin, Helen Funai, Pat Griffith, Mary Hui, Marion Jim, Betty Kawamura, Baayork Lee, Wonci Lui, Joanne Miya, Denise Quan, Shawnee Smith, Maureen Tiongoo, Yuriko, Jose Ahumada, Victor Dunlap, George Li, Robert Lorca, David Lober, George Minami, David Toguri, George Young.

Children: Twins: Linda and Yvonne Ribuca; Susan Lynn, Luis Robert Hernandez.

Musical Numbers: "She Is Beautiful," "A Hundred Million Miracles," "I Enjoy Being a Girl," "I Am Going to Like It Here," "Like a God," "Chop Suey," "My Best Love," "Grant Avenue," "Love Look Away," "Gliding Through My Memories," "The Other Generation," "Sunday," "Wedding Parade."

The much heralded Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein 2d (with Joseph Fields) show, an offbeat Oriental musical, opened in Boston to a wham reception. It delivers a one-two click punch with petite, winsome Miyoshi Umeki winning all the way and Pat Suzuki belting out songs.

The production is an achievement of pure delight, coming up with absorbing, exciting musical of conflict betwixt the old and new in San Francisco's Chinatown. The music is exuberant, although there are a few dull moments, but they are offset by a dozen rollicking songs, a terrifico dream sequence ballet, unique choreography by Carol Haney and an overall sense of audience acceptability.

The show should send Ed Kenney, the personable romantic juvenile, to stardom. He comes across solidly with "She Is Beautiful," the outstanding ballad. Jukeboxes will be jingling aplenty with "Grant Avenue," "Chop Suey," "Hundred Million Miracles," "I Enjoy Being a Girl" and "Sunday."

Film possibilities are definitely sock, with the obvious scope of the panoramic Frisco background, Chinese home interiors, niteries and wedding processions. Gene Kelly achieves prestige success with his directing.

Miss Umeki as the picture bride from the other side, is enthralling, cute as a doll, turning in an outstanding acting stint and piping "Hundred Million Miracles," "I Am Going to Like It Here" in sweet voice. Pony-tailed Miss Suzuki walks off with honors as she slams over "Grant Avenue" and "I Enjoy Being a Girl," plus a torrid strip-tease dance in a Chinese nitery.

Juanita Hall is epic in her portrayal of Madam Liang who studies U.S. citizenship, and socks over a rousing "Chop Suey." Keye Luke is accomplished as the dignified patriarch who has difficulty understanding western ways, and surprises with fine rendition of "My Best Love" and in a duet with Miss Hall of "The Other Generation."

Larry Storch is neatly cast as the unwilling suitor, a nitery operator, and makes most of his comedy opportunity. Arabella Hong is fine as a spurned femme and comes across strong with fine "Love Look Away." Conrad Yama turns in a nice supporting performance as the bride's father and Jack Suzuki also turns in a funny bit.

The story line involves the usual family goings-on between the old and young generations. In this case it's a Chinese family, which makes for some funny stuff along bop lines, and affords an absorbing insight into behind the scenes facets of Oriental life.

A mixup of the mail-order bride and strip-teaser, both vying for marriage with the same youth, results in big family squabble, a nitery blowup scene, a family confab and a switch wedding in which tv plays a part. The story is updated with even an outer space joke and hula hooping.

The musical is handsomely mounted. Oliver Smith's scenery is opulent and fluid, with breakaway sets for continuous action. Peggy Clark's lighting is gay and bright. Irene Sharaff's costumes are eye filling. The cast of 59 includes talented dancers who lean and bound all over the stage, and four handsome children who have a spot for the comic song, "The Other Generation."

It's a fundamentally basic show, built around family pride, love and the right man for the right girl, should please the family trade, and despite a few side meanderings, looks a sure winner for a long run.

"The Night Circus" is a shallow, tedious and undigested exposition of the "beat generation." As it now stands, the new Michael V. Gazzo melodrama is not ready for any stage, least of all Broadway. It is such a shapeless mass that its potential for films, tv or stock can only be imagined and a complete rewrite would be required to bring it into focus.

The Jay Julien production, starring Ben Gazzara and Janice Rule, gets laughter at the wrong places, and restless boredom during long monologues, which are barely audible and say little or nothing. A few walked out of the premiere, a rare occurrence with Detroit theatregoers. Gazzara, Gazzo, and Julien, who teamed successfully in "A Hatful of Rain," have missed this time.

Profanity is used extensively for whatever shock value it will produce, and sex is discussed endlessly. When it is all over, nothing worth remembering has been said, but there is a great deal to forget. If there is any message, it has been completely lost in long-winded discourses about rebellious youths who apparently are confused about what they are fighting.

The plot concerns some bums, referred to nowadays as members of the beat generation, who hang around a saloon. Mixed up in the confused jumble is the sexual union of two casual bar patrons the night she was to have married another man, the father of her unborn child.

There are assorted prosties, nuns, a weakling father, and drunks who don't act as if they were. Following an abortion and the death—whether by heartbreak, suicide or accident is not made clear—of the girl's father, the principals somehow find love and apparently resign from the beat generation.

Gazzara shouts and rants appropriately in a fine but wasted job of acting. Miss Rule also does a competent job, although what is given her is not enough to make her role convincing. The audience finds many of their more serious and supposedly profound remarks merely funny.

Shepperd Strudwick as the weakling father of the pregnant girl, Albert Morgenstern as Gazzara's pal and Arthur Storch as a henpecked husband can't be heard clearly in their soliloquies. Perhaps it is just as well, as the few phrases enunciated properly aren't worth the strain.

Patricia Roe scores as a prostie. John Harkins, as the left-at-the-church bridegroom who finds his intended bride in the bedroom of a man she just met, unhappily gets laughs rather than sympathy in what is apparently intended as an emotional scene.

Director Frank Corsaro shares with Gazzo a great deal of blame for this undigested mishmash. He lets the action drag to the point of inertia. There are two well-done sets by David Hays—a saloon and one-room apartment. Costumes by Patricia Zipprodt are appropriate.

La Plume de Ma Tante

Philadelphia, Oct. 22.

David Merrick & Joseph Kipness presentation of Jack Hylton production of two-act revue, written and devised by Robert Dhery; music, Gerard Calvi; English lyrics, Ross Parker; choreography, Colette Brosset; overall staging, Alec Shanks; orchestra conductor, Gershon Kingsley; orchestrations, Gerard Calvi, Billy Ternent, Ronnie Monro; lighting, Alec Shanks; scenery supervision, Charles Elson. Stars Robert Dhery; features Colette Brosset, Pierre Olaf, Jacques Legras, Roger Caccia, Jean Lefevre, Nicole Parent. At the Forrest Theatre, Philadelphia, Oct. 21, '58; $4.80 top week nights, $5.75 Saturday.

Others in cast: Michel Modo, Henri Pennec, Pamela Austin, Michael Kent, Ross Parker, Mary Reynolds, Yvonne Constant, Coka Brossecola, Genevieve Coulombel, Brigitte Peynaud, Jill Hougham, Geneviève Zanetti, Anna Stroppini, Nadine Gorbatcheff, Francoise Dally, Claude Perrin, singers, dancers.

The American preem of this importation came off well despite a handicap caused by a serious accident to one of the featured players, Jean Lefevre, at a rehearsal the day before the opening. However, the performer insisted on appearing, though some of his more rugged dance routines had to be cut. The incident and resultants changes had the members of the French (and English) troupe upset, but, on the whole, they reacted ably and there were very few serious breaks in the tempo or slips in line or business.

"La Plume de Ma Tante" is a combination of a series of successful Paris revues in which star Robert Dhery and his choreographer-comedienne wife Colette Brosset have appeared. The cream of the crop was assembled for the English presentation, which also acquired Ross Parker's English lyrics. It's understood that this American production has even less of the original Gallic wordage than did that of London, figuring on the lack of bilinguals in this country.

The show is a gay stage romp and should add to David Merrick's string of legit successes. It stresses slapstick comedy of the Keystone and "Hellzapoppin" variety and the vocal or dance numbers that do appear during the evening are almost invariably kidded gen-

Inside Stuff—Legit

In connection with Maurice Zolotow's upcoming biog on Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne it should be clarified that the monograph that George Freedley, curator of the Theatre Collection of the N.Y. Public Library, wrote on the Lunts was likewise authorized. When Freedley was approached in 1956 to write a Theatre World monograph for Rockcliff Publishers, London, he acquiesced on condition it would be with full cooperation of the Lunts and the actor quickly acquiesced. The VARIETY statement last week that Zolotow's book was the "first authorized biography" is in error.

In the recent VARIETY review of "Cock-a-Doodle-Dandy" in Toronto a reference was made to the "excellent" performances of the three girls of the household, with Carroll Conroy inadvertently listed as one of the trio in place of Rae Allen.

There's something infectious about a skillful light comedy like "The Pleasure of His Company." The Samuel Taylor-Cornelia Otis Skinner play has something of the quality of the Philip Barry hits of 30 or so years ago in its picture of prosperous (without a sense of guilt), witty and attractive people, and its superior craftsmanship.

The show has just about everything. It's entertaining and enjoyable, is beautifully played, handsomely produced and has a strong b.o. name cast. With such potent assets it's a cinch for smash popularity, a long Broadway run, juicy road tour, film adaptation and years of stock revival.

Although it's practically old-fashioned in the glitter of its setting and sparkle of its characters, "Pleasure" has a reasonably contemporary point of view and bright-as-chromium-button dialog. Probably no group of people today (or ever?) could actually be as gay and amusing and invariably ingratiating, but at a $6.90 top and in contrast to the morbid tone of most current drama, the illusion is welcome.

A San Francisco mansion dating from the pre-earthquake era is the locale of this tale of a charming, irresponsible father who drops in from the other side of the world, ostensibly to attend his long-neglected daughter's wedding, but actually to try to prevent it and carry her off himself. It's a diverting premise and although the final scenes suggest scrambled rewriting during the tryout, with still-fuzzy motivation, the comedy skims along with a satisfying supply of droll lines and just enough sentiment for seasoning.

Cyril Ritchard, an old pro at light comedy, has staged the play deftly and gives an expert performance as the charming prodigal father who instinctively makes love to his ex-wife as well as their daughter. Cornelia Otis Skinner, doubling as co-author of the play, gives a thoroughly skillful portrayal of the irritated ex-wife and understandably anxious mother, and Charlie Rugeles, looking like Buffalo Bill without the goatee, clicks off every laugh as the grandfather who sees everything, keeps his sense of humor and has a quotation to fit every circumstance.

Top-featured Walter Abel is excellent in the workhorse role of the justifiably annoyed step-father of the prospective bride, and Dolores Hart makes an admirable Broadway debut as the impressionable daughter (at least two of her longer speeches are a cinch to become standard ingenue audition material), especially in her scenes with Ritchard. George Peppard registers nicely as the fiance and Jerry Fujikawa is an acceptably cheery butler.

Donald Oenslager has designed and lighted the handsome San Francisco living room with an atmosphere-creating view of the bay and Golden Gate (or is it Oakland?) Bridge through the window, occasionally obscured by heavy fog streaming by. Edith Head has provided the decorative costumes for the Frederick Brisson-Playwrights Co. production.

Some unbecoming maneuvering about authorship billing before and since the premiere is covered elsewhere in the Legit section. One other item of note is that the screen rights to "Pleasure" were acquired by William Perlberg and George Seaton (for Paramount release) in a pre-production deal.

Once More, with Feeling

Martin Gabel & Henry Margolis production of three-act (five scenes) comedy by Harry Kurnitz; staging, George Axelrod; scenery and lighting, George Jenkins; men's clothes, Michael Travis; Arlene Francis's clothes, Scaasi. Stars Joseph Cotten, Arlene Francis; features Walter Matthau, Leon Belasco, Ralph Bunker, Frank Milan, Rex Williams, Paul E. Richards. At the National Theatre, N.Y., Oct. 21, '58; $6.90 top ($8.05 opening).

Not that it's exactly news, but Harry Kurnitz is a very funny fellow. In his new comedy, which reached Broadway last week, he uncorks an evening of laughs as he just about kids the fur-collared cape off the longhair music racket.

Kurnitz, who's become a minor legend as a screen writer, novelist, world traveler and amiable character, cracked the playwright ranks several seasons ago with a hilarious but uneven jape, "Reclining Figure," about the shenanigans of art collectors and dealers. "Once More, with Feeling," is even funnier, and what's more to the point, is better conceived and constructed. It also has a better cast in terms of boxoffice draw.

"Once More, with Feeling" is more compact, and keeps interest better focused. There are, at a guess, fewer characters, and the essential story concentrates on the two leads. Moreover, the characters tend to be real people—a bit crazy, perhaps, and somewhat exaggerated, for after all, they're concert artists, but people nonetheless.

Probably some of the characters are drawn at least partly from life (Kurnitz was a newspaper man in Philly during the 1930's, when the town had at least one notably colorful musical personality), with sufficient author's license, no doubt. There's an egomaniac symphony conductor, personally infuriating but a fine musician.

There's also his wife, without whose irresistible blandishments and genuine charm he's practically a dirty word to musicians and managements alike ("He uses orchestras the way I use Kleenex," his manager explains). And there's the Machiavellian manager himself, always on the verge of apoplexy, and ready to shed every drop of anyone else's blood for his artist-meal ticket.

The situation is that the wife, who turns out to be not really his wife, having never gotten around to committing herself to marriage, has walked out on the genius. The problem is to get her back, so he'll be acceptable for a contract to conduct the Chicago symphony. Matters are complicated by the fact that she has returned with the intention merely or arranging a "divorce," so she can marry the president of the college where she now teaches music.

It's not very much of a story, but serves as a framework for a string of Kurnitz jokes about the frauds and idiocies of longhair music and its hysterical followers. There's the conductor's penchant for assaulting violinists, for instance, and the self-absorbed fiddler who wears two pair of gloves and carries a hand-warmer so his precious fingers won't get a chill.

The manager, mentioning that a current mixup is a crisis, "even for us," is indignant when accused of being tense. "Me tense?" he shouts. "Nonsense. Look how slowly I'm twitching." Later, recalling that he'd once refused an offer to manage Leonard Bernstein, he marvels, "Such a nice young man—he talks so pleasantly—who'd imagine he's a genius?"

"My mother has a head on her shoulders," boasts the tone-deaf orchestra board-chairman. "Absolutely," confirms the manager, "I've seen it." And as the conductor leads the orchestra in "The Stars and Stripes Forever" as a special favor for the old lady listening at home, the old-maidish

The Pleasure of His Collaboration

Taylor Doesn't Let Credit Go—Several Alterations Of Authorship Vis-a-Vis Cornelia Otis Skinner

As the first all-out smash hit of the new Broadway season, "The Pleasure of His Company" has created a boom ticket broker call, caused a flurry of talk about the film version and a touring company, and has already had its first snarl over billing. The Samuel Taylor and Cornelia Otis Skinner comedy opened Wednesday night (22) at the Longacre, N. Y., to generally enthusiastic reviews.

Even before the opening there was a fuss about billing. The authorship had been credited to Taylor and Miss Skinner while the script was in preparation, during the preliminary production period and rehearsals and the tryout tour. However, a few days before the New York preem, Taylor insisted on a change, with Miss Skinner's okay.

Drama editors were notified that the authorship billing was to read, "By Samuel Taylor (with Cornelia Otis Skinner)." The requested change was made by several papers in news copy, and the N. Y. Times even reported the switch, with speculation as to the reason and quoted explanations from Taylor and Miss Skinner (both said that Taylor had done most of the writing). Other papers, including the Daily News, ignored the instructions and used the traditional co-author billing.

The parenthetical billing was used in all ad copy, however, and the wording was also changed on three-sheets, window cards and the theatre house boards, at a reported cost of several thousand dollars. However, when Brooks Atkinson, in his Times review of the play, referred to the new billing as "tiresome exactitude," Taylor apparent-

Habimah Theatre Marks 40th Anniversary With Celebrations in Israel

Tel Aviv, Oct. 21.

The Habimah, generally regarded as Israel's national theatre, held nation-wide celebrations recently to mark its foundation in Moscow just 40 years ago. The actors of the original theatre were young aspiring men and women who commanded a fair knowledge of Hebrew and dreamed of creating a Hebrew theatre for Jewish people and eventually for the Holy Land. Their producer was Yehoshua Bertonoff, who is still with the Habimah today. When the Habimah left Russia in 1926, Hannah Rovina (the theatre's leading lady till this day), Aharon Meskin and Bertonoff were the principal actors.

Today, Habimah has a modern theatre hall of its own, situated in the square which now houses Tel Aviv's Cultural Centre. The repertoire comprises the classics of the Eastern and Western European stage, modern European and American plays plus original Israeli works. Like all of Israel's theatres, it is a repertory theatre.

The festival program for the 40th Anni Celebration included a special performance in memory of members of the company who have died: "Hanna Senesh," original Hebrew play by Aaron Meged, dedication of "Habimah Square" and the completed new facade and foyer in presence of the President of the State, selected scenes from the Habimah's most famous plays, "The Dybbuk," "The Eternal Jew" and "The Golem."

Dublin Legiter Reopens

Dublin, Oct. 21.

Olympia, Dublin's second oldest legiter, shuttered since early summer, reopens this week with John Osborne's "The Entertainer," with the new Cicely Courtneidge show to follow.

Theatre's joint managing-directors, Stanley Illsley and Leo McCabe, told how costs are up and audiences are unpredictable. Sample of unpredictability quoted was: the Lunts in "Quadrille" did SRO but the same pair came in "A Time Remembered," and the show did far from capacity.

Peter Glenville Plans 2 Legit Plays and Film

British legit and film director Peter Glenville, with only one American picture ("Me and the Colonel") under his belt, has lined up a busy sked in future months.

He's now preparing to stage the legit version of "Rashomon," adapted by Mike and Fay Kanin. The show will start Claire Bloom, Rod Steiger, Akim Tamiroff and Oscar Homolka. The show is being produced by Hardy Smith Productions, i.e. Smith and Glenville, in partnership with television-legit producer David Susskind. Play goes into rehearsal in November and is due Jan. 27 at the Music Box, N.Y.

Glenville, in association with Susskind, also plans to produce a film titled "Revival," based on a Howard Stark story. A Columbia Pictures release, it'll deal with evangelism in the U.S. It's slated to roll in the spring. In addition, Glenville intends to produce the Peter Schaffner play, "The Royal Hunt of the Sun," dealing with the conquest of Peru. Glenvile said the subject lent itself ideally for a later screen version.

The director flew to London last week for the Royal Command Performance.

'Sunrise' Net 85G, But Delay Divvy

Backers of "Sunrise at Campobello," which has thus far netted approximately $85,000 on its Broadway run, still haven't recouped their entire $110,000 investment. A balance of $40,000 due them on that amount is being withheld by the management pending determination of the exact production costs of the national company. It began touring Oct. 13.

The profit on the Theatre Guild-Dore Schary production of Schary's play is based on a Sept. 27 accounting, plus estimated income since then. As of the audit, the profit, after taxes, was $69,363. Of that, $23,505 represented production costs to date. That left a profit of $45,858, plus the $40,000 capitalization balance, which equals the amount necessary to cover a $25,000 sinking fund and a $15,000 bond guarantee.

The Broadway production, currently in its 39th week at the Cort Theatre, stars Ralph Bellamy, and Leif Erickson heads the road company.

Stolz's Pic-to-Stage 'Two Hearts' Clicks in Zurich

A stepped-up, modernized revival of Robert Stolz's 1933 hit operetta "Two Hearts in Three-Quarter Time," at the Stadttheatre here, looks to repeat the original b.o. performance of this pic-to-stage musical. (The film was world-preemed 1930 in Berlin). Opening night was sellout, and final-curtain mitting swelled to a 20-minute ovation for the attending composer. Incidentally, Stolz personally conducted the world preem of the stage version a quarter-century ago at the same house.

Although, basically, the title song overshows the rest of the score, musical still has plenty of entertainment value despite a sometimes creaky book. Main credit for the successful revival goes to an updated production by Helmut Hansel, including such "topical" elements as a rock 'n' roll number, choreographed by Jeanpierre Genet; modernistic, colorful sets by Max Roethlisberger; and "trapeze" dresses (no less) for the choristers by Heinz Weber.

"Nice People" the Yiddish-American musicomedy at the Downtown National Theatre, N.Y., is playing nine performances weekly on a Monday through Sunday sked.

Ring Lardner as Opera

Sam Morgenstern, a composer and musicologist as well as a conductor, is busy on an opera based on a Ring Lardner short story, "The Haircut," Jan Henry is doing the libretto. Rights were obtained from the humorist writer's widow.

Morgenstern was the musical director of the old Lemonade Opera troupe in Greenwich Village some years ago and has conducted summer opera workshops through the years.

Bennett's 'Mame' Gross $1,740,452, Got Back $94,974

The Constance Bennett company of "Auntie Mame," which marks its first full year of touring tomorrow night (Thurs.) grossed $1,740,452 for its first 41 weeks' operation through Sept. 27. According to the latest accounting, the production recouped $94,974 of its $130,000 investment during that period.

The show, currently playing an extended run at the Erlanger Theatre, Chicago, had an operating loss of $24,979 for the seven weeks prior to the accounting, and an additional $10,491 deficit the preceding seven weeks, when it took a summer layoff.

Total expenses for the vacation period were $18.977, but that was reduced by $8,486 royalties from the Sylvia Sidney edition of the comedy, which continued operation through the summer. Both troupes are presented by Charles Bowden, Richard Barr & H. Ridgely Bullock Jr., in association with Justin Sturm & Richard Horner, under an agreement with Robert Fryer & Lawrence Carr, producers of the original Broadway edition.

On the basis of business since the recent accounting, the Bennett production is estimated to have earned around $5,000 additional operating profit, reducing the outstanding investment to about $30,000. Another company of the Jerome Lawrence-Robert E. Lee dramatization of the Patrick Dennis novel is currently playing San Francisco with Eve Arden as star, under Fryer & Carr management.

$6 Top No 'Popular' Scale for TNP To Bring Classics to the Masses

By FRED HIFT

The U. S. Government, in the interest of international and cultural relations, should find a way to help make the performances of visiting foreign theatre groups available to people of all classes. That is the opinion of Jean Vilar, director of the visiting French troupe, Theatre National Populaire.

The TNP this week is winding up three weeks of repertory at the Broadway Theatre, N. Y., under the auspices of impresario Sol Hurok. The engagement, devoted entirely to the classical repertory, is a success, according to a Hurok spokesman. French Government paid the TNP's transportation and Hurok picked up the tab in the U. S., with a guarantee to the TNP, so that Vilar has to worry only about the artistic success of the engagement.

Reminded that the state-subsidized TNP presented its plays for Parisians at a very low price (600 francs, or $1.50, at most), whereas at the Broadway the top was $6, Vilar acknowledges that the N. Y. admissions are high. The N. Y. scale is certainly not within the "popular" range, even though the house has plenty of balcony seats at $2 and $2.50, the French director concedes.

"Things aren't as they should be," Vilar admits, pointing out at the same time that certain costs in New York are automatically much higher than those prevailing in France. "I think one way out would be for groups like us to give performances on four or five evenings under UNESCO sponsorship. That would allow students and others to come in and enjoy French theatre which, under the present

'Windjammer' Fold Ends 'Culture Crisis' in Chi

Chicago, Oct. 28.

Chicago's "cultural crisis," which created a furore last spring, ended quietly last week with the announcement that "Windjammer" had closed at the 3,600-seat Opera House after only a 14-week run. That leaves the National Theatres Corp. to play landlord to local culture and try to woo dance and operatic bookings in order to amortize the estimated $100,000 remaining on its unexpired lease.

As a result of the "Windjammer" curtailment, the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo and Beryozka, the Russian folk ballet company, are now assured of Windy City engagements this winter. Allied Arts Corp., local bookers of long-hair troupes, will also try to snare the Bolshoi Ballet in the spring and hopes to get the Metropolitan Opera to extend its 1959 tour with a windup date in Chicago.

'Stairs' Has Paid $175,000 to Date

"Dark at the Top of the Stairs" has netted over $230,000 thus far on its $100,000 investment. That's based on a Sept. 27 accounting, plus estimated subsequent income.

As of the audit, the profit on the Saint Subber-Elia Kazan production was $223,370, of which $175,000 had been distributed. The split gives the backers 40%, Kazan 25%, Saint Subber 23% and the play's author, William Inge, 12%.

Inge, Kazan, who doubled as stager, and Saint Subber also share in the gross. The author's slice is 10% and the director's 3%, while Saint Subber gets 1% as producer. The income on the production includes revenue from the sale of the film rights to Warner Bros.

The drama is currently in its 48th week at the Music Box Theatre, N. Y.

Celeste ('Sport') Holm Yens Barrel of Parties; Sees 'Em as Challenge

The Theatre Guild and Celeste Holm, the star of its incoming production, "Third Best Sport," are romancing the New York theatre party agents. With Miss Holm in attendance, the Guild recently tossed a luncheon for a group of the party reps at Sardi's restaurant, N. Y., to promote benefits for the comedy.

Miss Holm told the luncheoners, "Let's be practical. Anyone who doesn't realize how valuable a barrel of theatre parties can be doesn't understand the economics of today's theatre. Outside of the money value, I also consider it a challenge to play to a benefit audience. Everyone knows everyone else and I sort of play to a couple of the leaders of the benefit group. When I get them I've got the group."

Besides the luncheon, at which the show's pressagent, Dick Weaver, was toastmaster, the Guild is providing the agents with a "Sport" mailing piece for distribution to prospective party sponsors. Eleanor Bayer, authoress of the play, and Michael Howard, who's directing it, also attended the luncheon. The guests included Virginia Burkhardt, of the Shubert office; Helen Thompson, of the Play of the Month Guild; Ivy Larric, Lenore Tobin, Frances Drill, Anne Hershkowitz, Elsa Hoppenfeld, Mildred Kaplan, Blanche Furman, Esther Littauer, Thelma Ellis, Gertrude Fox, Bert Landsman and Pauline Hirsch.

"Sport" is currently in Detroit as part of a pre-Broadway tryout.

Pact Eve Boswell For Scot 'Five-Past Eight'

Glasgow, Oct. 21.

Eve Boswell, Hungarian-born thrush who has gained a mark in English vaude and tv, is to costar with Jimmy Logan and Jack Radcliffe, Scot comedians, in the 1959 edition of the Howard & Wyndham revue "Five-Past Eight." Show will teeoff at the Alhambra Theatre here in May.

Pacting of Miss Boswell is further evidence of impresario Stewart Cruikshank's plan to spend coin in booking top names for his click revue, now the main production in U.K. provincial vaude.

Road Spotty; 'Sunrise' 24½G, Pitt.; 'Day' $31,300, Hub; Holm 20½G, Det.; 3 'Mame' Companies Total $125,100

Business slipped for a number of road shows last week, but a few picked up over the previous session.

Despite the dip, receipts for many of the entries remained sturdy.

Estimates for Last Week

Parenthetic designations for out-of-town shows are the same as for Broadway, except that hyphenated T with show classification indicates tryout and RS indicates road show. Also, prices on touring shows include 10% Federal Tax and local tax, if any, but as on Broadway grosses are net; i.e. exclusive of taxes. Engagements are for single week unless otherwise noted.

New How-to Book For Actors, Stagers, Authors

"The fault of this book," says Garson Kanin in his foreword to "Foreign Dialects: A Manual for Actors, Directors and Writers" (Theatre Arts Books; $8.50), "is that it was not written sooner." Lewis and Marguerite Shalett Herman have done an amazing job with this tailormade-for-show biz volume, not only with practical dialog and dialect passages in realistic dramatic usage, but with painstaking phonetic, grammatical, voice & larynx and even musical exercises spelled out in prose and clef notes so that almost anybody, who can articulate, is a cinch for whatever the lingo desired.

The dialects embrace cockney, British (also broken down into Australian slang, Bermuda and India accents), Irish, Scottish, German, French, Italian, Spanish (including Mexican, Filipino and Portuguese), Japanese, Chinese, pidgin-English, Hawaiian dialect, Australian pidgin, Swedish and Norwegian, Russian, middle European dialects (Lithuania, Jugoslav, Czech, Finnish and Hungarian), Polish, Greek and Yiddish. This is not a multilingual course but a transmutation of authentic native accents into English usage for English dramatic purposes. As such it is a comprehensive and authoritative manual. Abel.

'Ezio Pinza' Nice Tribute To Musical Personality

"Ezio Pinza, an Autobiography" (Rinehart; $4.95), is the posthumously-published story of the great singer, written with Robert Magidoff. Latter was formerly NBC correspondent in Europe, and authored a book on Yehudi Menuhin. Pinza's last days (in May, 1957) are related for this account by his widow, Doris. As might be expected, book is not only a record of Pinza's notable career as star in opera, musical comedy, disks, films and video, but also warm-hearted in its recap of his interests in family and friends.

Recollections of the singer's Italian boyhood and youth are excellently presented. Especially touching are the book's closing paragraphs. Pinza, believing himself to be recovering from his last illness, is seen, with characteristic vigor, a man still eager to work, and with faith in life renewed. There are several fine photographs. Work is a worthy monument to one of the great musical personalities of our time.

ing a heavy lineup of theatre parties, there was a line half-way up the block the day the window sale opened at the St. James. There was also a cold, steady rain that day, Oct. 13, which was celebrated as Columbus Day. That meant that many of the waiting applicants gave up a holiday to get drenched standing in line. At least a small line has been in the theatre lobby and at times extending out on the pavement ever since.

Shows on Broadway

board chairman remarks, "I hope mama is wearing her ear trumpet."

The first and third acts are studded with laughs, including quite a few howls, but the second act is relatively quiet. The opening-night performance may also have been slightly askew, as many comedy lines drew less response than they apparently should. However, the show as a whole keeps the audience chortling fairly steadily and, particularly with the Joseph Cotten and Arlene Francis names as come-on, it should have a satisfactory run. It could be an uproarious film.

The show is generally well played. Miss Francis, in particular, gives a dynamic, seemingly effortless performance as the harpist who has managed to keep her spirit and identity as well as the conductor's interest through 15 years of non-wedded domestic warfare, and Walter Matthau bullseyes in the mop-up role of the manager with most of the author's sardonic lines.

Cotten, faced with the problem of being exasperatingly conceited and selfish, and at the same time likable enough to justify the harpist's love and the audience's concern, lacks the sort of personal flamboyance the conductor is supposed to have, but fulfills the other requirement of the part.

Ralph Bunker is laughably prissy as the board chairman who hates music, Leon Belasco is amusingly deadpan in the dual role of mutually-deprecating brother first-fiddlers, Rex Williams is believably harassed as an orchestra manager. Frank Milan is acceptably baffled as the college president-fiance and Paul E. Richards is passable as the maestro's awed Man Friday.

George Axelrod, taking time out from his own comedy-writing pursuits, has staged the frolic, while George Jenkins has designed appropriately grandiose interiors, Michael Travis has provided the men's costumes and Scaasi has come up with a succession of striking gowns for Miss Francis.

"Once More" is presented by Martin Gabel (Miss Francis's husband) and Henry Margolis, who produced the previous Kurnitz play. This time, they seem to have hit the right note. Hobe.

Make a Million

Joel Spector & Sylvia Harris production of three-act (four scenes) comedy by Norman Barasch and Carroll Moore; staging, Jerome Chodorov; scenery and lighting, Paul Morrison; costumes, Ann Roth. Stars Sam Levene; features Don Wilson, Neva Patterson, Ralph Dunne, Conrad Janis, Bill Hickey, Ty Perry, Ann Wedgeworth, Joy Harmon. At the Playhouse, N.Y. Oct. 23, '58; $6.90 top ($9.20 opening).

Receptionist ..... Joy Harmon

You can't satirize radio or television, according to Shubert Alley folklore, because they're funnier in reality than anything anyone can say about them. Whatever else it may do, "Make a Million" won't be the exception to disprove the bromide.

This Norman Barasch and Carroll Moore concoction, which Joel Spector and Sylvia Harris brought to Broadway last week, is a tepid opus which not even the efforts of superbly comic Sam Levene can save from mediocrity. It's probably due for a short stay and is a dubious bet for pictures, but may be an occasional item for stock.

Television quiz shows for fabulous money payoffs are the basic material of the play, but the premise is never established, so the elaborate plot complications and contrived pieces of business suggest author desperation rather than audience mirth. The locale is a tv producer's gaudy penthouse office.

Besides the video packager, the characters include his ever-lovin' secretary and ex-wife, a dimwit sexpot receptionist, and a timid ad agency executive (who's been in analysis for three years, natch—and that provides the sole real laugh when someone mentions the incongruity of his being unable to write a suicide note). There's also a bulldozing sponsor, a fatuous Army general, a pretty and sweetly innocent contestant whose impending, illegitimate motherhood threatens the program's sponsorship, the jive-talking GI who must be persuaded to marry the girl, and so on.

Nothing helps much, try as the cast plainly does. Levene gives another of his vastly accomplished comedy performances as the frantic tv producer, Neva Patterson is attractive and astonishly poised as his secretary-former wife and about-to-be new wife, radio-video announcer Don Wilson is effectively pompous as the Pentagon brass, Anne Wedgeworth suitably fetching as the Dixie-bred mother-to-be and Conrad Janis is his usual offhand self as the Lothario soldier.

Jerome Chodorov, who succeeded Ezra Stone as director during the tryout tour, has staged the rumpus, Paul Morrison designed the gimmicky setting and Ann Roth provided the costumes. Hobe.

Israeli Pianist Victor In Rubinstein Contest

Tel Aviv, Oct. 21.

After a seven-hour competition concert, held at the Frederic R. Mann Auditorium here, the Artur Rubinstein prize of $1,000 was awarded to Mordehai Simoni, Israeli-born pianist. Artur Rubinstein, in Israel on his second visit, has created a scholarship fund, into which all of his soloist's fees due to him for appearances in Israel, are being paid by the Israel Philharmonic, his hosts. This year, he wished to award three prizes, but in the future only scholarships will be awarded to worthy applicants.

Simoni, son of immigrants from Caucasus, studied piano at the Shulamit Conservatoire here. For the last two years he worked in Brussels with Stefan Ashkenase, holding a scholarship from the Belgian government. The verdict of the jurors was unanimous in favor of young Simoni. Instead of distributing a second and third prize, the jury decided to award two second prizes of $400 each to Igal Rugachevski and Herut Israeli.

Herbert Grossman will conduct the Broadway production of "Maria Golovin."

Pleasure of His Collaboration

ly had a change of heart, and asked to have the parentheses dropped.

The Times again reported the switch, with quoted explanation, and the billing has since read, "By Samuel Taylor, with Cornelia Otis Skinner." Taylor's name is in boldface type and Miss Skinner's in light-face. This billing, like the parenthetical previous version, is unique in the memory of trade veterans. (Miss Skinner also gets billing as costar with Cyril Ritchard and Charlie Ruggles.)

Both Taylor and Miss Skinner were quoted by Sam Zolotow in the Times as denying that there had been any revision of the authorship royalty split, at least recently. That apparently refutes a rumor that the arrangement had originally been 60-40 in Taylor's favor, but had been changed one or more times and was recently made 80-20. As one Shubert Alley denizen commented, Miss Skinner might have mentioned author billing and royalty headaches among the pre-opening jitters she described in a recent Times Magazine article.

In the biographical notes in the back of the Playbill, it refers to Taylor's background as a play-reader and play-doctor, and cites the Broadway play, "What a Life" and the derivative radio and tv series, "Aldrich Family" as a successful example of his work. Both the play and radio-tv series were written by Clifford Goldsmith, but were the subject of a dispute and arbitration between him and Taylor, who was conceded to have supplied suggestions and been paid a fee. Goldsmith won the case.

The pre-production deal under which William Perlberg and George Seaton acquired the screen rights to "Pleasure," for Paramount release, provides for a down payment of $75,000, plus bonuses of $2,500 a week for the duration of the Broadway run, to a $175,000 ceiling, or a total of $250,000 altogether. In addition, Taylor is to get $100,000 for doing the screen treatment. It's understood that the film producers made the deal with Taylor, and that Miss Skinner's name does not appear on the contracts.

Perlberg and Seaton are reportedly already planning to revise the play's ending so that the San Francisco, society girl will not cancel, or at least postpone for a year, her scheduled marriage to her cattle-man fiance. As it is, she jilts the youth to go off on a world sight-seeing tour with her long-lost father, whose gallantries and sophisticated manner intrigue her. The present finale has already been greatly modified from what was regarded as almost incestuous in flavor.

With the indicated smash of "Pleasure" on Broadway, Frederick Brisson and the Playwrights Co. are now figuring on sending out a touring company, probably opening in February and working west to play Los Angeles and San Francisco next summer and go into Chicago next fall for an indefinite run. That will require an agreement with Ritchard, whose contract as director and costar of the Broadway troupe gives him the option of starring on the road.

Brisson and the Playwrights Co. learned this week that British producer Emile Littler has announced plans for a London presentation of a posthumous Frederick Lonsdale comedy, "Half a Loaf," and has retitled it "The Pleasure of Your Company." Efforts are being made to persuade him to pick another tag for the play, on the ground of possible confusion between the two shows, especially as the Taylor-Skinner piece now stacks up as a future London prospect.

'Abner' Hits the Trail

The Broadway company of "Li'l Abner," which ended an eight-week run at the Riviera Hotel, Las Vegas, last Saturday (25), returned to New York Monday (27), prior to embarking on a national tour Nov. 19 at the Riviera Theatre, Detroit. Another edition of the musical is on a one-niter trek booked by Broadway Theatre Alliance.

Staged by Warner LeRoy; settings, Robert Soule; costumes, Theoni Vachlioti Aldredge; lighting, Lee Watson; incidental music, Stanley Silverman. At York Playhouse, N.Y., Oct. 25, '58; $4.85 top ($6 opening).

Cast: Alvin Epstein, John Lasell, Yaro Gordon, John Ramondetta, Jon Stone, John Karlen, David Margulies, Geddeth Smith, Nicholas Kepros, Viveca Lindfors, Paul Mann, Forrest Wood, Jerry Douglas, David Penhallow, Avra Petrides, Josephine Michols, Sharron Frye, Janice Morley, Tisa Baronne, Norma Musco, Jay Sheffield, Clint Singleton, Dave Bynum, Thayer David, Tom Murphy, Peter de Manio, Leonard Drum, Vince Tamoio, James Frawley, Roger Evan Boxill, Arlene Avril, Patricia Quinn.

As produced at off-Broadway's posh York Playhouse, Maxwell Anderson's new historical drama, "The Golden Six," is a small-scale study of the life and times of four Roman emperors: Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula and Claudius, with intimations of Nero to follow. The play had a non-professional airing at Boston Univ. last spring.

Although with a praiseworthy breadth of vision Anderson has invited audiences to ponder the sinister temptations of power, and the corruption of power's misuse, these worthy considerations have been hampered partly by the playwright himself and partly by co-producer Warner LeRoy's staging.

Anderson has not fully solved the problem of compression and focus. His episodic treatment has not blended well, for example, with his premise that Livia, wife and mother of emperors, really controlled the empire by her machinations and incitements to murder. Although Livia is the central figure, the action does not revolve around her.

The title refers to the six young men who are grandsons or step-grandsons of Augustus and Livia. The fate of each of these offspring is banishment, murder or both, save for the stammering Claudius, whose reign is just beginning at the final curtain.

For the most part LeRoy has staged with an attempted naturalism, eschewing the sweep and power that are inherent in Anderson's dramaturgy. In this he has not been the author's best friend, as contrast with Thayer David's full-dimensioned portrait of the stolid Tiberius quickly demonstrates. There is a dynamic quality about David's attack that is missed elsewhere.

Viveca Lindfors as Livia, for example, provides excellent cunning and craftiness, yet she plays with a television-size constraint. On the other hand, Robert Evan Boxill as Caligula, the emperor who cannot make up his mind which sex is which, cavorts in a fashion that seems less like a dissolute emperor than an actor grappling with a part he isn't sure how to handle. Here is where LeRoy might usefully have stressed the merit of indication.

Alvin Epstein as the young, seemingly slow-witted, yet really astute Claudius, strikes a fine balance that helps enormously and is particularly admirable in the handling of two tastefully written scenes of soliloquized reflection. Paul Mann is a satisfactory Augustus, particularly in the grovelling death throes, a scene of malignancy triumphant as Livia taunts him to his ignominious doom.

Among the cast of 33, John Ramondetta and John Karlen as two of the golden grandsons have boldness and size, while Avra Petrides as a lissom slave girl adds clarity of performance to her other attributes.

Robert Soule's settings of the catacombs, Augustus' library, and the peristyle of the palace, finely enhance the play's intent, while Theoni Vachlioti Aldredge has provided resplendent costumes.

Reducing Anderson's historic-dramatic speculations to conversational size has robbed his play of much of its desired impact. The primary fault rests with the director and those actors who have settled for little truths rather than vigorous insight. Geor.

Aw, What's the Use?

Philadelphia, Oct. 28.

Some days a pressagent can't even frame a stunt for headline purposes. A scheme by Seymour Krawitz and Morris Yuter, drumbeaters for "La Plume de Ma Tante," to ballyhoo the opening of the show's tryout last week at the Forrest Theatre here fizzled when the cops apparently forgot a local ordinance requiring permits for parades.

The cast of the French revue, including 12 girls, nine comedians and a horse, arrived in town by bus, were met at midtown Reyburn Plaza by a string band and decorated convertibles. They parade around City Hall and several blocks to their hotel, snarling traffic en route, but although pedestrians gaped, the cops took no interest.

'Racy Careers of English Actresses,' Circa 1660-89

"All the King's Ladies" by John Harold Wilson (U. of Chicago Press; $3.95), concerns the racy careers of English actresses of the Restoration. Between 1660 and 1689, British playgoers, accustomed to boys in women's roles, met their first actresses. Account recaps such famous performers as Nell Gwynn, Peg Woffington and Elizabeth Barry; but also present are stalwarts like Anne Bracegirdle, Mrs. Thomas Betterton, Frances Knight, Mrs. Mountfort and many others.

Author deals not only with off-stage romances of the period, but reveals many little-known stage customs and practices; the influences of playwrights, directors and acting methods on Britain's earliest leading ladies, and shows how, in turn, they affected the development of the modern theatre. A sprightly, well-informed, handsomely-produced book. Rodo.

Shows Out of Town

ially and end up on a vein of rowdy humor.

Dhery is an able and facile performer, on the smooth and uncuous order of Maurice Chevalier, and he makes an ideal master of ceremonies, whether introducing the members of the cast at the outset, explaining some of the more decidedly French touches or participating himself in comedy sketches. He dominates the show, but he has plenty of capable assistance from featured members of the cast, particularly his talented wife, Miss Brosset.

She is consistently amusing and ties up the proceedings with an "off-beat" striptease, somehow reminiscent of Mary Martin's famed "My Heart Belongs to Daddy." She's immensely funny too as a dancer always out of step, portrays Eve in a Garden of Eden bit and, when called on, shows she is a skilled and versatile hoofer.

Also notable is a diminutive comic named Pierre Olaf, who wanders in and out of the action, continually making mistakes and coaxing laughs. LeFevre, injuries and all, is a good comic and his rendition of a dramatic aria while astride a horse is very funny. Jacques Legras, Roger Caccia and Nicole Parent also make neat contributions to the generally hilarious proceedings. A laugh highlight is the first act finale, "Freres Jacques," a real novelty.

Although the management created the impression before the local opening that "La Plume de Ma Tante" was going to be exceptionally risque, that didn't prove to be the case. A couple of scenes, such as the one showing the typically Parisian street "comfort station" have the well-known "Gallic touch" but this is not inherently a smutty show in any sense.

The girls, quite a few of them obviously English and not products of the Paris boulevards at all, are extremely shapely and beguiling and they show quite a lot of bare epidermis on occasion, but there is no outstanding stressing of nudity. Waters.

Irving R. Levine's Book

NBC and VARIETY correspondent in Moscow Irving R. Levine will have his book, "Main Street, USSR," published next February by Doubleday. It will be in the nature of an overall primer on the country where he has been assigned for over three years. Levine was in New York on a quickie for a global NBC newscast on the world events and also to meet the 80 tv editors whom NBC junketed into Gotham on an exploitation spree.

Marvin Kalb, press attache in the American Embassy, Moscow, since January 1956 until February, 1957, kept a daily journal and his "Easters Exposure" has just been published by Farrer, Straus & Cudahy.

'Year 1958'

These annual hard-cover compendiums of the days of our years serve, perhaps, the most significant purpose, of pointing up just how much is compressed into the American and global scene year after year. Things move so fast that, unless documented, it is difficult to digest just how much is transpiring in and affecting our daily pursuits.

"Year: The Picture News Annual," published by Baldwin H. Ward at $7.95 has compressed 3,000 subjects into 75,000 words and 700 pictures, with a foreword by ballistic expert Dr. Wernher von Braun. Per usual it is well organized, departmentalized, cross-indexed and attractively packaged, withal a very readable digest of the past year's events graphically written and illustrated. Abel.

Mickey Cohen Vs. Satevepost

Mickey Cohen, well known Hollywood character, has filed suit in Philadelphia Common Pleas Court No. 1 for libel asking $1,000,000 damages. The defendants are the Curtis Publishing Co., publishers of the Saturday Evening Post, and freelance writer Dean Jennings. The action cited a four-part series of articles which appeared recently in the Post, entitled: "Mickey Cohen: The Private Life of a Hood."

The visit of the pudgy, sometime racketeer to this city was enlivened when a police rading squad broke down the doors to his suite in the Warwick Hotel (21) and arrested Cohen on charges of being a common gambler and for failing to register with the police as a convicted criminal. He was freed on both complaints at a magistrate's hearing.

In the libel suit, Cohen asks $500,000 punitive damages, $250,000 general damages, and $250,000 for a special loss sustained in negotiating with a publisher about a book on his life. The complaint charges that the Post articles intended to defame him and prevent him from establishing a reputation as a good and law-abiding citizen.

Cohen's suit alleges that the title of the Post series libeled him. A photograph showing him in jail with a blackened eye held him up to "public ridicule, scorn and contempt and lowered and debased him in the eyes of the public." The suit also averred that because of the articles Cohen was suspected to have been guilty of "crimes and fraudulent practices."

"As a poet Boris Pasternak is great," said Nabokov. "But his novel is trash." He authored this comment to be used on Mutual's "World Today Show" Thursday (23). ["Lolita" has not been endorsed as deathless prose either. —Ed.] circumstances, they may not be able to do. Also, I think the U. S. Government should take some action.

"Some way will have to be found to bring our kind of cultural presentations within popular economic range, or else future visits of this kind will be difficult."

Vilar defends his exclusively classic repertoire for the N. Y. date on the grounds that this is the TNP's specialty, that the classics are the pieces which are most easily understandable for an American audience and that "modern" French language, particularly the avant-guard theatre, wouldn't be easily comprehensible to the U. S. public. Absence of any modern plays from the TNP program has been noted.

The French director, who also acts in the troupe, regards it as "one of our victories" that the classics could be made interesting. Even in France, the TNP sticks primarily to classic pieces, partly because of the size of the stage at the Palais de Chaillot, where the troupe is housed.

Vilar deplores the fact that the U. S. has no repertory setup. He suggests that, one of these days, the leading universities might get together and make a start in that direction "and maybe that would set an example for the Government."

TNP started in 1923. It is one of three state institutions—the other two are the Opera and the Comedie Francaise—to get French governmental subsidies. It receives 60,000,000 francs (about $150,000) from the Government. It has to give 150 performances a year at the Chaillot, which seats 2,800. The Comedie Francaise gets 500,000,000 francs (about $1,250,000) and the Opera 2,000,000,000 francs (about $5,000,000) per year in subsidies.

Vilar is the only member of TNP to have a contract with the state. Gerard Philipe, who stars in several of the TNP pieces on Broadway, has been with the group off and on. "I've got no more than a handshake agreement with him," Vilar said. Philipe appears in many films.

Vilar, who joined TNP as its head in 1951, is taking the 36-member unit on a tour of universities prior to returning to Paris. He felt that 36 actors were too many to bring over, but the number was necessitated primarily for the production of Alfred de Musset's "Lorenzaccio."

The traditionalist-minded Theatre National Populaire comes up with another magnificently staged and acted piece, Victor Hugo's starkly tense "Marie Tudor." This is theatre in the grand manner, filling the stage with the tragedy and trappings of another age, when "Bloody Mary" sat on England's throne, an emotional, strong-willed and lonely woman.

Of all the plays TNP has done so far on Broadway, this is perhaps the best, though it does on occasion tend to go overboard in emotionalism. Once again, the staging and the costumes dominate the large stage, but the performances fully match the splendor of the Leon Gischia settings.

Maria Casares as the queen is superb as a woman betrayed and yet torn by her love for her doomed lover. She is explosive in her outbursts, and moving in her final desperation, when suddenly she wonders whether her trick has worked and whether it isn't her lover, Fabiano Fabiani, who is walking to his death.

Opposite her, Roger Mollien is excellent as the unscrupulous Fabiani; Monique Chaumette is charming and displays strong talents as Jane, who has been seduced by Fabiani but who loves Gilbert, who in turn is willing to give his life to see Fabiani executed. Philippe Noiret is cold and scheming as Simon Renard, who wants the queen to get rid of Fabiani, and who in fact cooks up the intrigue which sends Fabiani to the scaffold even as the queen believes it is Gilbert who is being executed.

In the smaller parts, Jean-Paul Moulinot intrigues as the Jew who embarrasses Fabiani with some evidence and is killed by the Italian, and Coussonneau is very good as the sympathetic jailer.

This isn't a great play, but under the sensitive hand of director Jean Vilar it emerges as an exercise in fine acting, and the climax carries a good deal of tension as both women wait desperately to find out which man was beheaded. As the bell tolls, they suffer through the final minutes, and yet there is a great deal of dignity in both. When Gilbert finally emerges, the action momentarily becomes ludicrous, but false notes like this are inevitable in a play written in the 19th century and imbued with that kind of romanticism.

Once again, lighting, settings and costumes combine to make the TNP a joy to eye and ear and a credit to the French theatre. Maurice Jarre's music is appealing in its simplicity. Hift.

OBITUARIES

MARSHALL NEILAN

Marshall Neilan, 67, one of the giants of the silent film era, died Oct. 26 of cancer in the hospital of the Motion Picture Country Home at Woodland Hills, Calif.

Like D. W. Griffith, another giant of the pioneering days of the flickers, Neilan—known as Mickey—followed the path to obscurity after a period of fame, fortune and adulation.

At the height of his career as a producer - director, Neilan commanded a fee of $100,000 at a time when the Government took no tax bite and lived, as one reporter described it, "on the scale of an Indian prince." Later, when his name had lost its magic, he haunted film studios for bit parts to pay the rent on his small apartment. In 1939, he was arrested for passing bad checks. "I just couldn't make the grade," he told the court. He was fined and placed on probation.

Fame and fortune came early to Neilan as he became one of the top-ranking directors and figures of the silent screen and gained worldwide recognition for the directorial touches and innovations he brought to the new medium. Performers who acted under him included Mary Pickford, John Barrymore, Blanche Sweet, George M. Cohan, and the child star, Wesley Barry, whom he discovered.

At the end, Neilan was just one of the faces in the Elia Kazen-Budd Schulberg film, "A Face in the Crowd," filmed at the Gold Medal (formerly Biograph) Studios in the Bronx, where Neilan launched his acting career in about 1917 and ended it in 1956.

Born in California, Neilan, at the age of 29, was already established "as the youngest director-genius of Neilan's wife." When he married Miss Sweet, however, he was referred to as "Blanche Sweet's husband." He separated from Miss Sweet in 1929 and they were later divorced. Neilan had a son, Marshall Jr., by his first wife.

When the heyday of the silent film director had almost disappeared in 1931, Neilan signed to direct eight ZaSu Pitts-Thelma Todd comedies in 12 months. By 1933 there were no jobs available for him.

Very Quiet on the Potomac as Gov't Pot-Shots Slots on Pier Casinos

By LES CARPENTER

Washington, Nov. 4.

What's going to happen to about 650 slot machines which used to sit on piers across the Potomac River seducing lots of money from Virginians whose state outlaws gambling?

They are now resting in a Waldorf, Md., warehouse following a Maryland Court of Appeals (the top state court) decision which forced them off the piers last week.

Consideration is being given now to appealing the Maryland court decision to the U. S. Supreme Court, a step that can be taken any time up until mid-January. Or, then again, another market may be found for the mechanical coin collectors. Under Federal law, however, they cannot be shipped out of Maryland, either as whole slot machines or in pieces thereof.

Maryland may be able to absorb them elsewhere. The state has a county option system for legalizing the operation of slots. Now, four counties, Anne Arundel, Charles, Calvert and St. Mary's, license

Yanks Happy as Argentina Okays Admissions Hike; It's Touchy for Latins

The American film companies won a major "breakthrough" in Argentina last week when the Government liberated admission prices for all firstruns in the country. The subsequents remain controlled, but the scales have been raised.

Move makes Argentina virtually the only big Latin American market where the firstruns have been decontrolled. Countries like Mexico and Brazil still maintain a tight lid on admissions, the issue having been used as a political football in the past.

The former top for the Argentine firstruns was 8 pesos and 90 centavos net (after tax).

The new scale for the subsequents provides for a top of 9.40 pesos (about 12c) for second runs, 8.40 pesos (about 11c) for third runs and 7.40 pesos (about 9c) for the rest. Comment at the Motion Picture Export Assn. in N. Y. was that the decree represented "a real improvement." Hope was expressed, however, that Argentine firstrun operators wouldn't allow prices to soar dramatically and instead would let them go up "conservatively."

Removal of the price lid is credited in part to the visit to Argentina earlier this year of MPEA prez Eric Johnston and MPEA regional chief Robert Corkery. Duo saw the Argentine President and various other government officials and received assurances that something would be done.

Clyne Proposes Pooled TV Fund To Develop Talent

McCann-Erickson's C. Terence (Terry) Clyne, who firmed up Frank Sinatra for 6-8 specials over ABC-TV before the adman left for Europe this past weekend on a fortnight's quickie vacation, has great concern about the future of television talent "in a very few years from now." He envisions the medium "going the way of Hollywood, and while I favor free enterprise the downbeat of tv as we now know it will hasten pay-see-tv more than anything else."

"Just as the film fans get tired of the same old favorites," Clyne points to the current crop of top names as being merely an elec-

QUALITY SHOWS SHORT-CHANGED

By GEORGE ROSEN

This season, perhaps more than ever before, by virtue of the fierceness of the competitive battle between the networks, there is seen a dire need for the industry to come to grips with itself in recognition of the necessity for a television yardstick other than ratings. The struggle for nose-counting supremacy in determining who out-Trendexed and out-Nielsened whom has reached such ridiculous proportions, it's maintained, that one is sorely tempted to cry out: "A plague on all your rating houses."

• The blunt truth is that the very best in television—which should be the only criteria in evaluating the medium's progress — more than likely won't even show up when the Top 10 laurels are distributed and when the season's cumulative batting averages are tallied.

A Fred Astaire show as presented on NBC-TV a couple weeks back, considered far and away the best entertainment program of the season, won't even have a look in on the Top 10 payoffs, since so many other factors are involved (as, for example, the fact that Friday night viewing isn't generally commensurate with the rest of the week, or the fact that the opposition Phil Silvers show retains a week-in-week-out loyal following). So Astaire will probably wind up far down the Nielsen rating list—which has nothing to do with the fact that here was a show that justified tossing a hat into the air.

By virtue of the fact that nothing on Sunday afternoon gets a major rating, "Omnibus" appears doomed to lowercase Trendexes and Niel-

Kept Out of Hollywood 8 Years, Lollobrigida Pretty Mad at Hughes

By HANK WERBA

Madrid, Nov. 4.

The long contract dispute between Italian film beauty Gina Lollobrigida and Hollywood tycoon Howard Hughes is now entering its ninth year and the screen actress told VARIETY she is prepared to take the offensive in a legal showdown next year if a binding compromise is not forthcoming.

Lollobrigida and her producer-manager husband, Milko Skofic, brought the long-standing film vendetta up to date in King Solomon's apartment between scenes of the Edward Small-Ted Richmond biblical "Solomon and Sheba" in which she stars opposite Tyrone Power.

Hughes signed her in October, 1950 to a preliminary seven year contract for three pictures a year with annual options, and agreed to start her services no later than April, 1951.

She balked when the formal contract reached her in Rome with an added clause sanctioning salaried inactivity. "Gina was just making it," Skofic explained, "and wanted film roles to hang a career on, not paid Hollywood unemployment."

Hughes, then RKO boss, "suspended" her. Later, the actress

Elvis: 'Bigger Than The Generals Who Watch Over Him'

Frankfurt, Nov. 4.

Pvt. Elvis Presley got the same old mob treatment he's received in the States when he arrived here for his next tour of military duty with the 3rd Armored Division at Ray Caserne in Friedberg, near here, recently. There was one difference—most of the mobsters were the generally indifferent members of the European press who rushed up with pencils and paper to get their stories and his autograph.

About 150 members of the international press, news services, newsreel cameramen, reps of top German papers, crushed in for the official press meet recently at the Enlisted Men's Club at his base. It was the first time the Army allowed the press in Europe

CBS' 360G Investment In 'Fair Lady' Yields Return of $1,200,000

The profit divvy on "My Fair Lady" has hit the $3,000,000 mark. That gives the Columbia Broadcasting System, the musical's sole backer, a return of $1,200,000 thus far on its $360,000 investment.

The payoff to CBS is based on the corporation's 40% share of the profits. The remaining 60%, representing $1,800,000, is split from the management end and includes 30% to Alan Jay Lerner and Frederick Loewe, who were responsible for the adaptation from George Bernard Shaw's "Pygmalion."

Herman Levin, the show's producer, was originally in for the other 30% slice of the profits, but subsequently sold two-thirds of his interest for $450,000 as a capital gains deal. The income racked up thus far represents revenue from three companies, the Broadway original, the road edition and the London version. Also included in the revenue is the production's cut on the sale of Columbia Records' original cast album.

Incidentally, the payoff to Lerner and Loewe does not include their weekly royalty on the three productions and their share of the royalties from album sales. Their take from these sources has also

Feldman: New Film World A-Comin'

Spinoff Will Finish What Divorcement Began — Future Talent Will Share Risks With 'Naked' Studios

By ABEL GREEN

There will always be a picture business, in the opinion of vet Hollywood agent and independent producer Charles K. Feldman, but he envisions that the inevitability of a spinoff of the post-1948 pictures "within five years" will create a new concept in picture-making that should boom Hollywood —producers and talent—to new peaks.

As a prime talent agent he predicates his reasoning on the divorcement and spinoff so that when "the naked companies no longer have physical realty assets to guarantee the stars, on deferred payments, as they do now, the talent will start from scratch, gamble with the producers and the 'naked studios' even more than they are today. And we all know now how every star worth his marquee-power is in business for himself."

Feldman has no illusions on the deferred deals with studios because, he argues, "it's a plus, too, for them not to have to pay off in lump sums. They, like the insurance companies, gamble on the actuarial rates, so it is a two-way-street—the talent doesn't want its money in a lump sum and that loot is laying in the company's treasury for use elsewhere."

The keynote will always be "the words," meaning the script. Feldman right now, says he, has $1,000,000 tied up in scripts, novels, properties and ideas, as detailed below. But if the star likes "the words," he or she will take less on the promise it will enhance their careers and, of course, their ultimate economic gain.

"As the production picture changes, and it is even now, so must distribution patterns change," he continues. "Why should Sam Goldwyn risk $5,000,000-$7,000,000 and give away a big slice to some distributor for the privilege of selling something he created—and with his own money! That's why Columbia will get only 10% when the film goes into its initial roadshow engagements. That 17-18% dis-
